"It is difficult to estimate the numbers of this remarkable people. They are scattered all over the mountain range which stretches from the Himalayas to the southern extremity of Burmah, and are understood to abound eastward as far as China. Already affinities are traceable between them and certain parties in China itself. So that it need not astonish us to find the south-eastern corner of Asia as well furnished with Karens as we find the west and centre with Israelites. This people has shown a most singular aptitude for the reception of the Christian dogmas of the Baptist mission in that quarter,—there being upwards of 16,000 church members in that communion from this people alone. Their zeal and success in proselytising are absolutely marvellous. Altogether, there seems no more rational way of accounting for their peculiar character than by saying they are of Israel too.

"In this review it will be seen that Assyria and Media claim our first attention. And how stands the case with these countries? Exactly in agreement with the requirements of the prophecy; for in the countries indicated,—Assyria, Media, by the river Goran, etc.,—that is, the land south and south-west of the Caspian Sea,—as is well admitted by all geographers to be the locality of the captivities of the ten tribes,—there are to be found peoples bearing a most striking resemblance to Israel. Thus, in Mosul, Diarbekir, Urmula, Salmast, and among the mountains of Kurdistan, in the east of Turkey in Asia, are, and have been for unknown centuries, a people of most remarkable character. They are sometimes called the Chaldean Christians, but more frequently Nestorians. This latter designation they themselves reckon a nickname, as they existed as a community long before Nesterius, who was a Greek patriarch of the fifth century. These Nestorians have very distinct traditions of their Israelitish descent,—an idea which other tribes in the same region recognize as correct; also, that they have come from western Asia (Palestine) at a very early date. They have a strong prejudice against the Jews proper living among them, who in turn entertain no very high esteem for them,—still however acknowledging them to belong to the ten tribes. They were, at an early date, converted to the faith of the Christians, probably in the days of the apostles, and perhaps—as they say—through the preaching of Thomas and Bartholomew. There need be little doubt about their Israelitish character, when these facts are noted regarding them: they speak the same language as the Jews of that quarter—the Syriac—which is not the language of their Moslem neighbors, but which was the language of the Holy Land from the days of Ezra till the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus; they have such ancient Hebrew peculiarities in their religious faith as peace offerings, vows, offering of first-fruits, tithes, the preparation before the Sabbath, the forty days' separation from uncleanness; they eat no swine's flesh, have some traces of the passover in their "pasha" festival, even a holy of holies is recognized in their churches; they have the cities of refuge from the avenger of blood, and the baptism of their infants (for they are at least that far from apostate usage) takes place on the eighth day.

"From that region eastward to the Hindoo Koosh mountains, on the northern frontier of Hindostan; northward as far as the sea of Aral at least; and south of the Indian Ocean, is a district more or less peopled with groups and families of Israelites. Dr. Wolff, in his mission to Bokhara, found incidental numbers of Israelitish people throughout the whole State of Turkestan. These were quite unaware of the history, sufferings, and death of Jesus of Nazareth: this convinced him, as it might convince any reasonable person, that the Jews of Khorassan and Bokhara are of the ten tribes who never set travel to the land of their fathers. The same conviction, the Jews of Khiva, Khokand, Tashkend, and Herat carry with them, when they visit, as they are wont, the great fair of Leipsic in Saxony.

I add an extract, slightly abridged from Mrs. Symon's work, entitled "The Hope of Israel, in which the descent of the American Indians from the ten tribes of Israel is maintained,—

"According to Esdras, the Israelites must have repassed the Euphrates at the upper region or streams towards Georgia, and thence have bent their course between the Black and Caspian Seas, which would bring them to the north-east of the country which he mentions.

"Now suppose an extensive continent, north-east of Media, and at the distance of a year and a half's journey from thence, inhabited by a people, no inconsiderable portion of whom are in religion pure Theists; suppose them divided into tribes; with symbols; destitute indeed of letters and in a benighted state, yet possessing all the marks of a people who had not only been civilized, but favored by a revelation from God (the former evident from their tumuli, the mathematical accuracy of their fortresses, and the clay, silver, copper, and other vessels and relics found in the neighborhood of Mexico, Peru, and the great rivers where their ancient and populous towns had been situated; the latter from the ceremonial observances of their worship and civil government). Suppose additional fragments of the sacred history of the creation, and of the people of Israel. Suppose they designate the Great Spirit Yehova, whom they acknowledge as the Omnipotent, Omnipresent, and Omniscient Creator and Sustainer, who shall reward the just and punish the unjust after death. Suppose you find in some of the more intelligent, and in all their prophets, a national feeling of prerogative. Suppose that their return to their own land, where the sun rises, and from which their remote ancestors came, is cherished with a fond faith, together with the re-possession of the great good Book which once belonged to their people. Suppose you find them observing certain appointed festivals and religious dances in which the words Hallelujah and Yehova are constantly repeated; counting their time by moons, and observing the first sight of the new moon with rejoicing, celebrating anniversary feasts of a religious—one in gratitude for the green corn, and another for the ingathering. Suppose you find among them an evening feast corresponding to the passover, in which the bone of the animal may not be broken, and if the provision be too much for one family, deeming it necessary to call in neighbors to eat it; burying before morning dawn the remainder. Suppose they have places of refuge into which the manslayer may flee, and whither the avenger of blood may not intrude. Suppose they have a sacred place where the priest must officiate in a certain dress, making an atonement, but from which other persons are excluded; the high-priest when addressing the people using what he terms 'the ancient divine speech,' calling his hearers 'the beloved peculiar people.' Suppose they have a tradition that they had prophets who could perform miracles and foretell future events. Suppose they have an ark of the covenant imitated, which is not permitted to touch the ground, and which no one except the officiating priest may presume to touch or look into, upon pain of death. Suppose that they have convocations at which all their males must appear annually; that they are traditionally acquainted with the history of the deluge, the building of Babel. Suppose you find some of the tribes making an altar of twelve stones, on which no iron tool may pass, whereas they offer sacrifice. Suppose you find in South and North America all these gleanings of revelation, and many more amongst a newly-discovered people of Asiatic genius and manners, and Hebrew physiognomy, would you feel justified in refusing to acknowledge in this interesting people the outcasts of Israel?"

A single word as to probable increase. From the foregoing quotations it is evident that the ten tribes have been placed in circumstances of varied influence as regards numerical condition. In the more settled and civilized portions of Asia, such as India and China, there will probably have been increase. In the pastoral and unsettled portions of Central Asia, their number will likely have been at the most stationary. It is a fact that since America was colonized by Europeans the Aborigines have diminished in numbers. In the absence of positive information on the subject, all that can be said is, that whatever increase there may have been, there is abundance of room for hundreds of millions in the vast region of Asia.

I close by a remarkable quotation from the prophecy of Amos, in which, instead of increase, there is a decrease, and that to the extent of decimation: "Hear ye this word which I take up against you, even a lamentation, O house of Israel. The virgin of Israel is fallen; she shall no more rise: she is forsaken upon her land; there is none to raise her up. For thus saith the Lord God; The city that went out by a thousand shall leave an hundred, and that which went forth by an hundred shall leave ten, to the house of Israel." Amos v. 1–3.

The COVENANTS.

A TREATISE ON,

I. The Abrahamic covenant, its terms, its extent, its duration, its consequences, and when passed.

II. The Mosaic covenant, its terms, its relation to the Abrahamic covenant, where given, to whom given, the unity of the Law. Its duration and its terminus, the Sabbath and its purposes.

III. The New covenant, the covenantees—not the church, but Israel; conditional prophecy considered, restoration from Babylon considered, future restoration of Israel as covenantees, our relation to the New covenant—as the Seed of the Abrahamic covenant, as the Mediation body, as a Royal and an Eternal Priesthood—how upon the plane of the flesh and and then through the veil upon the plane of spirit; restoration of the Aaronical order of priesthood in the house of Judah under the Prince and subordinate to the royal priesthood; the necessity and the nature of sacrifices in the ages to come.

IV. The Davidian covenant, its terms, the kingdom divided, the kingdom removed, the seed chastised, the kingdom to be restored under Messiah, the reign eternal.

V. To give objections to the position, that the kingdom of Christ in organization is yet future, answered, and the law of induction into the kingdom of the birth of the water and of the spirit.

This work is now in press and will be ready for distribution in June or early in July. It will make from 200 to 250 pages, and will sell for $1 per copy. We are now receiving names for the work, to be paid when the book is delivered. We want your assistance. Give us your name for the work.

The Restitution.

"THE RESTITUTION OF ALL THINGS WHICH GOD HATH SPOKEN BY THE MOUTH OF ALL HIS HOLY PROPHETS SINCE THE WORLD BEGAN."

VOL. XXXI. PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, APRIL 26, 1882. NO. 16.

THE RESTITUTION,

TERMS--TWO DOLLARS PER YEAR, Payable in advance. Three and six Months at the same rate.

Address all Letters and Communications to THE RESTITUTION, Plymouth, Indiana.

TO CORRESPONDENTS:

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

COMING AGE--ITS PROXIMITY.

Sardeleth State of the Two Witnesses. Its Duration. Its Character. Afflictions. Persecutions. Sun-Clad Woman of Rev. xii. Wilderness. Harlot of Rev. xvii. Her Blood Drinking.

No. 108.

J. P. WEETHEE.

Before we enter upon the history of the beast, and investigate the slaying, exposure, resurrection, and ascension of the witnesses, we desire to introduce more testimony relative to their sackcloth state; and show that that state is in the past.

We have seen from Dan. vii. that the little horn was a great persecuting power: and that its persecutions continued 3½ times, or 1260 years: history demonstrating those days to be years. We shall now bring forward the testimony of John who occupied a position near the beginning of those events, and had a very distinct view. His record is found in Rev. xii. At present, we shall give but a brief sketch of the sun-clad woman. John describes her as a wonder in heaven. She was a woman, clothed with the sun, and the moon under her feet, and upon her head a crown of twelve stars. Her dragonic history then follows. This was her Pagan persecutor. The saints overcame the dragon, by Michael's aid, and "By the blood of the Lamb, and by the word of their testimony; and they loved not their lives unto the death." Verse 11.

"The woman fled into the wilderness, where she hath a place prepared of God, that they should feed her there, a thousand two hundred (and) threescore days." Verse 6.

"And to the woman were given two wings of a great eagle, that she might fly into the wilderness, into her place, where she is nourished for a time and times, and half a time from the face of the serpent." Verse 14.

The Pagan persecutions were ten, and continued, more or less severely, for two centuries, to the reign of Constantine the Great. At the close of this period, God makes her a wilderness home; for, what her children had suffered, was only a prelude to those whose coming was at hand.

Rev. xiii. is supplementary to chap. xii. It carries forward the history of persecutions under the scarlet dynasty of the fourth monarchy of Daniel

It will assist the reader, to be informed that this monarchy was pious from his infancy B. C. 743. He was a member of the Pagan, or Dragonic church for 1000 years. After the fall of that church, under Constantine the Great, he became a member of the mixed church, it being a mixture of Christianity and Polytheism. Under Papal supremacy (1260 years) it was a member of and supporter of that apostate hierarchy.

Though always, at heart, dragonic, still he wore the outward garb of the church, of which, at the time, he was a member. Thus, in Rev. xii. his dress is dragonic—red; in Rev. xiii. it is spotted like the skin of a leopard during the transition or mixed period. In Rev. xvii. as he comes out of the wilderness, where he has been persecuting the sun-clad woman, he has the scarlet dress, like his rider. By the position of the crowns, and by his dress, the chronology of his various church memberships can be readily ascertained. In the dragonic period B. C. 753 to A. D. 388, the crowns are on the heads, Rev. xii. 3: under the leopard and scarlet uniforms; but especially belonging to the scarlet dress, the crowns are on the horns. Rev. xiii. 1. No one can fail to see that Rev. xii., xiii. and xvii., also Rev. xix., are prophetic historic sketches of the political systems of the same Great Monarchy. This will be more readily granted when it is seen that the fourth beast of Daniel extends to the kingdom of Messiah, and, consequently, covers all these periods of the Apocalypse.

The thirteenth chapter covers the leopard and scarlet eras of the fourth beast, since it is supplementary to chap. xii., and extends onward to the judgment period. Verse 10.

It is said, "And he (the little horn, the ruling member of that family) opened his mouth in blasphemy (ver. 5) against God, to blaspheme his name, and his tabernacle, and them that dwell in heaven. And it was given unto him to make war with the saints, and to overcome them." Dan. vii. 7, 11, 25; and power was given him over all nations." Verses 6, 7.

How long was this power to continue?

Verse 5. "And there was given unto him a mouth, speaking great things and blasphemies; and power was given unto him to continue forty (and) two months."

Let us now collect the passages where this date, or its equivalents, is used. "Saints given into his hand" "to the end of these wonders?" "sun-clad woman nourished from the face of the serpent," time, times, and half a time; 3½ times. "Holy city trodden under foot," forty (and) two months. "Power was given him to continue, forty (and) two months." "Two witnesses prophesy in sackcloth a thousand two hundred (and) threescore days." "Sun-clad woman in the wilderness a thousand two hundred (and) threescore days." We have 3½ times, 42 months, 1260 days. Are these equal, and the same duration?

From Rev. xii. 6, 14, we are taught that 3½ times and 1260 days are equal and identical: that is, they cover the same time, and the same events. But 42 months cover the same events also; and, since, in 42 months there are 3½ years and 1260 days, 30 days to the month, according to ancient reckoning—they are all equal—and the events show that they cover the same events; —the sackcloth state of the witnesses; the treading down of the holy city; the wilderness state of the sun-clad woman; the persecution of the saints by the little horn; and the wilderness out of which the woman, the harlot, on the scarlet colored wild beast, drunken with the blood of saints and of martyrs (witnesses), rode up to the bar of God's judgment, are the same event, and widely covering the same great chronological cycle of 1260 years.

The harlot rides to her trial, drunk.
Drunk with what?
Drunk with blood.
Whose blood?
The blood of saints and martyrs (witnesses, for martyr means witness)
Where did she find that blood?
She found it in the wilderness.
Whose family was she butchering?
The family of the sun-clad woman.
How long did this human butchery continue?
It continued 1260 years.
Who instigated the butchery?
The harlot.
Who was the butcher-in-chief?
The scarlet colored wild beast; alias the little horn, who was the ruling member of that family.

If any one is curious to know how great was her thirst for blood; and how much blood she drank in her lewd debaucheries, the following leaf from the books of the witnesses gives a sample:

Martyrdoms in France.—Variety of Tortures—Numbers Slain.—France has furnished a greater number of martyrs than any other land. There is no part of its soil that did not, at some time in the 1260 years, drink the blood of the witnesses of Jesus. Four persecutions desire special notice; those under Charles IX., Louis XIV; the persecution of the Waldenses; and that of the Albigenses. These form a record of cruelty and blood unequalled in the annals of history.

1. St. Bartholomew's Day, August 24, 1572.—"Many of the principal Protestants were invited to Paris under a solemn oath of safety, upon the occasion of the marriage of the King of Navarre with the French King's sister. The queen dowager of Navarre, a zealous Protestant, however, was poisoned by a pair of gloves before the marriage was solemnized. Coligni, admiral of France, was basely murdered in his own house, and then thrown out of the window to gratify the malice of the duke of Guise; his head was afterwards cut off, and sent to the King and Queen mother; and his body, after a thousand indignities offered to it, hung by the feet on a gibbet. After this, the murderers ravaged the whole city of Paris, and butchered, in three days, above ten thousand lords, gentlemen, presidents, and people of ranks. A horrible scene of things followed. The very streets and passages resounded with the noise of those that met together for murder and plunder; the groans of those who were dying, and the shrieks of those who were just going to be butchered, were everywhere heard; the bodies of the slain thrown out of the windows; the courts and chambers of the houses filled with them; the dead bodies of others dragged through the streets, their blood running through the channels in such plenty, that currents seemed to empty themselves in the neighboring river, in a word, an innumerable multitude of men, women, with child, maidens, and children, were all involved in one common destruction; and the gates and entrances of the King's palace all besmeared with their blood. From the city of Paris the horrid butchery soon went over France."—Thuanus.

How did the old mother of harlots receive the news of this bloodshed? did she drop a tear over the wailings, and gushings of hearts' blood?

Let us read:—"When the news came to Rome, when the letters of the pope's legate were read in the assembly of the cardinals, by which he assured the pope that all was transacted by the express will and command of the king, it was immediately decreed that the pope should march with his cardinals, to the church of St. Mark, and in the most solemn manner give thanks to God for so great a blessing conferred on the see of Rome and the Christian world; and that, on the Monday after, solemn mass should be celebrated in the church of Minerva, at which the pope, Gregory XIII., and cardinals were present; and that a jubilee should be published throughout the whole Christian world, and the cause of it declared to be, to return thanks to God for the extirpation of the enemies of the truth and church in France. In the evening the cannon of St. Angelo were fired to testify the public joy; the whole city illuminated with bon-fires; and no one sign of rejoicing omitted that was usually made for the greatest victories obtained in favor of the Roman church."—Buck.

How accurately did the old mother love the taste of a martyr's blood.

2. The persecution under Louis XIV. was still more severe and bloody.

3. The persecutions of the Waldenses began about A. D. 1180, and continued with more or less severity for over four centuries.

4. Those of the Albigenses continued still longer. These efforts were aimed against the papal hierarchy to restore the church to its primitive simplicity. Some specimens of death statistics will be found in the following extract:

"About 200,000 martyrs fell under Pope Julian; no less than 100,000 were massacred by the French in the space of three months; the Waldenses who perished amounted to one million; within thirty years, the Jesuits destroyed nine hundred thousand. Under the Duke of Alva, thirty-six thousand were executed by the common hangman; a hundred and fifty thousand perished in the Inquisition; besides the vast multitude of whom the world could never be particularly informed, who were prescribed, banished, starved, burnt, buried alive, smothered, suffocated, drowned, assassinated, chained to galleys for life, or immured within the horrid walls of the bastile, or others of their state or church prisons. According to some, the whole number of persons massacred since the rise of papacy, amounts to fifty millions."—Cottage Bible.

Rev. xi. 7. "And when they shall have finished their testimony"—when they shall be finishing their testimony, sackcloth period—1260 days, or years; when giving in their final testimony belonging to this era, since the witnesses were the family of the sun-clad woman, the chaste bride; born to her in the wilderness during her stay there for 1260 years (historic time); that wilderness was the place where their testimony was given for the same period.

The Albigenses and the Waldenses occupied the witness stand for nearly half that time in testifying against the Papal Hierarchy, as the following will show:

"All they (Waldenses) aimed at, was to reform the form of ecclesiastical government, and the members of the clergy and people to that amiable simplicity and primitive sanctity that characterized the apostolic ages, and which appear strongly recommended in the precepts and injunctions of the Divine Author of our holy religion. Their rules of practice were extremely severe; for they adopted as the model of their moral discipline the sermon of Christ on the mount, which they interpreted and explained in the most rigorous and literal manner. Consequently prohibited and condemned in their society all wars, and suits of law, and all attempts towards the acquisition of wealth; the inflicting of capital punishments, self-defence against unjust violence, and oaths of all kinds."—Buck.

Their mountain homes were principally in the Alpine Wilderness in the south of France.

THE WATER-SUPPLY OF SYRIA AND PALESTINE.

"He sendeth the springs into the valleys, which run among the hills." Ps. civ: 10. "And the whole stay of water." Isa. iii: 1. "And the thirsty land springs of water." Isa. xxxv: 7. "I will open rivers in high places, and fountains in the midst of the valleys: I will make the wilderness a pool of water, and the dry land springs of water." Isa. xli: 18.

When it is remembered that most of the rain for the whole year falls between the middle of December and the first of March,—that none, or scarcely any, falls from the middle of March until the middle of October,—it must always be a matter of surprise that Palestine and Syria have so many copious fountains and rivers, especially as there are few and small deposits of perennial snow. An examination of the physical and geological formation of the country, however, will enable us to understand the wonderful provision by which a country which would otherwise be quite barren is fruitful and populous.

The lofty mountains between Taurus on the north and Sinai on the south are the chain of Lebanon, about one hundred and twenty miles in length, and situated midway between the northern and southern limits mentioned. The main chain of Lebanon is about six thousand feet in height, and the snow disappears from its summits early in May. Near the northern end of the chain, however, it is more elevated and broader, its highest peaks reaching an elevation of nearly two miles, and a breadth of of twenty. Between Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon is a deep valley or plain called the Bukaa, the Cœlesyris of the ancients. Anti-Lebanon resembles Lebanon in its general formation, except that its highest peak, Hermon, is situated at the southern end of the chain. The higher peaks of both Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon are covered with snow through the winter and spring, and immense drifts remain on the northern slopes throughout the blazing summer and autumn. Glaciers, however, have long ago disappeared, and only in a few places do traces remain of the ice action of earlier ages.

It is in the peculiar structure of the surface and interior of these high mountains that we are to look for the source of the unfailing waters which even three years and six months of privation of rain did not exhaust, in the days of Elijah.

The tops of all the range, but, in a special manner, of the higher peaks, present the appearance of a series of craters or funnels varying in width from two hundred to one thousand feet, and in depth from fifty to two hundred feet. These immense pits seem to have been formed by the subsidence of their center, owing to the filtration of water from the melting snows. It is well known that the limestone rock, of which both the chains of Lebanon and their continuations northward and southward are formed, contains immense caverns and reservoirs of water. Some of these have been explored to great distances under the mountain. In several places considerable streams flow underground, and expand into pools and lakes, and pleasure-grounds down precipices in the caverns. It would seem that in places above the reservoirs these great caverns allow the trickling of the water from the snows has caused the gradual subsidence of the soil and loose rocks in the center of the crater-like depressions, which thus grow year by year deeper by the gradual action of the water filtered through their floors. Each of these cavities becomes quite full of snow in the winter, and under forty feet in thickness and hundreds of feet in length remain through the long rainless season, furnishing a constant supply of cold water to replenish the waste from the reservoirs in the heart of the mountain.

These reservoirs, however, must be of vast size, as the daily flow from the springs at the base of the high peaks is far more than could be accounted for by the melting of the snows for that day. These springs burst out in cold, limpid streams often large enough to turn mill-wheels and to irrigate the thirsty land. Those nearest the summit, at a height of six thousand feet, are the largest and finest, and furnish the coldest water. They perhaps are supplied by the direct melting of the snow. But vast volumes of water are carried to great distances, and delivered by natural aqueducts a hundred miles away from the source. This is explained by the geological formation of the country. The limestone strata of Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon are nearly horizontal. The water, escaping from the great caverns through chinks in the strata, flows by channels in the rocks until it finds a vent somewhere in the side of the mountain, where it gushes forth as a fountain. At each such point there is a village surrounded by green trees and terraces. Standing on some point of observation, we may see a tier of villages nearly on the same level extending one after the other for miles along the mountain side, evidently supplied by an underground stream, which follows a nearly level stratum of rock, and breaks out at the sides where it happens to meet a crevice. Then at a lower level on the same mountain side, may be seen another tier of villages, evidently supplied by a similar underground stream, flowing on an impervious stratum, and breaking out through the side chinks to fructify the ground. Such streams would seem to be ever flowing at all levels down to the sea and beneath its bed,—for there are sweet fountains which bubble up under the Mediterranean, or at its very margin, all along the coast.

Hence it is that the land is for many months quite independent of any surface supply of water. The great cisterns in the heart of the mountain are sufficiently water-tight to prevent the rapid exhaustion of their contents, but have at the same time sufficient chinks and conduits in their sides and floors to allow the water to trickle away between the slightly inclined strata, or flow away in underground rivers to far distant portions of the land. And such is the bountiful supply that not only are there springs enough to supply all the population which the land can feed, but very considerable rivers flow away on every side and empty into the sea, or filter into the plains a volume of water which might turn the whole country into a highly cultivated garden, and vastly increase its capacity for supporting man and beast.—Prof. George E. Post, M. D., Beirut, Syria, in S. S. World.

MRS. DAVIS AND HER MISSION.

Leaves from My Journal.

Dec. 25th, Christmas. This has been a warm day; at noon it seemed like June weather in New England. It has, however, been a sad day to me. Every Christmas for the last twenty-two years my Bertie has been by my side. I can only think of her now as alive. I daily find myself thinking what I shall do for dear Bertie when she comes. It is all very strange indeed and I cannot quite comprehend the reality.

Christmas is as much observed here as in Boston. People give and receive costly presents, and seem to enjoy the day very much. In the afternoon, in company with Mrs. Brinton, I visited a quarry which was of great interest to me. The soil above the rock was about four feet in depth, of a black rich color. The stones are in layers about four inches thick, and are very beautiful. They are suitable for floors and other building purposes. These stones would bring a high price in Boston; but they are needed here to beautify the Lord's sanctuary and make the place of his feet glorious.

Mrs. Britton's son is expected every day. If he does not stay here himself he will take his mother home to America with him. I shall be very sorry to have her go.

I am already full of business; for the people find out that I can do many things and they come to me to show them how to work; but they are very kind.

Jan. 2, 1882. Yesterday, new year's day, I walked about two miles and picked beautiful daisies among the rocks. The fields now remind me of New England in May and June. It was very warm; in fact it is like spring all the time.

I take great delight in studying the picturesque scenery of the old mountains of Moab.

I go to my housetop every day to view them. They do not always present the same appearance, but they are always beautiful. Sometimes they look like a great ocean of billows: then the view changes to colors of different hues. When the Mount of Olives is removed, the view of these mountains from the city of Jerusalem will be most magnificent. I have never read from any writer a proper description of them, as they appear to me. Either they are putting on a new appearance, or my vision is different from others, or travellers have not noticed them as they deserve. I hope soon to be able to send a sketch of them.

Palestine wheat, when properly ground, makes better bread I think, than the wheat of any other country in the world. It seems as though I could not eat Boston bread now, nor breathe its impure air.

The Greeks celebrate Christmas at Bethlehem, and our friends have all gone there. For myself I care less and less about the past history of Jerusalem and Palestine, but my interest increases in the prophetic announcements of the future. I feel like crying day and night for the peace and prosperity of Jerusalem.

As I look over the city from my house, it appears as silent as a tomb, but if you walk through the streets you will see a busy crowd. I shall be glad to see the walls come down, for they are quite useless. The gates are never shut.

Everything is undergoing a decided change for the better. I have no fears in walking two miles out of the city in the evening. I do not think there is as much danger as in Massachusetts; in fact, I should not dare to walk outside of Boston, in the evening as I do here. I have not much occasion for walking in the evening, but I assure you it is perfectly safe.

Jan. 6. I wish you could see the rich black soil. Mr. Brinton dug a well on his place thirty feet deep, and did not get through the soil. This is a demonstration that the soil of Palestine is very deep. The people are cleaning the land of rocks which has never been done before. Many of the rocks seem to be honey-combed, and crumbling to a rich soil of the same color. A new spirit seems to have taken possession of the people: and they feel sensible of it themselves.

I could never understand why God designed to remove the mount of Olives until I came to Jerusalem; then it was immediately explained. This mountain is like a huge wart on a beautiful land. Take it away and the prospect eastward from the city, and the view of the city from the east, will be most magnificent—the finest in the world.

Query. The great depression in the valley of the Jordan and the Dead sea extending from a little below lake Merom, or Huleh, north of the sea of Galilee, to the highlands south of the Dead sea, is over 150 miles in length; its greatest depth is 1,317 feet below the level of the Mediterranean, and nearly 1,000 feet below Jerusalem. Will not this, the greatest depression on the face of the whole earth, (Dead [illegible] enchantment to the scene?" The depth of this valley will add to the splendor and sublimity of the city and the country east of it, much more than though it were a plain, as it will be on every other side of Jerusalem;—"All the land shall be turned as a plain from Geba to Rimmon south of Jerusalem." Here the view on the east of the city will be most grand and imposing, and this great valley, probably, will never be filled up to the level of the Mediterranean, as many have supposed. Whatever may be the cause of this great depression the Divine Architect must have designed it to beautify the place of his sanctuary.

When Olivet is removed you can stand on the temple ground and see the Dead Sea and the river Jordan; and crowning all will be the lovely mountains of Moab looming up in the distance. There is no other spot on earth equal to this for a glorious city. A knowledge of Zech. xiv: 4. which reveals the divine plan to beautify this place by the removal of this mountain, strengthens the faith of the believer in divine revelation, and in the restoration of the kingdom of Israel as the kingdom of God on earth; and it will yet prove a mighty weapon against infidelity, even before its fulfillment. The divine plan seems to have been overlooked by travellers and surveyors. On viewing the place, and taking into consideration the declaration of the prophet, that Olivet shall be [illegible] Dr. Lee exclaimed, "I have never dreamed of anything so wonderful."

Jan. 9th. Your letter of Dec. [illegible] came to-day. It seems as though I could not hear from Boston very often. My present condition especially [illegible] from my friends in America; and gratefully received.

I can assure you that Jerusalem is steadily improving, in cleanliness, manners, and, in fact, in almost every way that a city can be improved in this age. The people seem to be rapidly becoming European in dress and [illegible] its. Any one can see that the progression has taken hold of the people never before. It is impossible for a country to remain long in a state of [illegible] condition with this spirit of progress animating the inhabitants. I do not mean to say that the progress is rapid, for it is necessarily slow; but it is sure.

I wish to tell you something about the loose rocks and soil as they appear to me. When the [illegible] first dug out of the ground they look like a honey-comb, and the color of the soil, which is a rich chocolate color or burnt sienna color, [illegible] during the heat of summer; but as soon as a little rain falls it becomes a fine meal, soft and rich. If you throw the honey-combed rocks into the road, of course, they will be rough for a season; but at length the rocks pulverize and become hard soil, and make very good roads.

In gathering flowers among the rocks and holes I am constantly making discoveries I make. In a single [illegible] 30 acres which really look like a perfect ledge, we find [illegible] of beautiful soft, dark, rich soil, containing most lovely flowers. Trees might be planted in these valleys, and being protected by these rocks, would become valuable, if undisturbed for a short time by vandalism, the desolations of which are nearly ended. In one of these fields I found old cisterns and wells of a great age; and an old ruined aqueduct which leads to an immense cistern now dry. No one seems to own this valuable property.

I must tell you that thus far I have been surprised at the absence of [illegible] tiles; not even a bug have I yet found. I can only think of the Prophecy "They shall not hurt nor destroy in all my holy mountain, saith the Lord." I never fear to dig around the [illegible] and in the holes with my hands. flowers and vines to bring for my gardens. I long for [illegible] to come here to cultivate [illegible] plant vineyards, and make this place a Paradise.

As a sample of the way things are managed here I used only to tell you that there is plenty of broom corn raised, but not a broom made in Palestine.

We might as well have no opportunity as not to use the one that we have. —Jos. French.

THE RESTITUTION.

S. A. UNDERWOOD, EDITOR.

Plymouth, Indiana, Apr. 26, 1883.

BR. DRENNEN was called home to attend to some important matters, and therefore, did not fill his appointment at Hamlet.

BR. H. HEYES has sent us a number of late London papers with articles of interest marked, which we will arrange and place before our readers shortly. We hereby extend our sincere thanks to Brother Heyes.

WE have received a neat little tract from Br. O. R. L. Crozier, entitled "Material Immortality." It is a clear and compact defense of the Bible view of this important doctrine, showing that immortality is not by birth, but by grace. Price 10c. Sold by the author at Ann Arbor, Mich.

BR. LEVI MARSH, of Belle Plaine Iowa, writes: "If your paper was made up of short and pointed articles, such as come from the pens of Brother and Sister Wince, and Brother and Sister Reed, it would be read with more interest. Five or six column articles are seldom read by laboring people at this season of the year." Will our correspondents please make a note of this.

BE YE ALSO READY.

The Heavenly Bridegroom is soon coming. Are we ready for his appearance? Do we sufficiently realize that the Heavenly Bridegroom must have a Heavenly Bride? There must be a perfect correspondence in character and in nature. What are our characters and dispositions when compared with the spotless holiness of the Son of God? Unless Christianity become a living power within us, forming within our inmost hearts the secret mysteries of the Divine Life, a mere outward profession will be unavailing. Enter into his glory, and see him as he is, we must be like him. An artist may appear exceedingly but the artist's colors can the fragrant incense of the only flower.

Yea, they will yet be to the Lord a name of joy, a praise and an honor before all the nations of the earth, which shall hear all the good that I do unto them, and they shall fear and tremble for all the goodness and for all the prosperity that I procure unto it. "For thus saith the Lord like as I have brought all this great evil upon this people, so will I bring upon them all the good that I have promised them." "And their seed shall be known among the Gentiles and their offspring among the people: all that see them shall acknowledge them, that they are the seed which the Lord hath blessed." "Thus saith the Lord, I will sanctify my great name, which was profaned among the nations, which ye have profaned in the midst of them; and the nations shall know that I am the Lord, saith the Lord God, when I shall be sanctified before their eyes." Read Ezek. xxxvi.

"My tabernacle also shall be with them: yea I will be their God, and they shall be my people. And the nations shall know that I the Lord do sanctify Israel, when my sanctuary shall be in the midst of them forevermore."

Thus through God's wonderful dealings toward Israel in the future will the magnify himself and sanctify himself; and I will be known in the eyes of many nations, and they shall know that I am the Lord."

From the very fact that Israel still lives, a standing miracle among the nations—must be suggestive to the thinking mind, that God must have a purpose concerning them; and the sure word of prophecy reveals that purpose to us. In the Scriptures already quoted, we have learned to some extent their future position, in that day when their blindness will have been taken away, and their light have come, and the glory of the Lord will have risen upon them—when the nations will come to their light and kings to the brightness of their rising." "The Lord shall arise upon thee." "Thy sun shall no more go down, neither shall thy moon withdraw itself, (the sun represents the king in Israel; the sun is our greatest light: a righteous king is the greatest light in the nation), for the Lord shall be thine everlasting light and the days of thy mourning shall be ended. Thy people also shall be all righteous. They shall inherit the land forever, the branch of my planting, the work of my hand; that I may be glorified. A little one shall become a thousand, and a small one a strong nation. I the Lord will hasten it in its own time." Isa. lx. Read the whole chapter.

Paul's testimony concerning Israel's future is in perfect harmony with the prophets. Read Rom. xi. Their fulness will yet enrich the world. When the dew of divine influence has revived them, they shall themselves become as a renovating dew to the nations—channels through which those covenanted blessings shall flow to the ends of the earth.

"I will be as the dew unto Israel; he shall grow as the lily, and cast forth his roots as Lebanon." Read Hosea chap. xiv.

The natural branches are cut off from their own olive tree, and destined in the counsels of God to be again grafted in, and to partake of the sap and fatness of their native stock.

"Hear the word of the Lord, O ye nations, and declare it in the isles afar off, and say, he that scattered Israel will gather him and keep him as a shepherd doth his flock." "They are still beloved for the Father's sake." God will not break his covenant with them, in eventually taking away their sins. "He will put his law in their inward parts, and write it in their hearts; and will be their God and they will be his people, and they shall teach no more every man his neighbor, and every man his brother; saying, know the Lord? for they shall all know me from the least of them to the greatest of them, saith the Lord; for I will forgive their iniquity, and I will remember their sins no more."

The simple contemplation of the fact that the seed of Jacob, after centuries of dispersion, oppression, reproaches and misery, are, in exact accordance to the prophetic testimony—brought again to their own borders, and invested with pre-eminent dignities and favors, will of itself exert a moral influence such as we can now but inadequately conceive.

Infidelity will be silenced forever, and the world struck dumb through the occurrence of a visual God manifestation before their eyes. The same predictions which secure the return of the Jews to the land of their fathers, and their conversion to the faith of Christ, contain also the intimation that they shall zealously assume the work of propagating the knowledge of that Messiah whom they have been so tardy in confessing. Provoked to a holy jealousy by the prior labors of the Gentiles in their behalf, and moved by the zeal of men who have been called into the vineyard at the eleventh hour, they will rush upon the work of the world's evangelization with the glowing ardor of those "living creatures," those cherubic ministers, who "ran and returned as the appearance of a flash of lightning."

"And I will set a sign among them, and I will send those that escape of them unto the nations—to the isles afar off that have not heard my fame, neither have seen my glory among the Gentiles."

God will first make his name known to Israel and through Israel to the nations. "According to the days of thy coming out of the land of Egypt will I show unto him (Israel) marvelous things. The nations shall see and be confounded at all their might . . they shall be afraid of the Lord our God and shall fear because of thee. The nations shall share with Israel in the effects of those wonderful displays of God's power. What a flood of light will then be poured upon their minds, when the veil of blindness is removed. To their astonishment they will find themselves restored in exact accordance with their own prophecies, which, notwithstanding they had had them for ages in their hands, they had never hitherto fully understood. The memory of their past ingratitude and stubborn unbelief, will chasten the consciousness of their present experience of the divine compassion, preventing an unhallowed elation of spirit. Having much forgiven they will love much, and true love cannot but be very humble.

The removal then, of the mystic veil from the eyes of the Jews is the signal of a similar event to other nations (for at present there is a veil over all nations) who shall receive a glorious illumination from the accomplishment of the prophetic destinies of Israel. The prophetic student can trace God's dealings with Israel in past ages; with few exceptions they have been a stubborn rebellious people.

"Be astonished, O ye heavens, at this, and let your hair stand at an end; be greatly terrified, saith the Lord. For my people have committed two evils; they have forsaken me the fountain of living waters, and hewed them out cisterns, that can hold no water." "God has visited their transgressions with the rod, and their iniquity with stripes." Nevertheless, (O, blessed promise!) my loving kindness I will not utterly take from him, nor suffer my faithfulness to fail. My covenant will I not break nor alter the thing that is gone out of my lips. God is faithful who has promised.

Christ, God's anointed King of the Jews, who is the first and last in all the divine counsels and operations, must be constantly kept in view, in our enquiry respecting the future destiny of the Jewish nation, and the rank it shall have in the kingdom of God. Christ is pre-eminently the seed through whom blessing is to come; he is the root, in whom the virtue of this promise inheres, and from whom it is to shoot forth; and the house of Israel are to be made a blessing unto all nations solely because of the child born, the son given unto it, upon whose shoulder the government shall be, and of the increase of whose government and peace there shall be no end, upon the throne of his father David.

Israel was constituted into a nation—the womb—out of which the King should be born, and therefore does it stand to him in a closer relation than any other. Israel was the chosen nation, and had given to it the nobler work to make ready the way of the Lord, and to furnish him a birth place when he should be introduced to the world. Therefore are they dearer to him as his kinsmen according to the flesh, than the other kindreds of men.

The brief survey we have taken of the great purposes of God toward our race, shows us the standing which the Jewish nation shall have in the kingdom. They shall be the eldest servant in the household of the King, having the precedency of all nations, and honored to convey to all his statutes and his judgments.

The extraordinary and pre-eminent position which will once more be assigned to the natural seed of Abraham will only be realized in the new dispensation which the glorious advent of the Lord will introduce. He is the head under which the economy of human affairs will ultimately be established. All hope then, of establishing enduring peace and blessedness in the earth depends on the lifting up of the Jews into their true place. While they are outcasts the world will ever be tempest-tossed.

It is in Abraham's seed that all the nations of the earth are to be blessed, and every scheme of the millennium, which does not include them as the metropolitan nation, is an utter chimera. The work that God has been doing for the past eighteen centuries, has not been designed for the immediate blessing of all the families of the earth, nor for the fulfillment of the especial promises to the Jewish people, but for the taking out from among the nations a people for the name of Jehovah—an election of favor—constituents of that one name which is above every name—the Church which is his body, the fullness of Him that fill eth all in all. If we can understand what it is to compose the fullness of the Christ, we can understand something of that higher plane to which we are invited under the present dispensation.

By a contemplation of the human frame, we get an idea of that close relationship, that oneness, that exists between Christ as the Head and the Church, which are the many members which compose his body.

"Now ye are the body of Christ and members in particular." "For as we have many members in one body, and all members have not the same office, so we being many, are one body in Christ, and every one members one of another." These Scriptures, with others that might be quoted, go to show Christ's inheritance in the saints, and our inheritance in him.

To be the body of Christ, the fullness of him that filleth all in all, is a standing, beyond which imagination can conceive nothing; for it involves absolute oneness with the glorious head of creation, and through him with the invisible Godhead. The inheritance of the church in the age to come, her position in the kingdom, will be joint heirship with him, who is heir of all things. As the queen participates in the regal dominion and glory of her lord, so shall the wife of the Lamb share with him in that authority and power, which is to be exercised through the range of the whole creation.

Through Christ God will govern and bless all the works of his hands, and it is the high, the transcendent prerogative of the church, shared by no other creature, to sit with him on his throne. She shall be as distinct from all others as the Temple in Jerusalem was distinct from all the dwellings of Judah: as the body of a man is distinct from the multitudes around him, to whom, nevertheless, he may be closely bound; as the bride is distinct from the attendants at her nuptials, and the household over which she may preside.

After all that can be [illegible] doth not yet appear what we shall be, but we know that when the saints of God are manifested in their resurrection glory—that they will be actual possessors of the divine nature (physically), a nature equal to angels.

In these ages to come it will more clearly be seen, the exceeding riches of God's favor in his kindness toward us, through Christ Jesus. Let us then hold fast the confidence and the rejoicing of the hope firm unto the end, for it hath great recompenses of reward. Patience on our part is needed at present. "For ye have need of patience, that, after ye have done the will of God ye might receive the promise. For yet a little while, and he that shall come will come and will not tarry."

We love the natural descendants of Abraham because they are beloved of God for the Father's sake. The privileges of the gospel dispensation were first offered to them, as the chosen and favored nation; but they rejected their king, and for their hardness of heart (though he had a purpose to accomplish by it) God turned to the Gentiles from among whom his church has been chiefly taken.

The Jew has the promise of the everlasting possession of the land of Canaan, and of supremacy over all nations. The Bride has the promise of reigning with Christ in the glory of the New Jerusalem, and of inheriting all things. The hope of Israel was national pre-eminence under Christ, and therefore, while he should be gathering his bride, his spiritual election, they were cast off for their blindness, not utterly to perish, but to be preserved through trials and sufferings almost inconceivable, till the present dispensation should be completed, and the Lord should return to give them their inheritance.

As concerning the gospel they are enemies for our sakes; but as touching the election they are beloved for the Father's sake. For the gifts and calling of God are without change of purpose in him. For as ye in times past have not believed God, yet have now obtained mercy through their unbelief; even so have these also now not believed, that through your mercy they also may obtain mercy.

O, the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! how unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out! For who hath known the mind of the Lord, or who hath been his counsellor? or who hath first given to him and it shall be recompensed to him again? For of him, and through him, and to him, are all things, to whom be glory forever. Amen.

Youths' Column.

Day by Day the Manna Fell.

Day by day the manna fell;
O, to learn this lesson well!
Still by constant mercy fed,
Still supplied with daily bread.

Day by day the promise reads:
Daily strength for daily needs;
Cast forbidding fears away;
Take the manna of today.

Lord, we thank thee for thy word;
All thy gracious promises have proved
To my comfort, I pray;
And we will make thy paths our choice.

Thus my daily task shall show
Day by day to thee I live;
So shall added years be filled,
And new strength, my days renewed.

Every morning, when I greet
Happy as I gladly do,
All I have to-day is new,
Except what I've used.

By the mercy of prayer,

The Sunday Stone.

There is a wonderful stone in a coal mine in England called the "Sunday Stone," and this is the way it gets its name:

There is limestone in the mine, and the water that is always trickling down carries with it this limestone, and all along the bottom of the pit it is continually making a layer of white, which, little by little, hardens into stone. But when the miners are at work, and the coal dust is flying about, it mixes with limestone, and a black layer is formed. Day and night are clearly shown by the black and white layers, and Sunday is marked by a white layer three times the usual width. So that when a section is dug through at the bottom of the mine, the days of the week can be traced, and the "Sunday Stone" is plainly seen.

Character.

"Many people seem to forget that character grows: that it is not something to put on ready-made with womanhood; but day by day, here a little and there a little, grows with the growth, and strengthens with the strength, until, good or bad, it becomes almost a coat-of-mail. Look at a man of business—prompt, reliable, conscientious, yet clear-headed and energetic. When do you suppose he developed all these admirable qualities? When he was a boy? Let us see how a boy of ten years gets up in the morning, works, plays, studies, and we will tell you just what kind of a man he will make. The boy that is late to breakfast, late at school, stands a poor chance of being a prompt man. The boy who neglects his duties, be they ever so small, and then excuses himself by saying, "I forgot! I didn't think!" will never be a reliable man. And the boy who finds pleasure in the sufferings of weaker things will never be a noble, generous, kind man—a gentleman.—Christian.

Dear Children:

Though it is some little time since I last wrote to you I have not forgotten you. I often, very often think of you, and think how much I should like to see you, and learn how many of you are trying to do right. I could not tell even if I did see you, but there is a Being who knows each one, and reads your hearts. You might deceive friends or kindred, but you cannot hide from God the most secret thought. He loves all the good and will cause them to live eternally in blessedness. He hates the evil, the wicked, and will utterly destroy them from off the earth.

Children, did you ever think of the wonderful difference between the little words—Now and Then? They are both the same part of speech. Now is the shortest word, so also is the period of time it represents. Let us paint a little pen picture.

Now our brightest joys are clouded by sadness, our cup of purest, sweetest pleasure, has little dregs of sorrow. The brightest day may become dark and cloudy—the calmest night may be disturbed by the sweeping tornado. Friends who seem to us dear, as our own very existence are taken into death's cold embrace and all our efforts are vain to save them—the most beautiful and fragrant flowers fade and die in few days. The choicest fruits so often have worms at the core. The greenest fields, the coolest shades, become sere and desolate and the cold of winter—the clearest streams and bubbling fountains are changed to muddy waters when the rain gushes down the hillsides carrying all before it. The calm unruffled bosom of the ocean changes to mountain waves when smitten by the storm, and the stately ships with hundreds of human beings are in a moment sunk beneath its waves.

Now everything is marked with the curse which has rested on all the earth since our first parents disobeyed God's command and ate of the tree of knowledge of good and evil. Since then we have thorns, and thistles, poisonous herbs, fierce animals, noxious insects, excessive cold, scorching heat, floods, drought, tornadoes, cyclones, war, famine, pestilence, and all the terrible evils resulting from these which are all the result of sin.

This truly is a dark picture, yet it is seen all over the world, in every country in every clime.

The picture of Then is much more beautiful and pleasing. Look at it.

The curse removed forever, no more death, no more sorrow nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain. No more thorns or Cisthes, no more fierce animals for the wolf and the lamb shall lie down together. No more noxious insects, for the child shall play upon the hole of the asp. No more war, for they shall learn war no more. No more sickness, for the leaves of the tree of life shall be for the healing of the nations. No more crying, for God shall wipe all tears from their eyes. No more shall the pearl gates open as the year for the week shall pass at the earth. No more shall presidents be assassinated and cause the land to mourn, for over all the whole earth there shall be one Lord and his name one. That Lord will be our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ. He will be King over all the earth and he will reign in righteousness, and appoint those who have served and obeyed him in this age to assist him in ruling the nations.

Dear children, Then is the brightest picture is it not? I will try to gain it. Will not you?

Yours looking for the Savior.

AUNT CARRIE.

RAGE AMONG IN BURMAH.

CALCUTTA, April 20.—Political massacres have recommenced in Mandalay. King Theebaw has put to death an inferior wife, two half sisters, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and fifty of their relatives.

PERSECUTING THE JEWS.

VIENNA, April 20.—The Anzeiger Zeitung publishes an account received from the frontier which says that the troops, petitions to the radical of the Governor of Podolia at Baltz, aided in plundering instead of protecting the Jews there. Forty persons were seriously injured during the progress of the riots, some of whom have since died. Fully a thousand houses were destroyed, and the damage is estimated at 4,000,000 roubles.

THE MISSOURI CYCLONE.

ST. LOUIS, April 20.—The total loss at Brownsville is estimated at $150,000. The Mayor has issued an appeal for aid for the sufferers. Two of the children injured at Montrose have died. No new facts have been developed there. Eighteen dwellings and four churches are in ruins. No damage was done at Appleton. Residents of farm houses two miles west of that place were destroyed. Calhoun, Lewis, Clinton, Holden and Brownsville were in the track of the hurricane, and all suffered more or less.

KANSAS CITY, Mo., April 20—Eleven persons have died from the effects of the cyclone at Brownsville. Those dying since yesterday are Mrs. Lee, William Parsons and James Dirke.

It is a season of tornadoes. Wednesday's hurricane in Fayette County, Pennsylvania, was succeeded by another in the same State the next day, which uprooted trees and demolished dwellings. A few days before there had been a tornado in Missouri, which killed many people and did more damage than any since 1878. Just before that Wisconsin, Michigan and other Northwestern States were ravaged by a series of hurricanes, with frightful havoc to life and property.

The Pennsylvania tornado of Wednesday evening was as terrific and destructive as that which struck Missouri the evening before. The northern portion of Fayette county, was the chief scene of the disaster in Pennsylvania. The loss of property destroyed at Mount Pleasant, Ponnville, and the rural districts of that county is estimated at over $100,000, and, as far as heard from, three persons were killed and several seriously injured. The loss of life at Brownsville, Mo., by Tuesday's cyclone, is ten, and of property, $250,000. The village is literally in ruins.

THE MYSTERIOUS STREAM OF LIGHT.

At 1 o'clock Wednesday morning a long, bright stream of light, like a comet's tail, extending along the ecliptic from the east for 40 or 50 degrees. There were no indications of an aurora in any quarter of the heavens. This bright light appeared fixed in one position, pointing almost directly to the point of sunrise. Many observers believed it to be the tail of an enormous comet. It may prove to be so, and might have so nearly brushed the earth as to create the tremendous electric disturbance of Sunday night. The head was invisible below the eastern horizon at 1 o'clock. It seems that travelers on a late train to the East saw the head after it had risen. The comet is of immense size, if it is a comet at all.

PERSONS STRIKE DEAD.

MONTREAL, April 23.—In answer to letters from all parts of the United States asking for the distribution of the recent alarm, Professor Vennor, the Canadian weather prophet, says: "The approaching summer will be cold and wet over a very considerable portion of the South and West." He would not be surprised should such result for the remainder of the year being frosts. In past years, brilliant auroras at the time in April at Toronto, New York and most southern points, have almost invariably been succeeded by cold and wet summers.

THE RAPTURE.

My thought is of a day, just such as any other, when, as the twilight spreads, there rise and float above the land of Palestine rich clouds that linger in the light of [illegible]. All sinks the glow and sunset colors into starry night. The heavens are flecked with clouds that gather upward till the stars are hidden; while the meridian, onward, ever onward, bears unbroken the zenith—touches—and then the hush of night is broken—broken by the voice of the archangel, and the sound of a silver trumpet. Soft, and yet clear, the melody is heard; but heard by only faithful listening ears. Are many such within Immanuel's land, whose thrilling hearts cry out, "Messiah comes!"

Low-lying in the dust the myriads hear, and these at once respond; uprising from the tomb, and wending, like a stream of vivid light, their way to pierce the skies. And swiftly onward moves the midnight hour, its mystic shadows cast o'er land and sea; and still, from grassy graves and ocean's wastes, the wakening dead arise, and join the glorious throng. It passes over homes where living saints are waiting, "watching for the Lord." These are the longing, loving ones; and they are changed and caught away. And thus from our silent earth, where heedless slumberers forgetful lie, amid the cooler lights and sombre shadows deep, the solemn hour glides on, and gathers as it goes. At length its course is done. Jerusalem again beneath the zenith lies; mute darkness reigns awhile; and then another morning breaks upon the earth. But they have gone to be "for ever with the Lord."—Rainbow.

The Princess Maria of Schoa, who was lately married to the Crown Prince of Abyssinia, is claimed to be the direct descendant of the Queen of Sheba, the Schoa dynasty being the most ancient royal house in existence. The Princess wore during the marriage ceremony a golden diadem set with emblems, which is said to have once been the property of Solomon.

TAKE NOTICE.

By an error on the part of our pressman, we have on hand an extra lot of our four-page tracts, and persons wishing tracts to distribute should avail themselves of this opportunity at once. There are are four kinds: "Can you believe," "Age to come not a heresy," "State of man in death," and "Life and death." We will send postpaid 50 copies of these tracts for 20c., or 100 copies for 35c.

We have also just printed a new edition of "A Letter to a Friend," on the covenants of promise, by Mrs. C. C. Woodruff. Single copies 10c., seven for 60c., sixteen for $1.00.

The COVENANTS.

A TREATISE ON,

I. The Abrahamic covenant, its term—its extent, its operation, its contemplators, and when possessed.

II. The Sinaitic covenant, its terms, its relation to the Abrahamic covenant, where given, to whom given, the unity of the Law, its duration and its terminus, the Sabbath and its purports.

III. The New covenant, the covenanters—not the church, but Israelites—dispersed prophecy considered, restoration from Babylon considered, future restoration of Israel as covenanters, our relation to the New covenant—as the Seed of the Abrahamic covenant, as the Mediation body, as a loyal and an Eternal Priesthood—now upon the plane of the flesh and soul, then through the veil upon the plane of spirit: restoration of the Aaronical order of priesthood in the house of Judah under the Prince and subordinate to the royal priesthood; the necessity and the nature of sacrifices in the ages to come.

IV. The Davidian covenant, its terms, the kingdom divided, the kingdom restored, the seat chastised, the kingdom to be restored under Messiah, the reign eternal.

V. Twelve objections to the position, that the kingdom of Christ in organization is yet future, answered, and the law of induction into the kingdom, or the birth of the water and of the spirit.

The work is now in press and will be ready for distribution in June or early in July. It will be about from 300 to 350 pages, and will sell for $1 per copy. We are now receiving names for the work, to be put down in the book delivered. We want reverse-printers, either as your name for the work.

TRANSFORMATION.

We planted the bare brown stems one day.
When the autumn winds blew cold,
And the dying leaves fell mournfully
In their tarnished red and gold.

And you wondered whether they lived at all,
Those stems so brown and bare,
With never a leaf or a bud so small,
To tell us that life was there.

And yet when the spring hath kissed the earth,
And June smiles warm and bright,
Their glory of rose shall wake to birth,
And glow in the summer light.

So we lay them down in their lowly bed,
The dear ones we cherished so,
And sight would tell us that they were dead,
And more we may not know.

But faith looks on to the joyful spring
When she tells us she'll yet be ours,
And the new life's glorious blossoming
Into fair eternal flowers.

Then well may we wait with patience here,
Nor murmur at the chastening rod;
We shall find the lost ones where we build rear,
In the glorious garden of God.

ORIENTAL SKETCHES.—No. 11.

Bashan and its Giant Cities.

J. L. PORTER, A. M.

"And the oak and the pine shake off their fruits."

This text was constantly in my mind while I wandered through Bashan. In riding down from the ruins of Kenath, among the mountains, to the ruins of Suweideh at their base, it struck me that the beautiful words in which Cowper describes modern Sicily, are strikingly descriptive of modern Palestine.

"Alas for Sicily! rude fragments now
Lie scattered where the shapely column stood.
Her palaces are dust. In all her streets
The voice of revelry, and the sprightly chord
Are silent. Revelry, and dance, and show
Suffer a syncope and solemn pause;
While stupid superstition yawns apace
Of his own works his dreadful part alone."

We might begin, "Alas for Palestine!" and go on through the whole passage; for Palestine's palaces are dust, her stately columns fallen, her streets silent, her fields desolate, while God alone performs his dreadful part, fulfilling to the very letter the prophetic curses pronounced upon the land long, long centuries ago.

WONDERFUL FULFILLMENT OF PROPHECY.

We rode along the line of the Roman road, at least as closely as branches of the great old oaks, and jungles of thorns and bushes, would permit; for "the highways lie waste." Isa. xxxiii: 8. Every opening to the right and left revealed ruins;—now a tomb in a quiet nook, now a temple in a lonely forest glade; now a shapeless and nameless heap of stones and fallen columns; and now, through a long green vista, the shattered walls and towers of an ancient city. The country is filled with ruins. In every direction to which the eye turns, in every spot on which it rests, ruins are visible—so truly, so wonderfully have the prophecies been fulfilled: "I will destroy your high places, and bring your sanctuaries unto desolation." Lev. xxvi: 30. "The palaces shall be forsaken." Isa. xxxii: 14. "I will make your cities waste. The land shall be utterly spoiled." Isa. xxiv: 3. Many other ruins doubtless lie concealed among the forests, buried beneath giant oaks, or shrouded by luxuriant brambles. Judging by the "thorns and thistles" which horn in every path, and half conceal every ruin, one would suppose that Bashan had received a double portion of the curse.

The mountains of Bashan, though not generally very steep, are rugged and rocky; yet everywhere on their sides I saw the remains of old terraces—along every slope, up every bank, from the bottom of the deepest glen, where the oleander bends over the tiny streamlet, to the highest peak on which the clouds of heaven sleep, cradled on winter snows. These tell of former toil and industry: and so do the heaps of loose stones that have been collected off the soil and piled up in the corners of the little fields. In the days of Bashan's glory, fig-trees, and olives, and pomegranates, were ranged along those terraces; and vines hung down in rich festoons over their broken walls. But now Bashan has shaken off its fruits. "For a nation is come upon my land, strong and without number. He hath laid my vine waste, and barked my fig-tree; he hath made it clean bare, and cast it away. The field is wasted, the land mourneth, The new vine is dried up, the oil languisheth. The vine is dried up, the fig-tree languisheth; the pomegranate-tree, the palm-tree also, and the apple-tree; even all the trees of the field are withered; because joy is withered away from the sons of men." Joel i. 6-12.

The scenery is still rich. It is rich in the foliage of the evergreen oak—the "oak of Bashan;" rich in numbers of evergreen shrubs; rich in green pastures. It is picturesque too, and occasionally even grand for the glens are deep and winding, and the outlines of the intervening ridges varied with dark cliff and wooded bank. The whole mountain range is of volcanic origin, and the peaks shoot up, conical or cup-shaped, forming long-serried lines. One thing struck me peculiar. The rocks are black, the soil is black, the buildings are all black. It might be thought that the landscape would thus have a gloomy aspect; and it would have, were it not for the fresh green grass of the glades and meadows, and the brilliant foliage of the oak forests, which often glitter beneath the blaze of sunshine like forests of prisms.

I confess that it was with feelings of awe that I looked from time to time out over those desolate, but still beautiful slopes, to that more desolate plain. I knew what caused the desolation. The silence, too, awed me yet more, for it was profound. The voice of nature itself was hushed, and not a leaf in the forest rustled. There is always something cheerful, something reviving to the flagging spirit, in the unceasing murmur of a great city, now rising and now falling on the breeze, as one approaches it or passes by; and in the continuous hum of a rural scene, where the call of the herd, and the whistle of the ploughman, and the roll of the wagon, and the bleatings of the flock, and the lowing of the kine melt into one of nature's choruses. Here cities studded the whole country, but the stillness of death reigned in them; there was no ploughman in the field, no shepherd on the hillside, no flock on the pasture, no wagon, no wayfarer on the road. Yet there was a time when the land teemed with an industrious, a bustling, and a joyous population. At that time prophets wrote: "Your highways shall be desolate" Lev. xxvi. 22. "The wayfaring man ceaseth. The earth mourneth and languisheth" Isa. xxxiii. 8. "The land shall be utterly emptied and utterly spoiled; for the Lord hath spoken this word. Therefore hath the curse devoured the land. Therefore the inhabitants of the land are consumed, and few men left. Every house is shut up. The mirth of the land is gone. In the city is left desolation, and the gate is smitten with destruction." Isa. xxiv. 3-12. Many of the people of those days, doubtless, thought the prophets were but gloomy dreamers. Just as many in our own day regard their writings as gorgeous fancy pictures of Eastern poets; but with my own eyes I saw that time has changed every prediction into a historic fact. I saw now, and I saw at every step through Bashan, that the visions of the prophets were not delusions; that they were not even, as some modern critics suppose, highly wrought figures, intended perhaps to foreshadow in faint outlines few lending facts of the country's future story. I saw that they were one and all, graphic and detailed descriptions of real events, which the Divine Spirit opened up to the prophet's eye through the long vista of ages. The language is, doubtless, beautiful, the style is poetic, and gorgeous Eastern imagery is often employed to give sublimity to the visions of the seer, and to the words of the Lord; but this does not take away one iota from their truth, nor does it detract in the slightest degree from their graphic power. Were the same holy men inspired now by the same Divine Spirit to describe the actual state of Palestine, they could not select language more appropriate or more graphic than that found in their own predictions written thousands of years ago. This is no vague statement made at random, or penned for effect. God forbid I should pen a single line rashly or thoughtlessly on such a topic. It is the result of years of study and years of travel. It is the result of calm and thorough comparison of each prophecy of Scripture regarding Palestine's history and doom with its fulfillment, upon the spot. I had no preconceived theory of prophetic interpretation to defend. My mind was not biased by a false faith in literality on one side, nor by a fatal scepticism regarding prophetic reality on the other. Opportunities were offered me of examining evidence, of testing witnesses, of seeing with my own eyes the truth or the falsehood of Bible predictions. I embraced these opportunities, as God gave them, and to the utmost of my power and the best of my ability. I examined deliberately, cautiously, and, I believe, conscientiously. My examination extended over all Palestine, and over most other Bible lands; and now I thank God that, with the fullest and deepest conviction—conviction that all the ingenuity of modern criticism, and all the plausibility of modern scientific scepticism can never overthrow, could never shake—I can take up and re-echo the grand, the cheering statement of our blessed Lord and proclaim my belief before the world, that "Till heaven and earth pass, one jot or one tittle shall in no wise pass from the law, till all be fulfilled."

I observed around Kenath, and especially in the thickest parts of the forest on the way to Suweideh that many of the largest and finest oak trees were burned almost through near the ground, and that a vast number of huge trunks were lying black and charred among the stones and brushwood. I wondered at what appeared to be a piece of wanton and ruinous destruction, and I asked Mahmood if he could explain it.

"The Bedawin do it," he replied. "They make large quantities of charcoal for the Damascus market, as well as for home use; and that they may get more easily at the branches, which are the only parts of the tree used, they kindle a fire round the roots of the largest oaks, burn them deeply, and then the first blast of wind blows them over, and the boughs are chopped off with little axes."

"But," I said, "in this way they destroy vast quantities of splendid timber."

"True; but they do not care. All they want is a present supply, and they try to get it in the easiest way possible."

"They will soon make your mountains as bare as Jebel esh-Sheikh, and where will you go for firewood and charcoal then? You are fools to permit such needless waste and destruction."

"O my lord!" said Mahmood—and there was a degree of solemnity and pathos both in his tone and in his words—"O my lord! it is you Franks alone who have wisdom to look to the future, and power to provide for it. We! what can we do in this unhappy country? We are all wanderers—here to-day, away to-morrow. Should we attempt to preserve those oaks, or to plant vineyards and olives, or to spend labor and money on fields or houses, we would only be working out our own ruin. The Bedawin would be attracted in clouds round the tempting fruit; and the Turks would come, drive us out with their cannon, and seize our whole property. No, no! We can have no permanent interest in the ground. We can only hold it as we have got it, by the sword; and the power it looks, the less will our enemies covet it."

It was a sad picture, and, unfortunately a true one. By such mad acts, and by still more wanton destruction in times of war, and of party and family struggles, fruit-trees and forests have been almost annihilated in Palestine. And would it not seem as if the old prophets had been able to look down through the mists of long centuries, and to see the progress and effects of this very mode of ruin and desolation, clearly as I saw it in Bashan? Isaiah thus wrote: "The defenced city shall be desolate, and the habitation forsaken and left like a wilderness, there shall the calf feed, and there shall he lie down, and consume the branches thereof. When the boughs thereof are withered they shall be broken off: the women come and set them on fire; for it is a people of no understanding." Isa. xxvii. 10, 11.

Descending from Kenath, I saw, about a mile to the right, the deserted town of Atyl. Burckhardt and one or two others visited it, but I was compelled from want of time to pass it by. It contains some fine buildings, among which are two beautiful temples nearly perfect. One of them was built in the fourteenth year of the Emperor Antonine (A. D. 150), as a Greek inscription tells us. Like Kenath, this city was in a great measure rebuilt during the Roman age, and consequently there are not many of the very ancient massive houses now remaining. Further down on the plain I saw Rimeh and Welgha, two deserted towns. Every view we got of Bashan was an ocular demonstration of the literal fulfillment of the curse pronounced upon the land by Moses, more than three thousand years ago: "If ye will not hearken unto me, and will not do all these commandments.... I will scatter you among the heathen; and your land shall be desolate, and your cities waste." Lev. xxvi. 14, 33.

By request of a friend I send you the following letter which I wrote Elder Goode, pastor of the Christian Church of this city, after hearing the discourse on the "Millennium." Seeing his announcement in the morning paper I felt a desire to know what views one of the leaders in that denomination would present on that subject. If he presented anything definite I failed utterly to see the point. In the first place he denounced millenarianism—as he viewed it—attempted to prove a day of judgment—a general resurrection of all the dead at the same time—that the righteous would be rewarded in heaven, etc. That the second resurrection might mean the resurrection, as reliving of the spirit of the martyrs, etc., and closed as I intimate in the letter. With sincere regret I realized as I sat listening, that those denominations have teachers to blind the eyes of their understanding, so that it is hard indeed for them to see the way of life.

CARRIE WILLIAMS.

Elder Goode:

SIR:—I listened to your discourse of last evening, Feb. 5, 1882, with profound interest, because the subject on which you spoke, is one on which my thoughts are prone to dwell; as I fully believe it to be a theme worthy of our most earnest study—since by the word of inspiration we learn that those who have made a just preparation i. e. believed and obeyed the gospel will be made partakers of all the glories which that soon coming age will reveal.

I would not presume to address you but for one sentiment expressed in your closing remarks. I may not give the words, I will give the idea. "Such is my present theory. But if I get more light I may change my views."

Now, in my own strength I can do nothing. But God grant, that in his strength and by his word; I may be enabled to "show unto you a more excellent way." The time is short in which we have to work for the Master. The longest life is but a span. The best way to expose error is to place it in juxtaposition with truth, and then to each side bring forth the strongest evidence and see which obtains the burden of proof.

You said that in Rev. xx. alone was the thousand years mentioned. True, that is the only place where the time is specified, but both the Old and New Testaments teem with evidence of the reign of Christ on this very terra firma, and I ask you in the name of Christ and in his spirit to bear patiently with me in my weakness while I endeavor to point you to those glorious truths of Divine revelation which as far outshine the vagaries of orthodoxy as does the glorious orb of day outshine the faintest star in the blue vault of heaven.

When the Creator in infinite wisdom formed man of the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life he gave him the earth as his habitation, and in looking over what he had made, he pronounced it "very good." Through transgression man fell from that holy estate, and thereby brought this earth and its inhabitants, sin and misery, from which all have been suffering for these thousands of years, as one generation after another are laid in the dust.

Adam lost his first opportunity of obtaining immortality by not partaking of the tree of life while yet he was in a sinless state. When by taking of the tree of knowledge he become a sinner, God in boundless mercy prevented his access to the tree of life. What for? Lest he should eat and live forever. How? In the sinful state into which he had fallen. Here all was darkness and despair. But Infinite wisdom will not permit his plans in regard to our race to be frustrated. In Gen. iii. 15, we have the first ray of hope that gleams through the darkness. The seed here mentioned, all admit, is the Christ the Savior of the world; who brought life and immortality to light through the gospel.

In Psa. cxxxii. 15, we see that the promised seed was to come through David's line, the chosen king of God's people Israel, also Isa. vii. 14, and these prophecies are verified. Matt. i. 18-25. In Luke i. 28-35 we are very plainly told of what line the promised seed come. In verses 31 and 32 we see three distinct assertions or promises made to Mary. The first two of those promises all accept as facts already proved; but the third because a little in the future they appropriate into a vague uncertainty and talk of a kingdom being set up in the heart, which idea is wholly and entirely anti-Bible, having not a shadow of proof between the sacred lids. But we have all necessary proof that the third promise made to Mary will be as literally fulfilled as were the first two.

The Lord God will give unto him the throne of his father David. This will yet be fulfilled, for most assuredly it never has been, and all of God's promises are yea and amen.

Christ came as the king of the Jews, he was tried before Pilate for this his only offence—the voice of the people prevailed—he was condemned to be crucified, and yet that the truth might be known, over his head on the cross was written in three languages that all might read, "This is Jesus the King of the Jews." The thief who recognized him as that king will without doubt be remembered when he comes in his kingdom, for Christ then, or on that day, told him he would remember him.

Christ says in Luke iv. 43, that he must preach the kingdom of God in other cities also, "For therefore am I sent.... For forty days after his resurrection he went in and out with his disciples teaching them the things concerning the kingdom of God."

In Matt. xix. 27, Peter asks what they who have forsaken all and followed their Master shall have. Jesus plainly tells them that, in the regeneration when the Son of Man shall sit upon the throne of his glory, they also shall sit upon twelve thrones judging the twelves tribes of Israel.

In Dan. vii. 13, 14, 27, One like the Son of Man is seen coming in the clouds of heaven, and to him is given dominion and a kingdom that all peoples, nations and languages should serve and obey him. In verse 27 we read that the kingdom and dominion and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High, etc.

Thus we see from these few texts, and they are but a mere fraction of what might be adduced, that—

1. That Christ comes the second time to reign on the throne of his father David in Jerusalem, according to all the prophecies. See Zech. xiv. 4-21, and others from those.

2. That the saints shall reign with him over the nations upon earth (the saints shall judge the world). 1 Cor. vi. 2.

3. That the earth will abide forever—that the oath God swore unto Abraham (Gen. xii. 1-3) may be verified. See also Gen xiii. 14, 15, 17, and Acts vii. 5.

4. Man was given possession of the earth (but never promised heaven) and lost it through sin. Christ redeemed it or bought it back by the sacrifice of himself. It will be his and his saints' everlasting inheritance, when the wicked are cut off Psa. xxxviii. 9, 11, 20, 22, 25, 34.

I cannot now detain you to give proof of the first and second resurrection though they are clearly taught in the Word, the first at the beginning of the Millennium and the second at its close.

There is no such idea in the Bible as a spiritual resurrection being the first. Blessed and holy is he that has part in the first resurrection (showing clearly that there is a second) on such the second death hath no power.

The final close of all evil is that death and hell, or the grave, are cast into the lake of fire. This is the second death, which all shall suffer whose names are not written in the Lamb's book of life. Then—glorious thought! There will be no more pain, etc. All that are left in existence will join in the grand chorus of glory to God.

Let us search the Scriptures for they alone are able to make us wise unto salvation.

Hoping you will read this in the spirit in which it is written I must close, though I realize that I have been too brief to be explicit as I could wish, but these proofs lead to others.

Pardon the intrusion on your time.

HEALDSBURG, Cal.

Editor Restitution:

As I have not written for THE RESTITUTION for some time past, I will now attempt a short letter. On this coast so far as my knowledge extends there are a goodly number of professors of Christianity, of the various denominations. On the part of the preachers there is one almost universal complaint that they can no longer induce the members to regularly attend service, that but few outsiders enter an appearance that the results are but few conversions, and most of them are reconversions, or warming over; but little money comes into the treasury for the clergy, therefore the festivals, fairs, sociables and various kinds of amusements are, they say, necessarily resorted to in order to raise funds from the fun-loving portion of the community, to keep the churches going, or better, say to keep the preachers alive.

To my mind there must be some good and valid reasons why thinking men and women stay away from religious meetings. I will venture a few suggestions:

First then, most people see, or think they do, that the churches have become proud, that the preachers are troubled in the same way, and are all the time calling for more money. The contribution boxes are sometimes used both at the morning and evening services; and amid all the persuasion on the part of the pastors the contributions are exceedingly light, and the church officials scold the people because they do not contribute more liberally to keep up the Lord's cause. Many have concluded that but little of their money is used in promulgating the gospel, but on the other hand is used to garnish the meeting houses, buy the clothes, etc., and that the majority of the sermons read to them are old sentiments which they have heard so often that they have become stale, and that there is but little gospel in them. The people further say that most of the churches are so clannish that they will not fraternize with other and neighbor churches; that the members love fun and indulge in sinful exercises as much as the world does, and that they propose to use their money where it seems to them will do more good than giving to the churches. That when the church invites them to attend one of its parties to raise money, where there will be amusement, they go and pay just upon the same principle they would attend a show or any other place of amusement, for the fun they would get out of it.

This is a plain way of putting the matter. There is no use trying to cover up the fact that the churches have become covetous. I do not mean to say that all the members are so, but those who control the operations. How often ministers who desire to be employed to take charge of a congregation, will announce the terms upon which their services can be had, stating at the same time if you do not give me that sum, you may go without preaching. Is that making merchandise of the gospel?

In the Scriptures there is no precedent for such a course. During last winter and this spring three efforts have been made in Healdsburg to get a revival started up for the conversion (it is said) of immortal souls. But they all proved a failure after several weeks of untiring effort, as but few could be induced to attend and participate, and the last one culminated in prosecuting some young men for presuming to whisper to each other while the preacher was speaking. The prosecution did not amount to much, but a feeling of contempt for those engaged in the prosecution was so pronounced that the meeting closed. There are thousands of people on this coast who would go to church if they thought they could hear the Scriptures truthfully presented, where a money basis does not exhibit itself prominently. People are generally willing to give something to a man whom they believe is earnestly preaching for the good of the hearers.

These sentiments are so indelibly fastened upon the popular churches and the people, that there is little hope for any change—only for the worse. "Evil men and seducers shall wax worse and worse deceiving and being deceived." The only thing I see to be done is, to present the good news concerning the kingdom of God, and those things which relate to Jesus Christ, calling especial attention to God's exhibition of love for an erring race, and from the Scriptures teaching men the conditions of salvation, and showing clearly what that salvation is—that is, God's plan of saving men from their sins which are past, and finally saving them from the second death; giving the saved ones immortality and eternal life, with a position in the kingdom of God.

Oh! that we may all find our way through this terrible dark time, by being led by the light God has sent into the world, and that whether sleeping or awake at the coming of the Lord, we may be found of him in peace. To thus succeed we must not only put on the armor but we must wear it, and fight valiantly using the sword of the spirit, which is the word of God. In hope,

RICHARD CORNALBY.

I have not forgotten you because I have not written. Neither is it because I have not appreciated your labors. You editors always are rejoiced to have expressions of sympathy and approval from your subscribers, therefore I take this opportunity of doing so. I am much pleased with the management of THE RESTITUTION, love to peruse its pages, and miss its accustomed visits whenever it is delayed. I wish it was enlarged to double its present size and was self-supporting. We would not get many more subjects than we now do, for I believe that none go away without a hearing; but we could have very much more on the subjects presented and still have the accustomed and necessary place for the practical articles. Nothing will avail us without a thorough practical life that is in accord with the commandments of the gospel. And it seems to me that the time for forming such a character as is required to fill those exalted positions is short—that the time for the gathering of the first fruits is nearly at hand. On this subject of time I have great confidence in the Pyramid revelations. I believe the anti-typical year of Lev. xxiii. is built as it were in it, and that not only the offering of the first fruits in mankind, but the 13th and 15th days of the month, as distinctly marked. Time will tell whether I am right or not. I am of the opinion with Brother Cologrove that the advent of Christ will not be marked by any great political demonstration or otherwise, though some demonstration may approximate to the time. We have no reason to suppose that any demonstration occurred to mark the translation of Enoch, nor the coming of Moses, though something soon followed, nor at the birth of Christ; all types of that event for which we long and pray.

May we all be found at our posts of duty is the prayer of your brother in hope.

In Bethlehem, Palestine, two English ladies have a girls' school with more than thirty pupils.

Mr. Laurence Oliphant, whose disinterested labors for the promotion of the restoration of the Jews to Palestine, have been untiring, is entrusted by the English committee formed to assist the Jewish refugees from Russia, with $50,000 for their benefit. He has personally proceeded to Austria, where many Jews have taken temporary refuge, and intends aiding such of them as are willing to settle in Palestine to remove thither.

A foreign letter states that the Buddhist dignitaries of Japan have taken alarm at the spread of Christianity, and the consequent decline of Buddhism among all classes of their countrymen. They have accordingly dispatched Virtabake, a dignitary of high rank, to India to inquire into the present condition of Buddhism in that country. He will then visit Germany and England to study what influence the religions of these countries have upon their own Governments and people. He is accompanied by two interpreters, and travels under the protection of the Japanese Foreign Office.

Ahmed Tewfick Effendi, who was condemned to death for helping the missionary translate the English prayer book, and whose death-sentence, at Sir H. He was in the very front rank of the Turkish hierarchy in learning and reputation. Will not all our readers pray earnestly that like the apostle Paul, he may increase the more in strength, and prove to be a chosen vessel to bear the name of Christ, by voice or pen, to the followers of the false prophet?"—Missionary Review.

THE HANGING GARDENS OF BABYLON.

Nitocris, the spouse of Nebuchadnezzar, is described by M. Baudrillart, as the soul of his works, and to her is attributed the design of the lake named after her, which served the purpose of a fortification and a dam against the Euphrates when in flood. The famous hanging gardens are also attributed to female influence, to the longing of a Median Princess, born in a more elevated region, for the coolness and shade of her native mountains. There were five of these gardens, about four English acres each, on terraces supported by columns and covered with mold thick enough for the largest tree to take root in it. One of the columns was hollow, and contained an hydraulic machine to raise the required quantity of water. In fact, the art of gardening, with all its modern appliances, including irrigation and the transplantation of grown trees, was practiced in Babylon as effectively as in the Bois de Boulogne or Hyde Park. —Quarterly Review.

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

I will be at King's Corner Saturday before third Sunday in May, to continue over Sunday, as Brother Thurman may arrange.

J. F. WAGONER.

The Annual Conference of the State of Michigan will be held at Watson Corner, Allegan county, Mich., commencing June 1, and lasting over the following Sunday. Those coming by rail from the north or south on the Grand Rapids and Indiana Railroad will stop at Monteith, and take the Allegan division to Fisk's Crossing, three miles from Monteith, where ample provision will be made for all that shall come. A general attendance is desired at this meeting as we expect this to be the best Conference ever held in Michigan. Let all come praying the Lord's blessing to be with the meeting. Able ministers will be in attendance to preach the word.

A JEWISH LEGEND.

MRS. LYDIA A. DIGGS.

When that first passover drew near,
Which darkened Egypt's land with fear,
A young and gentle Hebrew maid,
Was on a bed of sickness laid,
And to her fair and fevered brain
An anxious thought gave added pain:

At last in restless tones she cried,
O father! is the blood applied
Upon the door and lintel high,
That bids the angel pass me by?
I am the eldest born, you know,
Oh me would fail the faint blood."

They tried to soothe her troubled mind,
With the assurance that she sought;
And one with very tender fit,
To calm and ease her frightened heart,
But still her cry came like a prayer,
"Is...are you sure the blood is there?"

Her father lift...d her at last
And bore the threshold with a tremor,
Fear...he himself the door might shut
On blood was there! Her fears were vain!
The midnight hour...e passing by,
And Death's stern messenger drew nigh.

"Bring me the blood!" the sick girl cried,
Her...ribbish voice rang sharp with dread.
They brought it at her quick command—
She dipped in it her fair white hand,
And stroked the lintels...d the door,
Just as the angel passed before.

A moment there he...doubt he stood,
And looked upon the sprinkled blood.
Then passed along his death-mark'd way,
While safe, though weak, the maiden lay.
It closely to her father's breast
And smiled her thanks for peace and rest.

O careless children of to-day!
How many of you all can say,
You know the saving blood is there:
How many strive in anxious prayer,
Till doubt and fear and deep distress
Give place to peace and blessedness.

THE LORD'S SUPPER, OR MEMORIAL SUPPER.

Dear Brother and Sister in Christ:

It is with pleasure that I attempt to reply to your letters. And for the benefit of the many I will answer it through THE RESTITUTION, instead of writing directly to you. I have many theological questions, and expositions of passages of Scripture to answer and give privately, and they may or they may not benefit the multitudes. As to the yearly observance of this God's authorized institution, it has nothing in the Living Oracles, or the history of the apostolic church, to prove its truthfulness.

The object of the supper is not to test our fellowship with each other; but to keep before our mind the fact that Jesus literally died for the elect, the sheep, the family of God. 1 Cor. xi. 26; John x. 15; 1 Cor. xv. 3; Isa. liii. 8. Hence we have all the solemnity of the cross thrown around this Divine institution. What an hour! Jesus in the agony of death, bleeding, groaning, dying! No mother to wipe the cold sweat from his care-worn brow, nor loved disciple to close his eyes in death! But a step from the cross stands his mother all bathed in tears, loved disciples weeping, the rabble tauntingly crying out, If thou be the Christ, the chosen of God, save thyself. God forsakes him for a time! The...day refuses to shine, all nature mourning! that sacred spot is pictured in...mingl...An awful moment!

But this is not all. "For as oft as ye eat this bread, and drink this cup, ye do show the Lord's death till he come." Therefore, in eating the supper, we acknowledge our unwavering confidence in the truth that Jesus is coming back to this earth, not to burn it up or turn it into a caldron of burning lava, but as the Redeemer, the Restorer of all things which God hath foretold and promised. Consequently we have all the glory that inspiration has thrown around the "coming of Jesus," and "the restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of his holy prophets, from of old." Hence we see the necessity of attending to this ordinance frequently, in order that we may be kept near the cross, and thereby be in constant readiness to hail his coming with joy.

St. Paul has taught us that this memorial supper is to be observed or eaten frequently. 1 Cor. xi. 23-26. "For I received from the Lord, what I also delivered to you, that the Lord on the night in which he was delivered up, took a loaf, and having given thanks, broke it and said, This is that body of mine, (a symbol of it) which is broken on your behalf; this do you for my remembrance. In like manner, also, the cup, after the supper saying, This cup is the new covenant in my blood (a symbol of his blood), this do you, as oft as you may drink, for my remembrance. For as often as you may eat this bread, and drink this cup, you declare the death of the Lord till he come."—Diaglott.

I will now give you a few historical facts to prove that St. Paul was right in teaching that it was to be observed frequently.

The church at Jerusalem, whose suffering and persecution through a period of more than two centuries, for their unwavering faith in Jesus, and strict adherence to St. Matthew's original gospel, which was written in Hebrew, who were called Ebonites, or Nazarenes, were strict observers of the seventh day Sabbath; and after the close of their services on that day, assembled to eat a harmless meal, at which time they celebrated the Lord's Supper. William Cave, D. D., in a work entitled "Primitive Christianity," testifies as follows:

The Sabbath, or Saturday, for so the word Sabbatum is constantly used in the writings of the fathers, when speaking of it as it relates to Christians, was held by them in great veneration, and especially in the eastern parts, honored with all the public solemnities of religion. . . . Hence they usually had most parts of Divine service performed upon that day: they met together for public prayers, for reading the Scriptures, celebration of the sacraments, and such like duties. This is plain, not only from some passages in Ignatius and Clement's constitutions, but from many other writers of high authority.

According to Pliny's letter to Trajan, A. D. 110, and Tertullian, who wrote in 194, that the Christians met for worship on the Sabbath, the seventh day, and in the evening of the first day they met and enjoyed a love feast, a harmless meal, at which time they celebrated the Lord's Supper. See Neander's Church History, vol. i., p. 445; vol. iv., p. 58; Milner's Church History. Abridged by Townsend, chap. i. p. 11. It was on an occasion like this that the disciples came together to break bread, and St. Paul came among them, ready to depart on the morrow—Sunday. Acts xx. 7.

Dr. Mosheim, in his work on the Credibility of the Scriptures, says: "We infer that the observance of Sunday originated in the conventional assembling of Christians after the close of the Sabbath, which was at sunset, to hold their love feast or harmless meal, at which the celebration of the Lord's Supper was always made."

In Egypt in the middle of the fifth century, the Christians in certain cities, met weekly and partook of the Lord's Supper. I am aware that much has been said respecting the time of its celebration. But we are fully convinced that according to the time of its first celebration, and the practice of the church at Jerusalem, and that of the church at Corinth, the latter part of the day, or evening, is the most suitable time for its celebration, because it is a supper!

In the early days of the church at Jerusalem, the celebration of the Lord's Supper was both frequently and numerously attended. Acts ii. 42. "And they persevered in the doctrine of the legates; and were associated together in prayer, and in breaking the eucharist."—Syriac.

Voluntary absence was considered a sin; and exclusion from it, by the sentence of the church, as a severe punishment. Every one brought an offering proportioned to his ability; these offerings were chiefly of bread and wine; and the ministers appropriating as much as was necessary for the Lord's Supper. They then had a part of what was left for their maintainance; and the rest furnished supplies for the poor. And it is a historical fact that cannot be controverted, that the weekly celebration of the Lord's Supper was long kept up by the ancient church, and only deviated from when the love of the disciples of Jesus began to wax cold! There is just as much truth in saying that the Roman Catholic church changed this ordinance from the yearly celebration to the weekly, as there is in saying they changed the ordinance of baptism from sprinkling to immersion! See Smith's Bible Dictionary; Encyclopedia of Religious Knowledge; Robertson on the Lord's Supper; Dwight's Theology; Works of Andrew Fuller; Works of Robert Hall; Mason on Frequency of Communion; Dr. Adam Clarke and Dr. A. Barnes on Acts ii. 42.

But who are the proper subjects?

We answer, those who accept of Jesus as their sin offering and High Priest, that believe he died for them—that in him there is pardon, resurrection, future life, a title to the kingdom of Israel—the kingdom of David—and earth restored—to be the eternal home of the purchase of his blood; and that he is coming back as the Restorer of all things which God hath spoken by his holy prophets.

Then repent, which is a change of one's course of conduct from wrong to right. Then be immersed into the saving name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins. Then live in strict conformity to the commandments of God. All such have the evidence that they are the children of God: therefore they have the right to the memorial feast, and are in duty bound to celebrate it frequently. And in its celebration, it is important that we should possess a right frame of mind. Hence it should be with sorrow for the sins we may have committed since our last gathering, and a tender composure of affection, free from the disorders and ruffles of passion; with a holy awe and reverence of the Divine Majesty, and with an earnest desire for the return of Jesus to take the throne of Jacob, forever remove the effects of sin from the universe of God, and with hearts overflowing with love to Jesus and all the brethren.

What benefit do the children of God derive in the celebration of this memorial feast?

1. It is a means of strengthening their faith in Jesus their Life-Giver.

2. It affords great consolation and joy.

3. It increases our love to Jesus and one another.

4. It keeps before our mind the plan of human redemption.

5. It has a tendency to impress upon our minds an...

6. In eating the Supper understand...ing...in...we retire with the assurance that all our sins have been remitted, that we may have committed since our last gathering, and that we stand complete in Christ before the throne of the Omnipotent Deity, through the blood and intercession of Jesus the Christ.

Multiplicity of Seed Promised to Israel Before the Final Return to the Land of Promise.

S. H. REEVE.

It is with pleasure and thankfulness I have seen the opposition presented to the readers of THE RESTITUTION by so able an advocate as Mr. Cameron.

1. Because truth can only be tested and made to shine by contact with opposite views.

2. Because it affords an opportunity to present a few thoughts without seeming to intrude; therefore I present to the readers of THE RESTITUTION for their consideration the following:

I put it down as an axiom, and what will be accepted as such, I think, by Mr. Cameron and the readers of THE RESTITUTION, that when the Lord Jesus comes and unites the twelve tribes of Israel, they will be no more two nations. Ezek. xxxvii. From this self-evident truth I wish to show that multiplicity of seed was promised to the ten tribes before regathering in the land of Israel.

In Gen. xxxviii. we have the account of Jacob blessing the two sons of Joseph. He gave the blessing of great increase to them and the greater to Ephraim the younger son, to which Joseph objected because Manasseh was the eldest, but the reply of Jacob was in these words: I know it; he also shall become a people, and he also shall be great; but truly his younger brother shall be greater than he, and his seed shall become a multitude (marg. fulness) of nations.

Bear in mine that no division occurs after the union, which takes place under the auspices of Jesus, and then note the distinction made between Ephraim and Manasseh in Jacob's reply, which certainly shows a separation. Without a separation Manasseh could not become a great people, nor Ephraim a greater people. To my mind, it is then evident that this promise must be fulfilled before the gathering day.

It will be well to bear in mind that because those blessings were pronounced upon Ephraim and Manasseh, the other tribes of the ten are not therefore excluded from an association in them, for Joseph or Ephraim represents the ten in many places in the Scriptures.

A text of similar import to Jacob's blessing is found in the prophecy of Moses recorded in Deut. xxxiii. At the 17th verse, speaking of Joseph, he says: "His glory is like the firstlings of his bullock, and his horns are like the horns of unicorns; with them he shall push the people to the ends of the earth; and they are the ten thousands of Ephraim, and thousands of Manasseh."

By reference to Num. xxvi. 34, 37, we at once see that at the time when the children of Israel drove out the inhabitants from Canaan Ephraim and Manasseh did not occupy that relation to each other described by Moses, for at that time Manasseh exceeded Ephraim in numbers by nearly twenty thousand. Furthermore they were not a separate people at that time.

Hosea i. 9-11, is another text setting forth a multiplicity of seed in this age. It reads: "Then said God, Call his name Lo-ammi; for ye are not my people, and I will not be your God. Yet the number of the children of Israel shall be as the sand of the sea, which can not be measured nor numbered, and it shall come to pass, that in the place where it was said unto him, Ye are not my people, there it shall be said unto them, Ye are the sons of the living God. Then shall the children of Judah and the children of Israel be gathered together, and appoint themselves one head, and they shall come up out of the land: for great shall be the day of Jezreel."

This text fetches the fact that the ten tribes shall be unrecognized, but they were to greatly increase; and then, when it shall be said unto them that they are the sons of the living God, they are to be united with Judah.

Jer. xxxi. 7-10: "For thus saith the Lord, Sing with gladness for Jacob, and shout among the chief of the nations: publish ye, praise ye, and say, O Lord, save thy people, the remnant of Israel. Behold, I will bring them from the north country, and gather them from the coasts of the earth, and with them the blind and the lame, the woman with child and her that travaileth with child together: a great company shall return hither."

Isa. lix. 1-3, 20, 21: Sing, O barren, thou that didst not bear; break forth into singing, and cry aloud, thou that didst not travail with child; for more are the children of the desolate than the children of the married wife, saith the Lord. Enlarge the place of thy tent, and let them stretch forth the curtains of thine habitations: spare not, lengthen thy cords, and strengthen thy stakes; for thou shalt break forth on the right hand and on the left, and thy seed shall inherit the Gentiles, and make the desolate cities to be inhabited. Fear not; for thou shalt not be ashamed; neither be thou confounded; for thou shalt not be put to shame; for thou shalt forget the shame of thy youth, and shalt not remember the reproach of thy widowhood any more. For thy maker is thine husband; the Lord of hosts is his name; and thy Redeemer the Holy One of Israel; the God of the whole earth shall he be called. For the Lord hath called thee as a woman forsaken and grieved in spirit, and a wife of youth, when thou wast refused, saith thy God. For a small moment have I forsaken thee; but with great mercies will I gather thee."

Certainly great numbers are here brought to view, and they are given before the married state. As Gentiles they are married by Christianity, but as Israel they are unknown and their "bill of divorcement" lasts until "testified and gathered."

Isa. xlix. 19-21: "For thy waste and thy desolate places, and the land of thy destruction, shall now be even too narrow by reason of the inhabitants, and they that swallowed thee up shall be far away. The children which thou shalt have, after thou hast lost the other, shall say again in thine ears, The place is too strait for me: give place to me that I may dwell. Then shalt thou say in thine heart, Who hath given me these, seeing I have lost my children, and am desolate, a captive, and removing to and fro? and who hath brought up these? Behold, I was left alone; these, where had they been?"

This should need no comment for it plainly states that the children are given in their desolate and lost condition. This condition does not occur after the return under the Lord. We can not understand the Scriptures unless we keep in view that there are two houses of Israel—two branches of the same people, and that one of them was to become Gentiles in appearance though not in fact. The ten tribes, with Joseph (Ephraim and Manasseh) as their leader and shepherd, were to become a fulness of nations (Gentiles are they not?); then the Gentiles of verse 22 are the Ephraimite and Manassehite fulness and bring the other house of Israel to the land, for they need assistance. The 6th verse shows that one house brings the other. "And he said, it is a light thing that thou (Israel of the precious verses) shouldst be my servant to raise up the tribes of Jacob, and to restore the preserved of Israel; I will also give thee for a light to the Gentiles, that thou mayest be my salvation unto the ends of the earth." In further conformation of this please read Isa. xviii. (note the 7th verse), and Zeph. iii. 10.

Jer. iii. 12-18: "Go and proclaim these words towards the north, and say, Return, thou backsliding Israel, saith the Lord; and I will not cause mine anger to fall upon you; for I am merciful, saith the Lord, and I will not keep anger forever. Only acknowledge thine iniquity, that thou hast transgressed against the Lord thy God, and hast scattered thy ways to the strangers under every green tree, and ye have not obeyed my voice, saith the Lord. Turn, O backsliding children, saith the Lord; for I am married unto you: and I will take you one of a city, and two of a family, and bring you to Zion: and I will give you pastors according to mine heart, which shall feed you with knowledge and understanding. And it shall come to pass, when ye be multiplied and increased in the land, in those days, saith the Lord, they shall say no more, The ark of the covenant of the Lord: neither shall it come to mind; neither shall they remember it; neither shall they visit it; neither shall that be done any more. At that time they shall call Jerusalem the throne of the Lord; and all the nations shall be gathered unto it, to the name of the Lord, to Jerusalem; neither shall they walk any more after the imagination of their evil heart: in those days the house of Judah shall walk to (marg.) the house of Israel, and they shall come together out of the north to the land that I have given for an inheritance unto your father."

The language shows that Israel is not scattered as Judah is, but are located somewhere in the north as to have increased superior numbers for they are only going back to parts of families at most, according to verse 14. Verse 18 says, "I have at least a part of Israel must before the return mentioned in the verse. Israel shows an increase in the land of the north.

I do not wish to be accused of evading the question at issue—that of multiplicity of seed, nor do I think it can be so said with the testimony already presented; but there is one thing I consider necessary to understand in this connection that I must refer to here.

In Jer. xxxi. 35-37 we read: "Thus saith the Lord, which giveth the sun for a light by day, and the ordinances of the moon and of the stars for a light by night, which dividedh the sea when the waves thereof roar: the Lord of hosts is his name: if those ordinances depart from before me, saith the Lord, then the seed of Israel also shall cease from being a nation before me forever. Thus saith the Lord: If heaven above can be measured, and the foundations of the earth searched out beneath, I will cast off all the seed of Israel for all that they have done, saith the Lord."

By this language we learn the perpetuity of a nation of Israel. They were not to cease from being a nation; that is, some of the seed of Israel would continually exist as a nation, and this is further shown in chapter xxxiii. 17, 20, 21, 24-26. "For thus saith the Lord: David shall never want a man to sit upon the throne of the house of Israel." "Thus saith the Lord: If ye can break my covenant of the day, and my covenant of the night, and that there should not be day and night in their season, then may also my covenant be broken with David my servant, that he should not have a son to reign upon his throne; and with the Levites the priests, my ministers. "Consider'st thou not what this people have spoken, saying, The two families which the Lord hath chosen, he hath even cast them off? thus they have despised my people, that they should be no more a nation before them. Thus saith the Lord: If my covenant be not with day and night, and if I have not appointed the ordinances of Heaven and earth, then will I cast away the seed of Jacob, and David my servant, so that I will not take any of his seed to be rulers over the seed of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob: for I will cause their captivity to return, and have mercy on them." Please note especially the 17th, 20th and 21st verses.

To understand this in its literal sense, we only need to understand what the Scriptures plainly teach—that Israel was divided into two houses; and then, that when one house went down from being a nation the other came up as a nation. On this ground the seeming conflict of statements harmonize.

The multiplicity of seed applies to Israel—the ten tribes, and the few in numbers at the return applies to Judah. This interpretation is sustained by Deut. iv. 27-31. "And the Lord shall scatter you among the nations, and ye shall be left few in number among the heathen whither the Lord shall lead you. And there ye shall serve gods, the work of men's hands, wood and stone, which neither see, nor hear, nor eat, nor smell. But if from thence thou shalt seek the Lord thy God, thou shalt find him, if thou seek him with all thine heart and with all thy soul. When thou art in tribulation, and all these things are come upon thee, even in the latter days, if thou turn to the Lord thy God, and shalt be obedient unto his voice, (for the Lord thy God is a merciful God) he will not forsake thee, neither destroy thee, nor forget the covenant of thy fathers which he sware unto them."

These words do not apply to Judah because they did not worship the work of men's hands after the seventy years in Babylon, and this was to be in the "latter days." Be it also noticed that they will be located in foreign lands of the...rse to the Lord.

In Deut. xxx. 1-3 it is stated, "And it shall come to pass, when all these things are come upon thee, the blessing and the curse, which I have set before thee, and thou shalt call them to mind among all the nations whither the Lord thy God hath driven thee, and shalt return unto the Lord thy God, and shalt obey his voice according to all that I command thee this day, thou and thy children, and with all thine heart, and with all thy soul, that then the Lord thy God will turn thy captivity, and have compassion on thee, and will return and gather thee from all the nations whither the Lord thy God hath scattered thee."

Captivity is not simply being cast out of the promised land: therefore as spoken to verse 3 their captivity will be current before they return to their land, and it may be a longer or shorter period after their release from captivity. All that is needed to make the language of Moses and the prophets literal and easily understand that it is language now framed to apply to both houses of Israel in diverse conditions, in some cases at Last, and that multiplicity of seed is not confined to the promised land, but is based on obedience.

Much more might be said, but in giving this brief statement in favor of multiplicity of seed before the return as a partial fulfillment of the promises to Abraham, and as an identifying sign, I have tried to confine myself closely to the question at issue, although there are many things that more or less affect the question and make it appear still more reasonable.

I close with this statement:—The Anglo-Saxons are occupying the positions assigned or given, in the Scriptures, to Israel, and as the Lord distinctly says, "I will not give my glory to another," therefore they must be Israel.

EXPOSITORY.

Repent, and be baptized every one of you in the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of your sins. Acts ii. 38.

Instead of "in the name," read "on the name of Jesus Christ." The Greek preposition is not en, but epi—on or upon. This is very remarkable seeing that the words, baptize and baptized, are elsewhere followed, for obvious reasons, by the preposition in, or into.

There must be a reason for epi, on, upon, being used in this instance. The reason I take to be this: that on is not related to the word "baptized," but to "the name of Jesus Christ." "Baptized on," does not make sense, however; therefore we require, as is often the case, to supply a word. "Repent, and be baptized every one of you, trusting, or believing, on the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins."

In confirmation of the idea that epi, upon, in such a connection, refers to the name of any one as the foundation on which the act rests, I quote the following examples from Robinson's Greek Lexicon. Matt. xviii. 5: "Whosoever shall receive one such little child on (epi) my name receiveth me." Luke ix. 49: "Master, we saw one casting out devils on (epi) thy name." Acts iv. 17: "Let us straitly threaten them that they speak henceforth to no man on (epi) this name." In all these instances, on or upon relates to the name of Jesus, as the basis upon which the act mentioned rests.

This import of epi is still further seen where a pronoun is used. Rom. xv. 12: "On him shall the Gentiles trust." 1 Peter ii. 6: "He that believeth on him shall not be put to shame." Revised N. T. Such is the import of epi, on, in the passage we are considering. "Repent, and be baptized every one of you, (resting) on the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins." This construction coheres with itself, and with the whole teaching of the New Testament.

The Lord Jesus not only died for our sins, but also appointed his ambassadors to proclaim "remission of sins on his name among all nations." Luke xxiv. 47. And so we find the Apostle Peter testifying that "To him giveth all the prophets witness, that through his name, whosoever believeth on him shall receive remission of sins." Acts x. 43. R. V. So also the Apostle Paul: "Through this man is preached unto you the forgiveness of sins; and by him all that believe are justified from all things."

The Lord Jesus Christ, he is the ground of a sinner's acceptance with God. It is through him, through his blood, we receive the remission of sins; and none who put their trust in him shall be put to shame.

This truth by no means lessens the obligations of believers to be baptized. The apostle's language is clearly imperative, "Repent, and be baptized." Not to exercise the new act of this duty are these words written; but to call attention to the fact, that baptism, to be of any consequence, must be submitted to resting upon the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins. This, I apprehend, and no other, is "valid baptism."

"For the main idea in the foregoing, I am indebted to Mr. J. M. Denniston, M. A., of Jamaica, in his work "The Sacrifice for Sin." By loving, in Messenger.

FARE DAYS.

Many of the darkest days in history have borne the choicest fruit to the glory of God and the good of man. It was a dark day when Israel groaned in the bitterness of the Egyptian bondage. But if the bondage had been less bitter, Israel could have rested content in Egypt; out of the bondage came the Exodus, and out of the Exodus, the Messiah. It was a dark day when the ardent, brave, eloquent Stephen, hope of the early church, was stoned; but out of that day came Paul. It was a dark day when the persecution that arose about Stephen ravaged the disciples, but out of it came the world-wide preaching of the gospel. It was a dark day when the the Puritans, finding no rest for the sole of their feet, sailed from the old world; but out of it came America. Darkest of all days was that on which the sun hid his face from the Divine Man expiring on Calvary; yet all our hopes and all our happiness come from that day.—National Baptist.

"THE RESTITUTION OF ALL THINGS WHICH GOD HATH SPOKEN BY THE MOUTH OF ALL HIS HOLY PROPHETS SINCE THE WORLD BEGAN."

VOL. XXXI. PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, MAY 3, 1882. NO. 17.

THE RESTITUTION.

TERMS—TWO DOLLARS PER YEAR, Payable in advance. Three and Six Months at the same rate.

Address all Letters and Communications to THE RESTITUTION, Plymouth, Indiana.

TO CORRESPONDENTS:

The Restitution advocates the final "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all His holy prophets since the world began." As a means to that end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with Christ as King of Kings, and the Immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal regeneration of Judea; the immortalization of true righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked—eternal life only through Christ, and such other kindred truths, as a hearty belief of the Gospel, Repentance, and conversion as preached by the first messengers of Christ, and a holy life in accordance therewith, are cardinal principles.

COMING AGE—ITS PROPHECY. No. 169.

Witnesses. Closing of their Sackcloth State. Rise of the Beast. Events which disclosed the Beast. The Apostacy Originated. Its Fatally Relationships. What it is Not.

J. [illegible]

Events have been traced to the period of the successive judgments on the little horn of Dan. vii. No prophetic accomplishment is attended with any greater difficulty. What was the civil power of the papacy some centuries ago? It is the fact upon which mighty emperors made first battle of crowns and scepters of Kings. What is it now? Reckoned among the things that were. It has no power to pervert the witnesses. What has been the cause of this wonderful change? The execution of a sentence recently delivered against that power by the Most High. Who are the executors of that sentence? The nations that erected the infamous throne are appointed to pull it down. Rev. xvii. 16, 17.

The witnesses are out of their sackcloth state. Rev. xi. 7. The beast that ascendeth out of the bottomless pit (abyss) shall make war against them (the witnesses), and shall overcome them, and kill them." The witnesses have a new enemy. Who is this new enemy? The solution of this problem will now claim our attention, since it is one of great interest. Various solutions have been brought forward, which we propose to examine, that we may have the way clear to introduce what we consider, the true solution.

1. This beast is said to be identical with that of Rev. xiii. 1. This view has its objections; some of which are quite serious.

a. They do not seem to have the same origin. The one rises out of the sea (thalassa—θάλασσα), a body of water; the other comes out of the abyss—pit, (abussos—ἄβυσσος), a place on the earth—land.

b. Their attributes, named, do not wholly agree. That they are related members of one family, we do not question; their entire personal identity is what we have reasons to doubt; that they are both one and the same political dynasty. It is evident that the fourth beast of Daniel, and the leopard beast of Revelations are the same; but this beast has not the ten horns, nor is it spoken of as having the mixture in its natural formation; such as its feet and mouth.

c. Their destiny does not appear to be the same: the one is doomed to perdition, the other is cast into a burning lake. These locations might be mentioned; still, the language connected with their acts would imply different shades of thought. We are ready to admit that it is a member of the family of Daniel's fourth beast. It is that beast only in the sense of exercising its power for a short time, under the form, simply, of the eighth head. We cannot show its origin and its relationships to the two witnesses, the fourth beast, the harlot, and the judgment, without a sketch of John's prophetic history of the Fourth Monarchy. In giving this outline history we shall seek to be fully understood. That history shall be given under four distinct periods: 1 Pregonic; 2 Leopard; 3. Scarlet, 4. The judgment portion. Their chronology extends from the time of the Revelations, A. D. 96, to the establishment of the triumphant reign of the Messiah. We shall define the chronology of each period as far as practicable.

1. Dragonic Period.—From B. C. 753 to A. D. 383—1137 years. This we call the Pure Roman Family; named after its founder, Romulus, and its chief city, Rome. The symbols of the Pure Roman Dynasty are pure iron. Dan. ii. 33, 34, 40; a sea monster, Dan. vii. 7; and Great Red Dragon, Rev. xii 2-6. The dragon is a symbol of Pagan rulers, under a Pagan priesthood.

The pure Roman family had six forms of government, or administrations, named after their chief officer, or officers.

Its first administration was regal. From April 21st B. C. 753 to B. C. 510—243 years, governed by seven kings.

The second administration was consular, B. C. 510 to B. C. 309.

The third form, was dictatorial. It was the form for great emergencies. It was often restored.

The fourth form or legal, decemviral rule—ten men rule. The supreme power was vested in the hands of ten men. These were banished B. C. 449.

The fifth legal, or administration, was tribunitial. Under some one of these six administrations of pure Roman family continued to A. D. 93.

The sixth, or Imperial head, commenced with Augustus Cæsar B. C. 31, and continued to A. D. 476, when it fell, and was again restored, A. D. 800.

These rulers were pagan; their colors and national symbol was a Red Dragon. No persecution had taken place which particularly involved the Christian church, before the reign of Nero. From that time to A. D. 308, there were ten general persecutions which took place under Pagan Rome. Under the imperial head of that great empire Christ was born, and suffered upon the cross; under that head he will redeem unto that empire and its associates, the right to universal dominion.

With the early struggles of the Christian with heathen worship, we have, at present, nothing to do. These have been noticed, when describing the events of the seals. Here all these pagan persecutions are fully described—to those numbers we direct the attention of the reader.

Let us now open John's prophetic chart at Rev. xii. This chapter describes the war between Christianity and Paganism; between Christ and his ancient enemy, Satan. Read the chapter; and examine the symbolic agents, and their acts, and compare these with profane history. If they agree, well; if not, then look to the future.

Who are the rival chiefs in this bloody contest? Michael, verse 7 (Dan. x. 13, and xii. 1); and the Devil, and Satan. Verse 9. (ophis—ὄφις, Drakon—δράκων); the old serpent. Rev. xx. 10. These chiefs have their armies of angels.

The visible symbols are given for our special instruction. The sun-clad woman; and the great red dragon, with seven heads and ten horns, and seven crowns upon his heads. It is not necessary to occupy time in describing these conflicts since they are so distinctly seen on the chart. The woman is the body of Christian worshippers, called the Christian church. Her children are its members-ship: its martyrs, or witnesses. The great red dragon is the Roman empire under the control of the pagan priesthood. The time is shown by the crowns being on the heads, and points to imperial pagan Rome which extends to Constantine the Great, when the war was suspended under that priesthood. The pagan priesthood continued to A. D. 554, since the first seven Christian emperors were high priests of paganism.

Leopard Period.—This period, on the prophetic chart, is described in Rev. xiii. Under this period the empire lost the purity of its race, and the unity of its crown. Within a space of 150 years; from A. D. 381 to A. D. 540, the Roman family lost its ancient religion, the purity of its race; and its imperial diadem. Such terrible shocks served to weaken its constitution. We call this the transition period; because the crown passed from the sixth head to the ten horns.

During the transition period, there was another element in the empire struggling for supremacy; the apostacy. This struggle between races, and religions, raised a tempest in the Roman Sea. A sea monster comes up, having seven heads, and ten horns; and upon his horns ten crowns, and upon his heads the name of blasphemy. The beast's body was like a leopard (Grecian element, Dan. vii. 6); he had bear's feet (Persian, Dan. vii. 5); and a lion's mouth (Babylonian, Dan. vii. 4). Since the iron is not named; and since it is like the fourth beast of Daniel; having ten horns, and executing the same deeds; and since it succeeds the dragon, we call his name Christian Rome; the old empire with a new religion

The events of this period are deeply interesting, both in their religious and political aspects. For a nation to change its religion is a matter of power, and when those religions are antipodean in their essential doctrines, as was the case with Paganism and Christianity, it would seem impossible for such a change to take place. Yet this was accomplished in the Roman empire.

As in the course of two races, so also apart, in civilization, mode of life, and religious ideas, as were the Roman and German tribes, would produce a shock sufficient to overthrow an empire. Such an amalgamation did take place at this period in the Roman empire; yet, to accomplish the work, required nearly two centuries. As prisoners of war these German nations were individually made slaves and scattered through the empire; they afterwards became so numerous that they were received into the Roman armies. In that position they became so powerful that they were made allies to the Romans. They finally became their conquerors. Such were the mixings of the Roman iron, and the German clay.

Another revolution took place in the Roman empire at this period, viz., a change in the form of its administration. The imperial head had worn the crown, since the days of Augustus Cæsar; it now passes to the heads of ten kingdoms which had risen out of the Roman earth. The breaking down of the imperial unity and dividing the power among ten kingdoms were events of this period. It was a period of terrible convulsions and revolutions. It was the period also that gave birth to the little horn. It is the period that gave rise to the two-horned beast; and also, the image to the beast. These will all appear as we progress in this 13th chapter.

Verse xiii. 3. And I saw one of his heads as it were wounded to death—the imperial head. This was accomplished by the barbarians that invaded the empire under Alaric, Genseric, Attila, and Odoacer, as are described under the first four trumpets, described in former numbers. This resulted in the transfer of the crown to the ten horns, which formed the ten-king, or decemregal head (seventh head), the decemregal administration. The western empire gave way to the domination of the ten-king rule.

Verse 3. 2d[illegible] clause. And his deadly wound was healed. This was accomplished in Charlemagne. This emperor of the Germans ruled over France and Spain: these countries were, therefore, parts of the Roman empire. Hence it appears, that the ten kingdoms were principally Germans; for France and Spain were settled by German tribes. The following are the ten primary kingdoms, as enumerated by Machiavel, Lloyd, Bishop Newton, Sir Isaac Newton, and Bishop Mede, viz: 1. Ostrogoths. 2. Visigoths. 3. Suevi. 4. Vandals. 5. Franks. 6. Burgundians. 7. Heruli. 8. Anglo-Saxons. 9. Huns. 10. Lombards.

These nations, in various combinations, conquered the Roman empire—constituting the seventh head, for the Roman-German family still existed, though under the rule of its horns. Hence, we learn that that empire had seven forms of administration; six Roman; and the seventh and eighth (sixth, or seventh restored), were Roman-German.

We have now given an outline of the heads and ten horns, we now examine the acts of the beast itself, after which we shall notice the other agents named in the chapter.

Editor Restitution:

Rather in continuation of the letter I last mailed you, I will say that had Joseph Symes delivered his lecture before clergy and professors he would have made them quail. Common sense, matter of fact and reason, were on his side in much that he said. In asking the question, whether a single disciple of Jesus could be found, was the man to blame?

Practically, professors of Christianity ignore parts of the Sermon on the Mount. This we know. Talking some while ago with a Christadelphian in Nottingham about that part of the discourse which teaches to surrender the cloak to him who sues for the coat and to ask not for goods back which are taken from us—why said the man such a course would demoralize society. Now, how was the avowed infidel to—for the Christadelphian here? Neither to act those plain words, and if the word were not given he deemed why given at all. Another Christadelphian, a Manchester who knew a brevity, a conscientious man said to me, "Of all the precepts of the discourse on the mount there is no salvation. He also referred to the Jews subjection to pay from no impress, either."

George Storrs, a man who had suffered much for conscience sake once candidly told me that he could not fully keep the sermon. "All the world," said he, "will become guilty before God." "But us," he added, "live as near as we can to the precepts."

Common sense people have thought of the requirements of the discourse, and have declared there was hardly a Christian to be found. "People cannot live," say they, "and truly obey Christ's commands." A woman some weeks since said to me, "When I preach—you read, If any man will sue thee at the law, and take away thy coat, let him have thy cloak also," I do not believe," said she, "that the preachers themselves believe what they read." This is from a woman in business, and she had reason for what she said.

A long time ago a business man, in New Haven, Conn., remarked to me, "I have never yet found a Christian if you are one," said he, "you are the only one I have seen."

Symes, the lecturer, held up to contempt the talk of some preachers and others who said, "It does not mean so and so." Before the assembled hundreds of intelligent men he—owned such snivelling. Are the Secularists to go on, deriding, denouncing the Holy Scriptures, [illegible] name of these alone, "some will run out in time." But the Secularists are not letting the people alone. They are busy lecturing and spreading their literature all over. Ingersoll's works are published in Manchester on this; and that subject at a penny each; and the swelling numbers of infidels will convince some of the slumbers up that their talk is foolishness. A determined purpose in the minds of millions on the Continents and in Britain exists to uproot and tear in pieces all reverence for God, Jesus, and everything pertaining to religion. "Religion has made misery; let us annihilate it." Such words express the temper of multitudes: and such days as Europe never knew are swiftly hastening

I think the right view of the closing times of the Gentiles is obtaining among our brethren. This is, that following the end of the temporal power of the Papacy, and the present time is this end, a personal Antichrist will be manifested. Long have I thought of this, and as Popery does not, and never did fill up the descriptions given by Paul and John, an open Antichristian manifestation must be exhibited on earth. And verily the world is showing signs to the "wise" (Dan. xii. 10) that the dark time is approaching. A few may escape all the awful time (Luke xxi. 36), but the nations must have it: and through the furnace thousands on thousands will be brought, who will be saved.

Were a reflecting Christian to visit Manchester this week, and see the huge placards announcing the programmes for amusements on the day named Good Friday, he would be awe-stricken. It seems the people with one consent determine to devote the day to sport, frolic, and feasting: while those who attach sacredness to this Church of England "Fast-Day," are in a minority small (comparatively) indeed. The Bishop of Manchester some time ago openly deplored the general desecration of the day: yet, I opine, he never saw such a display of national godlessness as he now beholds: it reminds us of France in the great revolution.

A word more on the Sermon on the Mount. Why are brethren of health and intellect; brethren who write and dispute about baptism and this and that besides why are such silent about the sermon? Infidels are not silent about it. They not only attack the sermon, but declare that clergy and professors do not believe it. And, said Symes, if we go to that infidel nine-tenths of ye Bishops, Priests, Episcopalians, Methodists, Baptists, etc., will sink with us."

Is the Bible true to challenge and defy infidels to face the Gladiator?

ORIENTAL SKETCHES.—No. 12.

BASHAN AND ITS GIANT CITIES.

J. L. PORTER, A. M.

THE RUINS OF SUWEIDEH.

Emerging from the oak forests we found ourselves on a low lava ridge which juts out from the mountains some distance into the plain. It is divided down the center by a deep rocky ravine, through which a winter torrent flows. The portion of this ridge south of the ravine is covered with the ruins of Suweideh. We were riding up to them when my attention was attracted by a singular monument standing alone on a commanding site, a few hundred yards north of the city. It is a square tower, about thirty feet high. The sides are ornamented with Doric semi-columns supporting a plain cornice, and between them, on panels, are shields, leaders, and trophies of arms sculptured in relief. A legend, inscribed in Greek and Palmyrene, states that "Odainath, son of Aonelos, built this monument to Chamiate, his wife." Few and simple are the words. The story of Chamiate is unknown. What were her private virtues, or public services we cannot tell. Strange that this monument should stand as a tribute of a husband's admiration and love, when the histories of husband, wife, and native city have passed away for long centuries! It is worthy of [illegible] the still more celebrated Zenobia. The Palmyrene inscription on the monument would seem to indicate that its founder was a native of the desert city. Perhaps the great Odainatus himself, during his warlike expedition into Syria, may have thus celebrated the virtues of a former wife.

Crossing the ravine by a Roman bridge, we rode up to Suweideh, and under the guidance of the sheikh's son, a fine manly boy of some fourteen years, splendidly dressed in a scarlet robe, and armed with silver-hilted sword and dagger, we proceeded to examine in detail the wide-spread ruins. We visited a Corinthian portico; a Roman gate-way at the end of a straight street, nearly a mile in length, and paved throughout; the ruins of a temple of the age of Trajan; the remains of a large church, within whose crumbling walls is the modern Christian burying-ground; a mosque, the roof of which was once supported on marble columns, doubtless rifled from an old church, or a still older temple. Then we inspected the ruins of a fountain of an opera, and of a large theatre; and we saw two immense reservoirs, anciently supplied by aqueducts which brought water from the neighboring mountains.

Verily the destroyer has been long at work in this old city! Here are ruins heaped upon the top of ruins; temples transformed into churches; churches again transformed into mosques, and mosques now dreary and desolate. Inscriptions were here side by side, recording each transformation, and showing how the same building was dedicated first to Jove, then to St. George, and finally to Muhammed. We walked on after our little guide, winding among vast heaps of ruins—ruins, nothing but ruins, and desolation, and rent walls, and fallen columns. The modern dwellings are just the lower stories of the ancient houses, which have been cleared out and occupied; and the whole site has become so deeply covered with fallen structures, that the people seem, for the most part, to be residing in caves.

Thirty or forty boys, with a fair sprinkling of men, followed us, shouting and dancing in high glee at the strange figures of the Franks, the first, probably, that most of them had seen. We should have been seriously incommoded by their attentions, had it not been for the threats of our manly little guide, accompanied now and then by a volley of stones at the boys who [illegible] retreated to bear. As we passed the houses, too, and the caves like court-yards, pretty women and coy girls peeped at us with one eye over the corner of their large white veils, and [illegible] to each other [illegible] about our dress, [illegible] or both, as they persisted in calling the [illegible] attracted their notice. In fact, we created a stir in the quiet people of Suweideh quite as great a sensation as a party of Arabs with their fierce faces, flaunting turbans, and flowing robes would do in Cheapside or in the High street of Edinburgh.

No city in Bashan—not even Bozrah, its Roman capital—surpasses Suweideh in the extent of its ruins: and yet, strange to say, its ancient name is unknown, and there is no mention of it in history previous to the Crusades. It seems to have suffered more from time and from the chances of war than any other city in the whole country. Inscriptions found on its monuments show that it was a flourishing city long before the conquest of Bashan by the Romans in A. D. 105, and that it carried on an extensive trade with Egypt and other countries down to the middle of the fourth century. William of Tyre, the historian of the Crusades, says of the region round the city: "It is rich in the choicest products of nature,—wine, corn and oil; the climate is salubrious and the air pure." So late, therefore, as the twelfth century the country was prosperous and the city populous. We can see the evidence of this still. The hill sides are everywhere terraced, and plain and mountain alike bear the marks of a former careful cultivation. The terraces are admirably suited for the growth of the vine, the fig, and the olive; and the rich plain even now bears crops of grain whose luxuriance is proverbial. Nowhere do Bashan, nowhere in all Syria, did I see such convincing evidences of the surpassing richness and vast resources of the soil, as around Suweideh. One would suppose that Moses had his eye upon it when he penned these words—words equally beautiful and true: "The Lord thy God bringeth thee into a good land, a land of brooks of water, of fountains and depths that spring out of the valleys and hills; a land of wheat, and barley, and vines, and fig trees, and pomegranates; a land of oil olive, and honey; a land wherein thou shalt eat bread without scarceness, thou shalt not lack anything in it." Deut. viii. 7-9.

And one would suppose, too, looking at the Bible and looking at the land—comparing prophetic description with authentic history and present reality—that the prophets must surely have read the long and sad history of Palestine as I read it, and they must surely have seen the present utter ruin and terrible desolation of this part of it as I saw it, and they must surely have heard from the lips of the people the story of their oppression and their dangers as I heard it, before they could possibly have written such graphic words as these: "I will make your cities waste, and bring your sanctuaries into desolation. I will bring the land into desolation; and your enemies which dwell therein shall be astonished at it." Lev. xxvi. 31, 32. "The generation to come of your children that shall rise up after you, and the stranger that shall come from a far land, shall say, when they see the plagues of that land, and the sickness which the Lord hath laid upon it, Wherefore hath the Lord done thus unto this land? what meaneth the heat of this great anger?" Deut. xxix. 22, 24.

These are only a few, a very few, of multitudes of similar predictions. And, let it be observed, the predictions are not made in mere general terms, capable of a wide rendering and a somewhat vague reference. They are special, graphic, and detailed; and their fulfillment is evident as it is complete. The fields are waste, the roads deserted, the cities abandoned, the houses without inhabitants, the sanctuaries desecrated, the vineyards, orchards, and groves destroyed. And the land is desolated by the "violence" and the folly of all them that dwelt therein,"—of the Turks, its nominal owners, and of the Arabs, its periodical "spoilers," who come up "upon all high places through the wilderness." "Every one that passeth by it is astonished at its deserted cities and waste fields; and "the stranger that comes from a far country,"—the thoughtful student of history, the thoughtful observer, the thoughtful reader of his Bible—cannot refrain from exclaiming, as he rides through Bashan, "Wherefore hath the Lord done this unto this land?"

The noble Druse chief of Suweideh, Sheikh Yahed el-Hamdan, was absent on our arrival, but in the evening he returned, and entertained us with a hospitality that would have done honor to the patriarch Job, who is represented, by local tradition, as having been the first prince of Suweideh. When the evening banquet was over, the whole elders of the town crowded into the large reception room of Sheikh Wakel, and squatted in concentric circles round the blazing fire. We occupied the seat of honor, on a raised dias, beside the sheikh. Rings of white turbans, the distinguishing headdress of the Druses, appeared round and round us, here and there broken by the crimson kefiyeh of a Bedawy, or the black kerchief of a Christian. An Egyptian sat by the fire preparing and distributing coffee, while an Abyssinian slave behind him pounded the fragrant berries in a huge oak mortar, beating time with the pestle, which bore some resemblance, in form and size, to an Indian war club. Each guest, on drinking, rose to his knee, touched forehead and lips with his right hand, and bowed to the sheikh; then on sitting down again, he made another salam, intended for the rest of the company, and those near him returned it, with a muttered prayer that the refreshment might do him good. It was an interesting scene, and was probably not unlike the receptions of guests in the mansion of Job and in the tents of Abraham.

We talked of politics, of war, and of poetry, and most of the company took part in the conversation with a respectful propriety and a good sense that surprised me. The poetry of the Arabs has some striking peculiarities. Their poets often describe the virtues and achievements of distinguished men in short stanzas, containing two or four measures; and the beauty of the rhythm and boldness of the imagery are sometimes of a high order. There is a species of composition which they often try, and in which many are adepts. It is difficult for those who are ignorant of the peculiar structure of the Arabic language to understand its nature. A word is taken, and, by changing its form, a series of distinct acts is described, each act being expressed by a different inflexion of the root. One word will thus occur six, eight or ten times in a stanza, with the addition of a prefix or suffix, or the insertion of an intermediate letter, or an alteration in a vowel point; and each change conveys a new and definite meaning. The warlike achievements of a favorite leader are oft unfrequently graphically described in this manner by skillful and varied inflections of his own name. The Hebrew scholar will find something analogous to this in Jacob's play upon the word Hiltael, in Genesis xxxi. 46-48; but the best examples of the kind in Scripture are given in Hosea, chapters i. and ii., on the word Jezreel.

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

I will be at King's Corner Saturday before third Sunday in May, to continue over Sunday, as Brother Thurman may arrange.

J. R. WAGONER.

The Annual Conference of the State of Michigan will be held at Watson Corner, Allegan county, Mich., commencing June 1, and lasting over the following Sunday. Those coming by rail from the north or south on the Grand Rapids and Indiana Railroad will stop at Monteith, and take the Allegan division to Fisk's Crossing, three miles from Monteith, where ample provision will be made for all that shall come. A general attendance is desired at this meeting as we expect this to be the best Conference ever held in Michigan. Let all come praying the Lord's blessing to be with this meeting. Able ministers will be in attendance to preach the word.

THE RESTITUTION.

S. A. CHAPLIN, EDITOR.

Plymouth, Indiana, May 5, 1882.

It is possible that we may be absent from Plymouth during a part of this month. Will know better next week.

One of the great thoroughfares from Chicago to the Eastern cities is the line of the Pennsylvania Railway that passes through Plymouth. Having journeyed several times over this popular line of travel, we can, from our personal knowledge, commend the route. It is not only the shortest line east, and a first-class road in all respects, but also a route presenting the observing traveler that diversity of scenery that is always interesting. Through the Alleghanies the scenery is unsurpassed for both beauty and magnificence. It is possible that we may ere long make a trip to the East, and, if so, we shall more fully narrate the more interesting features of this celebrated route.

By a card from Elder G. R. Kramer we learn that he so far recovered from his injuries as to be able to preach on Sunday, April 16, and also to administer baptism to fourteen persons, one of whom was J. H. Pettingell A. M. the talented author of the Theological Talisman and a more recent work entitled, The Life Everlasting. In a discourse, delivered by this gifted author in the evening, the point was well made showing how beautifully baptism symbolizes the resurrection and the life. We will give our readers his remarks on this point in a future number. May the Lord prosper the cause of his truth, sanctify us all through its influences, grant us the earnest of his Holy Spirit, and save us with an everlasting salvation in his soon coming Kingdom.

What do you think of Wakefield's rendering of I Cor. xv. 24-27? Will the Greek justify it? The general teaching of Scripture will. Give me the rendering as Brother Reed has my copy of the book. Yours truly and in hope. O. M. MYERS.

Wakefield's version reads: "Then will the end be, when God the father deliveroth up the kingdom to him; during which he will destroy all dominion and all authority and power: for he will reign till he hath put every enemy under his feet! Inasmuch as God hath put all things under his feet: and to the enemy death will be destroyed at last. Now when the Scripture saith, all things are put under him, it manifestly means a subjection besides the subjection to him who put all these things under Christ."

In reply as to what the Greek teaches we say, that our knowledge of the language is too limited to give an opinion either way. The connecting particles seem to favor the common version, while the case connections seem to favor Wakefield. We will hereby refer the question to Prof. Charles Gardner, of Chicago, whose thorough knowledge of the Greek well qualifies him to answer. We respectfully request his criticisms.

We clip the extract below from the Christian Herald of April 27. It was truly a singular confutation of the infidel lecturer's ridicule at the very time by ocular demonstration; and another remarkable occurrence was, that the telegraph wires absolutely refused to burden themselves in transporting the infidel slang over their circuits, as we have seen stated. Telegraphic communication was nearly suspended that night:

"An apology is due to Dr. Talmage from Colonel Ingersoll," is the opinion of a New York journal which has usually displayed more partiality for the Atheist than the preacher. That journal calls attention to the aurora which on Sunday night, April 16th, shone with a brilliancy rarely witnessed in this latitude, and remarks on the coincidence of its appearing on the very night when Ingersoll, before a large audience was ridiculing Dr. Talmage's "theory that the world might have existed without sunlight, and have been lighted in its stead by such contrivance as phosphorescent rocks, or the aurora borealis." That very night the aurora blazed out with such splendor as to take away a good deal of the sting of Mr. Ingersoll's ridicule; and lately, at the meeting of the San Francisco Microscopical Society, the State Mineralogist read an account of the discovery of a species of rock which, on being struck, flashed out so brilliantly as to frighten the miners. They call it Hell Fire rock. Another blow at Ingersoll. "Is there a special Providence watching over Dr. Talmage?" is the question with which the writer concludes his remarks. That may be, but in any case it is certain that there is a special Providence watching over God's truth in the world which the Atheists assail.

PAPERS heralding the kingdom of God, and the return of our Lord to rule in that kingdom, will not be needed a great while longer. The rapture of the church is an event of the near future. While such papers are needed, they must be sustained by those who look for Christ and love his appearing. Ever since our connection with THE RESTITUTION, its prosperity has been the object of our prayers, labors and sacrifice. And we have to bless God that there have been numerous sympathizing friends, who have so aided us that the paper is still a missionary to many, as an humble herbinger of the coming of the Holy and Just One. With out the relief that has been kindly given by devoted lovers of the cause, to whom the things of the kingdom are more precious than worldly wealth, there would have been no RESTITUTION to-day. We have been enabled to erect Ebenezers along that trying way, that has always been stony in the prospective, and can say "Hitherto the Lord hath helped us." Our trust is in the Lord. We hope the friends of a paper advocating the literal fulfillment of the prophecies will not desert it now in these closing days of this dispensation. Till the paper has a larger subscription list it must have some extra aid. We will do our full part. Lost opportunities for doing good and advancing the Lord's cause can never be recalled. After the Lord shall have come, labor, and sacrifice, for him, his people, and his truth, will not be needed. The infidel world is spending money freely. Will we not aid the truth in its last conflicts? The judgment will soon test what our works have been. We will try according to the extent of our ability to give our subscribers a paper that will keep them posted on the changes that are so rapidly taking place. Momentous events are at the door. We shall make the fulfillment of prophecy one leading feature, and personal piety another in future numbers. Many of us, who are professedly looking for Christ soon to come, are, indeed, very poorly prepared to meet him—so as to be found of him in peace, without spot, and blameless. Brethren, help by your prayers and your means—and may God bless us, and give us a part in his soon coming kingdom.

FOREVER WITH THE LORD.

No intensity of affection has ever equaled the ardent love of the genuine Christian toward the Lord Jesus Christ, into whose heart the Divine love has been shed abroad by the Holy Spirit of truth. And how wonderful that such love should be manifested toward one whom they have never seen. This is the love that is stronger than death. It is this that has lit up celestial smiles upon the dying cheek, and that has kindled with a heavenly radiancy death-glazing eyes. It is this divine emotion that has caused the martyr to triumph amid the consuming flames. But what must be the raptures of heart when the child of God shall be made like his Lord, and be brought into his heavenly companionship, to be continually with him, to behold his glory and share his honors during the everlasting ages. How blessed it will be, not only to see him whom our soul loveth, but to see the full harvest of the redeemed waving over a world made new, when its present barrenness and waste shall have been transformed into a heavenly country. How transporting to see a crown of celestial jewelry upon those loved temples that were once lacerated with the cruel thorns. How thrilling it will be to realize that tears and pain and death are all left behind, and that we have at last entered into the joy of our Lord—the sharers of his own deathless nature. Then, indeed, will the joy unspeakable, and full of glory, energize the hallelujahs that will swell from unnumbered voices through the heavenly mansions "like the sound of seas." O who can rise to the grand idea of the unutterable delights awaiting those whose robes our own dear Redeemer shall have washed to snowy whiteness in his own crimson blood. How transporting to see the Jerusalem from heaven, surrounded with the blooming paradises of a regenerated world, and to realize that the theatre of eternal blessedness and triumph shall be where the Bridegroom and Bridal Church were once scorned and rejected—once suffered and died. O grand outcome of the ages of evil—of the long years of lamentation, and mourning, and woe. When will the dark veil that shrouds the world be rifted, and the gleams of the city of gold shine through? Soon, soon, respond the sweet echos from the voice of prophecy. A little while only, and he that cometh shall come; and then—we shall be forever with the Lord.

CHARACTERISTICS OF THE LAST DAYS.

The earth also was corrupt before God, and the earth was filled with violence. Gen. vi. 11.
But as the days of Noah were, so shall also the coming of the Son of Man be. Matt. xxiv. 37.

Divine intervention is fast becoming an indispensable necessity. Antediluvian wickedness, of every shape and form, is rearing its horrid front all over the world, and in an intensity of disbelief in that nothing but destructive judgments can ever wipe out. The brutalized elements of society are assuming to dictate what legislation shall be—a distiller and saloon-keeper—and what courts of justice shall decide—was the cries of murderers ought the world over. It will be seen by the subjoined extracts from English papers also sent us by Brother Hayes, that Border Ruffianism in America has a perfect counterpart in England. The unparalleled tribulation seems up in the near future. When the tempests of wrath shall sweep the world, as they soon must, surely will shall we be with Christ safe in the chambers, and above the storm?

A SALVATION ARMY RIOT.

Last night a disgraceful riot took place in connection with the Salvation Army services in the Rink, Oldham. A number of roughs created an uproar, and an endeavor was made to quiet them, but without effect. The roughs turned upon those who had attempted to obtain quiet and kicked them. The police were called in, and the riot was so great that an end was put to the service long before it should have concluded.

SIR W. LAWSON AND THE SALVATION ARMY.

Sir Wilfrid Lawson has forwarded a subscription from himself and several other M. P.'s, including Messrs. Hugh Mason, James Cropper, W. S. Caine, W. Fowler, and Arthur Pease, towards defraying the costs of defending a "captain" of the Salvation Army who was proceeded against at Exeter. Sir Wilfrid says: "I look with considerable alarm on the mob law which, at the instigation of the drink trade and with the connivance of the magistracy, appears now to reign in several of our towns. From what the Home Secretary has said in the House of Commons it appears that at present we can bring no influence to bear in Parliament which may conduce to a better state of things. Some of my friends in the House, as well as myself, are anxious, [illegible] upon, who are responsible for the maintenance of order in Chester, to the exercise of your authority. Yet in view especially of the extreme and unbroken kindness of our treatment hitherto in all parts of the city, and still more of the fact that vast multitudes of Irishmen in other cities will be likely to fall upon our poor people (who have not often to look to a Bench so unprejudiced as that of your city), should punishment be rigorously dealt out to the disturbers of Sunday, I do venture to plead for mercy—for unqualified mercy towards our assailants. Their conviction will surely say enough as to the efficiency of the city authorities and will surely be an adequate warning to such persons in Chester, where their punishment will, I fear, lead to many conflicts and troubles, if not in Chester, at any rate elsewhere. In any case I have instructed our officers that they are not to approach Boughton, or any other neighborhood inhabited mainly by the Roman Catholics, with any procession, as any such movement is unlikely to produce any result, but that of irritating a people with whom we have the most earnest desire to get upon friendly terms as soon as possible. I trust that the lesson of authority so ably expounded from your bench will be learnt yet in many other cities where at present there is simply a surrender to rowdyism. But I cannot think it right to cast upon authorities anywhere an unreasonable task, such as that of protecting from the results of unwisely offensive action."

A mass of evidence was then taken, the witnesses identifying various prisoners as having taken part in the riot. Thomas Conlan, Mary Dermody, Sarah Moran, Annie Higgins, Thomas Hanley, and Bridget Burke were liberated on their own recognizances of £25, with two sureties of £12. 10s. In default of finding sureties they were to be imprisoned for a month, and they would also have to pay the costs, or in default go to goal for seven days. Thomas Jordan, Edward Hughes, Michael Minton, Patrick Tansey, Edward Moran, Owen M'Gough, Robert Davies, and John Brannigan were committed for trial at the sessions, bail being accepted. John Swinbey, who pleaded guilty to rioting with others in City Road on Sunday afternoon, was bound over in six own recognizances to keep the peace. A similar charge was preferred against Mary Nunn and John Mallon, and they also were bound over to keep the peace.

INFIDELITY IN FRANCE.

The piece below is from the Paris correspondent to the Catholic Times, a London journal sent us by Brother H. Hayes. From a previous number we learn that a law has been passed enacting that neither the name of God nor of Jesus Christ shall be mentioned in the elementary schools of France. The Catholic journal complains of this and other acts as "Atheistic tyranny." It is quite probable that the rampant infidelity that is becoming so outspoken here in every form of religion is only the precursor of another reign of terror. Roman Catholicism may however blame itself, as it has covered the very name of religion detestable in France by the iniquities it has perpetrated under the name of Christianity which it has falsely assumed. The oblique and suppressed utterances of Catholic journals would well to not realize that the only record on the book of time that is blacker than the history of the reign of terror is the record of papal persecutions. The St. Bartholomew massacre has never been paralleled by any of the black deeds of Atheistic tyranny. May the Lord soon come and deliver the world from both Jacobin and Jesuit. The number containing the following bears date April 6, 1882:

A congress has been sitting in Paris during the past week its avowed purpose is the separation of all "religions" from the State. It is needless, however, to add that the proceedings legislated into Atheism and thereby against religion in every shape and form. On last Sunday afternoon the Congress was brought to a close at the Cirque Fernando. All the delegates were present except that champion of vulgar and impious ribaldry, M. Leo Taxil. The lodge of the Grand Orient has thought fit to expel this degraded writer, because, as M. Edmond Lepelletier openly stated, M. Leo Taxil had been proven to be a literary thief. He was, therefore, unfit to mix with honest "citizens," although so zealous a combatant in the arena of Atheism. The Chairman of this meeting was Gatineau, who had on his right a lady named Mdlle. Maria Deraismes, who graces meetings of this kind with her dazzling toilettes and somewhat mature charms. The opening speech of the Chairman was a masterpiece of senseless blaspheming:

"Citizens," he said, "our Congress has done its work splendidly. Next year we shall march triumphantly to the Pantheon, which belongs to us: but which was taken from us by the 'Man of Sedan.' Ere long we shall build up the temple of Liberty upon the ruins of the Church of the Sacred Heart. But this is not all. The Church of the Assumption in the Rue St. Honore is about to be 'deconsecrated.' We have petitioned the Municipal Council to hand this building over to us for the purpose of holding an Atheistic daily service, until the glorious day comes when we shall have a building devoted to Atheism in every district in Paris. The Congress has urged upon the Senate the necessity of suppressing the Budget of Worship; and if the Senate does not march quickly enough in this direction the Chamber of Deputies will teach them a lesson. Let the peasant be persuaded not to give a penny to the priest. Even now," said the speaker triumphantly, "the Church is a dead body, and we must hasten to put it under the earth like any other corpse."

At this point of the meeting it was thought necessary to strike up the everlasting "Marseillaise," and many of the company showed their reverence for the national song of the Republic by standing up. Then followed a speech from Mdlle. Marie Deraismes, President of the Society for the Amelioration of the Female Sex. The plan of the lady orator seemed to improve women by teaching them to obey no law human or divine. Her pernicious nonsense was, however, loudly applauded, and M. Basin next proceeded to address the audience. This gentleman had common sense enough to declare that the nation was hourly becoming more and more demoralized. But he was hooted and insulted; and was obliged to leave the platform to avoid maltreatment. The assembly was brought to a close amidst much confusion. The audience was composed of the faces that are to be seen at all communistic meetings.

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

The Quarterly Assembly of the Church of God, will commence Friday evening before the fourth Sunday in May, which will be May 26, in a grove near Bro. John J. Spaid's, Hampshire Co., Va. All the brethren and people in general are respectfully invited to be present.

DISCOVERIES IN EASTERN PALESTINE.

For the following account of recent discoveries east of the Jordan, we are indebted to a copy of the London Times of April 7, kindly sent us by Brother H. Hayes. It will at once be seen that these discoveries have been made in those lands described in J. L. Potter's book, a part of which we are soon to publish in our Oriental Sketches. Lands not yet explored the same district of country within two or three years past, and be found exactly as described by Mr. Porter—that his description of the territory east of the Jordan is of the same value and interest as though written yesterday. It is in this and of Gilead that Mr. Oliphant desires to settle a Jewish Colony. As Jewish restoration is one of the most events foretold by the prophets, everything pertaining to the country is important. We are living in a most wonderful age. Dr. Levy has been entitled to the letters in the combinations of the times, and exile of the Jewish people, and it will be in the restoration of both land people. The symbolic tree is leafing out and Messiah will come.

PALESTINE EXPLORATION FUND.

The quarterly statement of the society contains full particulars of the recent discoveries made by Captain Conder on the east of the Jordan. These are of great historical interest. He has found, among the numerous stone circles, dolmens and menhirs already known to exist in Moab four cloistered great centres, round which the monuments are disposed. These are Mushibiyeh, at El Mareighet, and at Minyeh, south of Heshon, and in the Ghor, near Kefrein. The first of these Captain Conder identifies with Bamoth Baal, the second with Baal Peor, the third with "the top of Baal Peor which looketh towards Jeshimon," and the fourth with the "Sanctuary of Baal Peor," in the Jordan Valley, where the Israelites worshipped while in Shittim. The reasons for these identifications are extremely curious and interesting, and if the arguments be accepted the discovery will prove to be perhaps the most striking result of the value and importance of scientific research. The map of the district, drawn by the surveyors, enables Captain Conder to study the country in detail with its conformations for the first time accurately laid down; the collection of names shows him how such memories as one would expect still haunt the spot. The monuments which still stand as they stood in the days of Balak illustrate the religion of the people whom the Israelites were to dispossess; and with this knowledge to help him, he has stood upon Pisgah and seen, like Balaam, only a part of the Israelite encampments; upon Baamoth Baal, and also seen only a part; and upon Baal Peor, and seen how Balaam would have seen them all—"Israel abiding in his tents, according to their tribes." He has also made a discovery at Amman which possesses another kind of interest. He has found that a building already seen and described by several travellers is of Sassanian character, which seems to connect it with the curious ruin discovered by Canon Tristram at Mashita. He has also discovered many ancient rock-cut tombs, presumably those of the ancient Ammonites, but ruder in character than those commonly found in Western Palestine. The citidel of Amman he considers to be late Roman work. He has discovered at Arak el Emir, the great palace of Hyrcanus, the method of conveying the immense stones, some of them 20ft. long and 10ft. high, from the quarry to their destination. On the western side he has explored the tunnel of Siloam and discovered the place where the workmen met, and he has obtained a cast and made a reading of the new famous Phœnician inscription, which is supposed to belong to the time of Hezekiah. The new number of the society's journal also contains a collection of Arab legends, with an account of a newly-discovered Christian church near Jerusalem, and other papers of interest. The survey of Eastern Palestine was stopped before the end of last year by Turkish authorities on the ground of an informality in the firman. Through the good offices of Dufferin, however, another firman has been promised, but it is not yet signed. As no objection has been made to granting the firman of Dr. Schliemann to excavate at Hissarlik, it is hoped that a similar favor will not be refused the English society in their work of examining this most interesting country.

SWITZERLAND.

GENEVA, May 1.—Tremendous snow storms have occurred in the Alps. The Simplon route is impassable.

A shock of earthquake was felt in the Canton of Vallais on Friday.

Maclean, the would-be-assassin of Queen Victoria, has been acquitted on the ground of insanity. After acquittal it was ordered that the prisoner be detained in custody during Her Majesty's pleasure. The deliberations of the jury occupied only five minutes.

Russian troops are said to have joined the rioters in their attacks upon Jews at Baltz. Forty persons were seriously injured during the progress of the riots, some of whom have since died. A thousand houses were destroyed and the damage is estimated at 4,000,000 roubles.

The Roman Catholics of Naples, instigated by the thirty thousand priests and monks in the city are showing the persecuting spirit of popery by threatening those who attend Protestant meetings, and by seeking to prevent them from securing places to hold meetings.

A London dispatch says: The Anti Slavery Society publishes a letter from Frederick Gerhard Rohlfs, the well-known African traveler, and the representative of Mr. King of Abyssinia, again imploring England to mediate between Egypt and Abyssinia to prevent war, which is now imminent.

Moscow, April 30.—A man named Kolosoff Bogdanowitsch recently submitted to the authorities a plan for the illumination of the Kremlin with electric light. Inquiries were instituted, and it was discovered that his intention was to blow up the whole Kremlin during the festivities attending the coronation of the Czar. At the man's residence there were found a number of peasant's caps, the crowns of which were filled with an explosive material. It is supposed these caps were intended to be thrown into the air in greeting to the Czar, and that, on falling to the ground, the contents would explode with the effect of bombs. Bogdanowitsch and 300 Nihilists have been arrested.

BALTIMORE, April 25.—The captain of the German ship Stella, just arrived at Baltimore from Bremen, tells a wonderful story. On the 13th of March, when his vessel was bowling along before a fair wind, its progress was stopped by a shock so sudden and severe that all on board supposed that it had struck a rock. Soundings were taken, but no bottom was found at one hundred fathoms, and the sea was tranquil. The captain's conclusion was that the ship had encountered a submarine volcanic eruption. The latitude was 27 deg. 21 min., and the longitude 23 deg. 51 min. west, or in the vicinity of the Azores.

Tobacco, Alcohol, Chloral and Bromide of Potassium.

There can be no room to question the presumption that an excessive use of tobacco does occasionally deteriorate the moral character, as the inordinate use of chloral or bromide of potassium may deprave the mind, by lowering the tone of certain of the nervous centres, in narcotizing them and impairing their nutrition. Whether the nicoline of the tobacco can act on nerve cells as alcohol acts may be doubtful, but the victim of excess in the use of tobacco certainly often very closely resembles the habitual drinker of small drams—the tippler who seldom becomes actually drunk—and he readily falls into the same maudlin state as that which seems characteristic of the subject of slow intoxication by chloral or of the victim of bromide.—The Lancet.

Everything of fame, wealth and glory must pass away. "But the things which are not seen are eternal." Like the tints of the summer rainbow, the bloom of the flower, and the resplendence of the sunset, fades the grandeur of earth. The foam sparkles a moment on the billow of ocean and is gone; the black chariot of Apollyon rolls on, crushing beneath its cruel wheels the splendor of man; and the glowing banner of hades waves in triumph over the shattered domes of empire. Columns come crushing downward as time flings from his blade the full bloom of princes; but there is a glory which shall never fade, an empire on the rock of ages, which, when all evil shall have been entombed, shall be soon towering in sublimity and gleaming with the effulgence of "the eternal tabernacles."—G. R. Kramer.

As the eye which has gazed at the sun cannot immediately discern any other object; as the man who has been accustomed to behold the ocean turns with contempt from a stagnant pool: so the mind which has contemplated eternity, overlooks and despises the things of time.—Edmund Burgon.

GOOD FRIDAY.

Amongst the many [illegible] upon the profession [illegible] throughout so-called Christendom there is not a more genuine one than this annual fixture [illegible] day on [illegible] Friday. I cannot [illegible] with more reverend than the discovery would be [illegible] who gave it its present name and fixed its [illegible] upon Friday.

Any boy of ten years [illegible] in any public school, is able to make the calculation, that the crucifixion on Friday and a burial the same evening between five and six o'clock, would not allow between the burial and resurrection of Jesus, early on the first day of the week, "while it was yet dark," say four or five o'clock, more than thirty-six hours, or one day and a half, although it was declared by Jesus that "as Jonah was three days and three nights in the belly of the fish, so shall the Son of Man be three days and three nights in the heart of the earth." See Matt. xii. 40.

Just as it dishonors the Son, so it dishonors the Father for he declares that Jonah was three days and three nights in the belly of the fish. Infidels see these things and make them a part of their objections; they tells us also, that a whale cannot swallow a man, perhaps not, but it happens that no whale was called upon to perform such an operation, but a fish was prepared for this special purpose, and upon this special occasion, "Now the Lord had prepared a great fish to swallow up Jonah." See Jonah i. 17.

Objections of this kind are generally made by parties who nibble at small portions, without reading the full narrative.

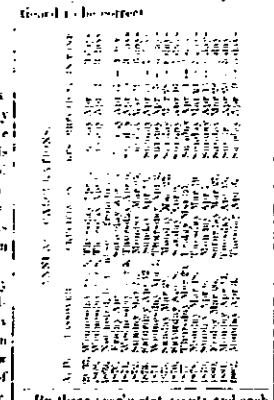
The burial and resurrection of Jesus as well as the crucifixion, depends upon the time of the observance of the Passover, which does not at all recur uniformly, it always commences about the full moon in our month of March; the first new moon in our March, constitutes the first day of the Jewish month "Abib," which is the first day of the Jewish ecclesiastical year, and the first new moon in September is the first day of their civil year, all their religious feasts, etc., are regulated by their ecclesiastical year, and all their contracts, and all business matters, are guided by their civil year.

All accounts which are given in the New Testament tell us that Jesus observed the Passover with his disciples, and was arrested the same night, and was brought to trial early the next morning, condemned and crucified the same day, died and was buried the same evening before six o'clock, that being the hour on which the Jewish Sabbath began, all these things being true, no man living can stretch the period between the burial and resurrection of Jesus, (supposing him to hold the crucifixion on Friday) to more than thirty-five hours, or thirty-six at the utmost tension, therefore the recurrence of the crucifixion on Friday, is a fixture of human invention, ergo, worthless, like many other things designated as religion in our day.

In order [illegible] that the crucifixion took place the day after Jesus ate the Passover with his disciples, I quote from each of the records of the evangelists, as they have recorded: Matt. xxvii. 1, "Now when the morning was come, all the" etc. Mark xv. 1, "And straightway in the morning, the chief" etc. Luke xxii. 66, "As soon as it was day, the assembly" etc. John xviii. 28, "They led Jesus into the place, and it was early" etc.

Thus we have undoubted testimony from four records, that the trial and crucifixion took place, on the day after the Passover, and if this took place on Friday, and the resurrection on the following Monday, being the first day of the week, the great controversialist of the popish faith and practice, Thomas Aquinas, could not make out the time of Jesus in the tomb, more than thirty-six hours, if so much.

I have seen two or three accounts of the date of the crucifixion made out [illegible] progressive calculation, which very few are able to make, and by which the conclusion was arrived at, that the date was Thursday, April 6, A. D. 29-33, upon the correctness of this, I am not able to pronounce positively, but satisfied in my own mind, that it is correct, as it would allow the true scriptural time in the tomb, but this subject has for some time past engaged my attention, resulting in the formation of a list of the Passovers for the last fourteen years, taking a note of each Passover as it occurred, and by which I am able to show that they do not occur uniformly, nor in regular order on Friday, nor on any other day, consequently the fixture of Good Friday, is a item of the work of the apostasy, which I will now show, assuming the calculation already mentioned to be correct.



By these yearly statements, and each interval in the tomb, it can be seen that no annual regular fixture can be honestly made.

MRS. DAVIS AND HER MISSION.

Leaves from My Journal.

Jerusalem, Jan. 10, 1882. I wish to call attention once more to the importance of sinking artesian wells in Palestine. The people are now waking up to the necessity of procuring more water through the dry season, both for irrigation and family use. There will be sufficient rain hereafter, probably, through the winter season, for common use; but even then wells may be desirable in many cases, for cooking and other purposes. But as the soil is sufficiently strong, or rich enough to grow several crops through the dry season, it become highly important to secure as good a supply of water as possible; especially upon the low lands and plains, where it will be the most easily obtained by artesian wells. There can be no doubt but that putting in these wells would not only be a highly remunerative business, but would add greatly to the wealth and prosperity of the country also. I hope the lovers of Palestine will give this matter immediate attention.

The wool of this country is good and fine; and the sheep are all that could be desired. Dr. Lee will take two to America in the spring, but I doubt if they will live there. All a family needs here is a few acres of land, two good cows, some hens and turkeys, and with good farming tools and plenty of good seed, the man can be a king. The farmers by working three hours each day have all they want.

Vegetables are raised during the winter, and by irrigation in the summer, and as I have told you before, are the very best in the world. The fruit is sweeter than in any other country. Oranges are so sweet that those who are not fond of sweet things, do not like them as well. Nuts are raised in large quantities. I saw chestnuts in the market as large as horse-chestnuts. The wheat, as I have told you before, is superior to any I ever saw, and makes delicious bread. Koobie, is the Arabic name for bread.

There are fifty carriages running between Jaffa and Jerusalem, and hundreds of camels bearing burdens.

The New City of Jerusalem is the finest located city on the earth. I wish I could describe it, but it is impossible. The surrounding scenery is so delightful and diversified, that one never tires looking upon it. Building material is right on the spot, and of the nicest quality also.

The houses are now built with huge cisterns that seldom fail. Our cistern is now full of water, and it has not been opened since last April. The flowers in our garden are in full bloom, (middle of Jan.) The vines are beautifully green, and it seems impossible that it can be winter.

The nights are chilly, but we never take cold. If we bathe in cold water, the skin is immediately warm—a warm glow follows the bath. I never experienced anything like it before. The air is pure and healthful. The Arabs are nearly all barefoot, and the bosom is entirely exposed, but they are hardy, and rarely ill. I can readily believe that man will sometime live forever, when he and his surroundings are pure.

I have now tried to tell you of all the good things I can think of; but really, I have no bad things to write about, except sin and improper management. We only long for the society of our own kind, and trust that God will bring them soon.

I will tell you what I heard to-day about the Christians. The poor Russian pilgrims who come to Jerusalem every year, bring a few dollars saved for this purpose, and last week being the feast week at Bethlehem, all went there to see the Patriarch and feast. These poor souls buy a loaf of bread blessed by the priest, and take it in a napkin into the holy place in the Church of the Nativity. There they deposit the bread on the altar where they eat the sacrament; afterwards it is to be taken by them and carried to their homes as sacred. After the bread had been deposited on the altar, a woman belonging to the Church of England, went in and stole it, and took it to the other Christians, who ate it up and made all sorts of fun of the thing. The Greeks found it all out, and having lost the blessed bread made a big stir about it, and had a sort of a free fight, only with their tongues, however. But the result is, the thief has been turned out of the church to satisfy the Greeks.

I hope and trust the time will come when there will be an end of such scenes. There is a Mohammedan police kept in the Church of the Holy Sepulchre to keep the Christians from quarrelling and killing each other. But I rarely ever think of the religious elements here; they are of no consequence at all.

Jan. 13. We are having a long cold storm. On Sunday the wind blew a gale, and rain fell in torrents, also Sunday night and Monday. It is raining this evening, but the wind has ceased to blow. The steamer did not land at Jaffa, but went to Beyrout; so we have no mail as yet. I hope to-morrow will bring the mail with good news. Our mail is quite the event of the week with us who have so little news of the outside world.

I hear that we have a new consul coming, Mr. Merrill, who has been in this country some years. I think I heard him lecture in Lowell Institute, in Boston, three years ago. His appointment seems to give much satisfaction.

Mrs. Brinton's son came back last Saturday. I was so glad to see him as his mother. He will take his father's farm, and commence farming, with nice farming tools brought from America. He is just the man for this country.

It is quite cold during the storms, but as soon as the sun shines, it is warm and pleasant. Last night I was invited to dinner with my Arab friends. We had vegetables just from the fields, (Jan. 12), and such nice vegetables never grow anywhere else, I think.

The butter of this country has a flavor which I never tasted before, and I like it much for cooking. I have learned to cook, and could now teach Madam Parlos even, many useful things.

This is believed to be the day on which Christ was baptized in the Jordan, and hundreds have gone to dip themselves in the river. I am in good health; but have many hours of weeping. The thought of my darling Bertie lying so far away, so cold and still, causes a throb of anguish such as I never felt before. But it is best, I am sure. I would not exchange it if I could. She is safe and that is much to me. If I suffer, she cannot know it, thank God.

I hope the "Pearson" has reached you. I long to be doing something more. I am busy all the time; but it is not just what I wish to do. I already have my blackboard in use to teach the people, they have such a desire to learn; and I get many favors by so doing.

Feb. 5. To-day news came that the French and English had occupied Cairo. The people, especially the English, are much excited over the news. I was visiting a gentleman, an Arabic missionary, and he told me all about it through his little daughter about twelve years of age, who could interpret to me. She also told me that her father believed all the prophecies, and was anxious to see the fulfillment of God's word. This gentleman is an Arab, but likes the Jews. I told him I thought he was a Jew. He answered "I hope so."

I do not know what makes me love these people so much, and they me in return. They are cultivated and courteous in their manners; after you know them you think them Americans.

I believe we must have a great war here. Shall I be alone? Everyone seems to feel it; and all are talking of the "great war," and the prophecies. The Arabs understand the prophecies. I read to them much.

I will give you a picture of a Jerusalem home this evening. I sit writing. Frank (young Mr. Brinton) sits opposite playing the violin. A dear neighbor is at my right knitting. Little Katrina, who is to be married in two months, is singing.

Here comes our Russian servant, Maria; says Mousony waltz is nice, and she dances for us. We can't understand a word she says; but she talks all the same. She is happy, poor soul.

It seems like home to hear our friends sing "In the sweet by and by," and the tear will unbidden come, and a pain also at my heart, as I remember my dear darling, and how sweetly she used to sing this sweet song. Perhaps she will come from the cold grave soon, and sing again. "Awake and sing," says the prophet, "ye that dwell in dust."

SUN SPOTS, AURORAS, AND CYCLONES.

[Phenomena so remarkable as the wonderful appearances described below seem to us worthy of note and record. While we would not claim that every uncommon marvellous display in the skies is a sign from heaven, we would not, on the other hand, assert that there are no last day tokens. Can it be that the crown composed of electric light shaped into the resemblance of jewelry of precious stones betokens the speedy coronation of our Immanuel? And, also, are the savants who have prognosticated physical disturbances and calamities in the right? We incline to the opinion from the history of the past that they are, but we shall soon see. The descriptions appended are from different and late numbers of the New York Sun.—ED.]

THE SKY ABLAZE.

A remarkable display of the aurora borealis was witnessed in this city last night, April 16, and it attracted the attention of thousands. Groups of people gathered on the street corners and in the parks and open places, and watched with exclamations of surprise and admiration the singular appearances in the heavens. Early in the evening a low broad arch of greenish light formed in the north, spanning a wide arc of the horizon, and occasionally sending up [illegible] which reached [illegible] black clouds appearances became more complicated and beautiful. Shafts of light, sometimes tinged with a rosy hue, shot up from the east, west, and north, and, meeting a few degrees south of the zenith, gathered in a crown encircling the brilliant star Arcturus. This crown of light was in constant motion, waving to and fro, and continually changing in brightness. Sometimes one side of it appeared to be broken away, and at other times all semblance of a crown was lost, and it shone as a great, irregular disk of light. In the meantime from every side the flashing and flickering flames, shifting from green to red, shot upward, and the whole heavens seemed to be covered with a mass of burning gas, the stars growing pale by contrast. Sometimes the light seemed to be rolling up toward the zenith in rapid waves, then it shot in streaks, and again rose in broad curtains, which waved to and fro, as if a mysterious wind was swaying them. Overhead great bands of light appeared with startling suddenness in spots where the sky had been perfectly black before, and, darting forward with a tremulous motion, joined the shining crown near the zenith.

About midnight the display along the horizon shifted from the northeast around through the north point to the southeast, where the light became very brilliant. The auroral shafts then shot upward from every point of the compass and joined the crown overhead. Within the circle of this crown the sky was black, and in the centre shone Arcturus undimmed by the glow around it, although all the surrounding stars were extinguished. The display seemed to attain its greatest brilliancy about 1 a. m., when the strong flashes of light appeared as bright as sheet lightning, and the crown overhead, forming a perfect circle, glowed with extraordinary beauty.

As is always the case in great electric storms, the telegraph wires were affected all over the country, and messages were delayed. This outburst of the aurora is undoubtedly connected with disturbances in the sun. Repeated observations have shown that such a connection exists, but science has yet to learn how to interpret its manifestations. An exceedingly remarkable group of sun spots, which was described in the Sun of yesterday, and which is now visible without a telescope as a blue dot on the surface of the sun may have some connection with the cause of the aurora.

POUGHKEEPSIE, April 16.—There was a splendid display of aurora borealis to-night. The shafts ran from the northern horizon to the zenith, and were in colors of carmine, blue, and white. At midnight waves of light centered at the zenith, advancing and receding for several minutes.

BALTIMORE, April 16.—The display of auroral lights to-night is unusually brilliant, extending from the horizon to the zenith, and covering almost the entire northern hemisphere.

SOMETHING QUEER IN THE SKY.

The atmosphere has been in a strange condition of electrical disturbance since the great auroral display of Sunday night.

On Tuesday night and yesterday morning the fact that the electrical disturbance was not yet at an end was shown by the appearance of a remarkable white cloud northeast of the zenith. It appeared first in the shape of a comet's tail and of the brightness of an auroral streamer. Later it expanded into a roundish, hazy-looking mass which hung over the Northern Cross in the constellation Cygnus, extinguishing all the fainter stars in its neighborhood. It resembled a thin cirrus cloud illuminated by a powerful electric light. Sometimes it disappeared as if it had suddenly melted, and a minute later it would be seen again in the same spot. There was no appearance of streamers and billows of light rolling up from the horizon as during the display of Sunday night.

Last night's violent thunder storm, and the continued difficulty in working the Atlantic cable, show that the electrical conditions are still abnormal. It is noteworthy that the great outburst of sun spots, which we first noticed last week, continues.

There were on Tuesday afternoon two groups of sun spots so large as to be easily visible without a telescope when the eye was protected by a smoked, or a deeply colored glass.

That an intimate electrical connection exists between the sun and the earth is pretty generally admitted, but we are yet in the dark as to the details of its manifestation. The present phenomena offer a rare chance for scientific investigation.

ANOTHER AURORA.

Another display of the aurora borealis, only less splendid than that of Sunday night, was witnessed in the northern heavens yesterday morning, April 20. About 2 a. m. the thunder- [illegible] black clouds disappeared, leaving a thin veil of mist spread uniformly over the heavens, through which only stars of the first magnitude were visible. Then an auroral arch formed in the north, the bow of light being perhaps ten degrees broad, while the segment of sky below the arch, or bow, was almost of an inky blackness. The color of the arch was yellowish white, shifting at times to light green. From its upper edge shafts and streamers shot upward continually, all converging toward the zenith. Many of these streamers lasted with little change of brightness or position for some minutes, and meeting overhead the rays resembled an enormous fan, the handle being in the zenith. An hour later the arch in the north bent down in the middle, making the figure of an ox-bow, the centre being almost exactly under the pole star. At times this bow glowed with extraordinary brilliancy, seeming to light up the whole vault of the sky with its reflection. Even when it was brightest, however, close watching showed that the stars were visible through it, just as they are through comets' tails. They appeared, however, to be robbed of their twinklings. Some of the shafts of light that shot up from the great ox-bow figure in the north were of splendid beauty. Starting with a greenish hue at the base, they changed gradually to a faint red near the upper end so that, at times, the sky overhead was tinged with rose color. Dark horizontal bands occasionally crossed the whole of the illuminated region, making, with the upright light of the streamers, a barred appearance that was very curious. No feature of the display remained long unchanged. The streamers flashed and pulsated and occasionally swayed sideways, as though a passing wind had brushed them. Phosphorescent waves started from the shining bow in the north, and rolled up overhead with electric speed. Here and there a bright light appeared and disappeared like a faint flash of lightning. The streamers appeared to vie with one another in racing to the zenith. Sometimes at widely separated points upon the upper side of the bow two or three projecting tongues of light would appear, and then all start together, converging as they rose, with a swift, unswerving motion seeming to cleave their way through the darkness until they met overhead. To the spectator who watched this celestial exhibition long the absence of any sound was phenomenal. Half the dome of the heavens being filled with glowing apparitions endowed with almost every variety of motion from the flowing of waves to the rushing of rockets and the swaying of curtains, the silence seemed mysterious, and it greatly heightened the effect of the display. The auroral streamers continued their excursions, and the bow glowed in the north, until both faded in the morning twilight.

If as there is strong reason to believe, great outbursts in the sun cause aurorae the present is a fine opportunity to test the matter. For more than a week there has been great solar disturbance, so great in fact that the orb of the sun, which the ancients believed to be so immaculate that Galileo Galilei's observation of spots upon it was regarded as satanic deception, has appeared spotted even to the unassisted eye. It will be interesting to know what the spectroscope has revealed during the last week, and how the magnetic needle, which is made to trace a record of its variations at Greenwich, has behaved. Prof. Young relates that when he was making spectroscopic observations in the Rocky Mountains in 1872 he witnessed remarkable disturbances in the neighborhood of a sunspot. At the same time a magnetic needle used by one of his party swung clear off the scale. On writing to England he learned that the self-registering magnetic needles there had shivered and trembled at the very time when he witnessed the solar paroxysms from his post in the Rocky Mountains. The solar outburst witnessed by Carrington in 1859, which was followed by an extraordinary auroral display and great magnetic disturbance throughout nearly the whole northern hemisphere, is a familiar example of the supposed connection between outbursts in the sun and the appearance of electric lights in the earth's atmosphere.

Some men of science are disposed to think that the sun not only influences the earth's magnetism, but also makes its power felt in the production of terrestrial storms. The recent disastrous tornadoes in the West coinciding so closely with the disturbances in the sun and the appearance of the aurora derive a new interest from this view. The old astrological superstitions concerning a relation between the fates of men and the aspects of the heavenly bodies no longer find a lodgment except in ignorant and superstitious minds, but in their place men of science entertain notions of a real interplay of influences between the members of the solar system. In the case of the sun and the earth, they believe that some sort of magnetic or electric connection exists. The whole study is yet in its infancy, but nobody can doubt that some time men will master it, and then the aurora borealis will no longer appear mysterious.

Tornado after tornado sweeps the country. Rarely is a greater or more widespread series of windstorms on record than those which have ravaged the Central and Western States this month. The cyclone which visited Mississippi and Louisiana on Saturday, completely destroying the town of Monticello, leaving only three houses standing, killing ten people, and injuring nearly all of the 150 inhabitants, was only a repetition of disasters which have afflicted Kansas, Michigan, Iowa, Missouri, Pennsylvania, and Georgia since the first of April. The theory of extraordinary atmospheric disturbances, from some unknown causes, seems to rest on a large basis of strange phenomena.

Brevities.

A fine art exhibition at present says that Mr. Wild's excavations at Cairo have resulted in the discovery of an inscribed monolith which belonged to Apries, the Pharaoh Hophra of the Old Testament.

The Cabinet Council of France has approved the scheme of M. De Lesseps for cutting a channel through the neck of land dividing the Gulf of Gabes from the salt marshes and low-lying parts of the Desert of Sahara, to the south of Tunis. It is expected that the sea will, in virtue of this cutting, once more fill up the Sahara. The political advantage to be obtained by the scheme, will be the insulation of Tunis and Algeria, by creating a water barrier between them and Tripoli. The cost of the canal, it is estimated will be 65,000,000 francs.

The interest taken by some of the English people in Jerusalem and Palestine, is on the increase. A little work intended to prove that the English are direct descendants from the lost tribes of Israel has had an enormous circulation, and praise of Jerusalem by Holman Hunt, the painter of the famous picture, the Shadow on the Cross, has tempted other Englishmen to construct villas near him where they spend a portion of their time. There are rumors that Mr. Goschen's mission to the Porte is for the purchase of Palestine, in order to reinstate the Jews in the land of their ancestors. It will be the modern land of Goshen.

Mrs. Lucy Picket, aged 115 years, was buried at Saugatuck, Mich., Sunday. Mrs. Picket was born in Plattsburg, N. Y., in 1767, where she lived for 100 years, in 1867 she moved to Muskegon, Mich., where she lived until recently, having moved to Saugatuck only a few months previous to her death. Mrs. Picket well remembered Washington, and was one who helped to strew flowers before Lafayette in his triumphal march.

In the Franco-German war the Germans lost over 10,000 men by disease or the casualties of battle. It is to be remembered that every one of these was a picked man, in the full vigor of life, when he ought to have been adding to the wealth of the country and raising up a family to strengthen the State. Besides the official cost of the war, voluntary contributions amounted to $12,000,000 in money or kind. This was the price of a successful war, waged by the most economical of nations.

The persecution of the Jews in Southern Russia has been renewed with such violence, that the number of homeless and destitute is 27,000. The authorities are doing nothing to protect the Jews or repress violence. At Balta the troops, previous to the arrival of Governor Podolia, aided in plundering instead of protecting the Jews there. Forty persons were seriously injured during the progress of the riots, some of whom have since died. Fully 1,000 houses were destroyed, and the damage done is estimated at $3,500,000. Another account says: At Balta, 2,000 Jewish families were ruined. Whole streets of houses were wrecked. The plundering lasted two days. The riots almost assumed the character of a struggle for the annihilation of the Jews, the assailants being the peasants from the neighborhood of the town. Ilopolo, near Odessa, was also surprised by the peasants, presumably under the leadership of Nihilists. The houses of Jews were sacked, and the town was partially burned.

CHRIST.

Christ is the founder of a religion, say He is the religion itself. Other men have been shadows of the great Original. Here is man in the image of God,—man as the ancient seers conceived him to have been originally framed—man as modern optimists conceive him capable of becoming. Here is the type of humanity. Henceforth religion is the imitation of Christ, because the nature of God has shone forth in the person of man. If this conception is a myth, the grandest poetical character is dwarfed into nothingness beside the carpenter of the reformed tax-gatherer, the attendant on Paul and Barnabas, the physician of Troas, and the fishermen of Galilee, who, whatever may have been their discrepancies in detail, agree in this magnificent ideal of wisdom, holiness, lovingness. If this conception be a myth, humanity is better in its myths than it is in its realities.—Pearl of Tarsus.—Selected by W. G. Moncrieff.

The COVENANTS.

A TREATISE ON,

I. The Abrahamic covenant, its terms, its extent, its duration, its contemptees, and when possessed.

II. The Mosaic covenant, its terms, its relation to the Abrahamic covenant, where given, to whom given, the unity of the Law, its duration and its terminus, the Sabbath and its purposes.

III. The New covenant, the covenantees—not the church, but Israel; conditional prophecy considered, restoration from Babylon considered, future restoration of Israel as covenantees, our relation to the New covenant—as the Seed of the Abrahamic covenant, as the Mediation body, as a Royal and an Eternal Priesthood—now upon the plan of the dark ages and then through the veil upon the plane of spirit; restoration of the Aaronical order of priesthood in the Kadoc under the Prince and subordinate to the royal priesthood, the necessity and the nature of sacrifices in the ages to come.

IV. The Davidian covenant, its terms, the kingdom divided, the kingdom restored, the seed chastised, the kingdom to be restored under Messiah, the reign eternal.

V. Twelve objections to the position, that the kingdom of Christ is organization is yet future, answered, and the law of induction into the kingdom of the birth of the water and of the spirit.

This work is now in press and will be ready for distribution in June or early in July. It will make from 300 to 350 pages, and will sell for $1 per copy. We are now receiving names for the work, to be paid when the book is delivered. We want your assistance. Give us your name for the work.

THE TWO ADVENTS.

He came not with his heavenly crowns,
His sceptre clad with power;
His coming was in feebleness,
The infant of an hour.
An humble manger cradled first
The Virgin's lowly birth,
And loving hearts conspired that
The Lord of heaven and earth!

He came not with the robe of wrath,
With armour-bristled booby,
But on the darkening path of earth
To pour celestial sky;
To guide in peace the wandering feet,
The broken heart to bind,
And hear upon the faithful ear
The voice of all mankind.

And those had borne them to a lowlier perch,
A still more fitting place to be,
In humble cave and frigid hall,
Our Saviour's face to see;
And greet Him—the Eternal Branch
That on thy altar lies,
Long ere sin had been—shall be there,
A living sacrifice.

Yet once again—He shall be
Upon the heavens unveiled,
And earth and all its inhabitants
Be terribly afraid;
For not in weakness will He come,
Nor wear the crown of thorns,
But girt with all the Father's might,
His conquests and His glories.

The terrors of that awful day,
Or who shall bear or stand?
Or who abide when from its earth
Shall lift the hoary head?
The earth shall quake, the sea shall roar,
The sun be as a grave pale;
But those that love His name shall not fear these signs,
Thy faithful shall not fail.

Then stand ye, Saints, with upturned eyes,
Your time of watching here
That when upon the clouds of heaven
The glory shall appear,
Uplifting both your bowed heads
In triumph we may rise,
And where, with thy angel train,
Thy throne is, there also—

THE SIGN OF THE SON OF MAN.

There is no end to the different suggestions as to what this sign of the Son of Man will be. And I venture to add another which may be new to the readers of THE RESTITUTION. I have never heard it or seen it in print and it may be altogether new, yet new or old it seems to me worthy of attention. It will be noted that our Savior uses the definite article "the;" thereby showing that he had in mind a specific sign, and it would also imply that it was a sign already known. And this is the real fact; there had already been a sign of the Son of Man. A sign known and recognized not only at Jerusalem but in the far East among the famed Magi of Persia. And not only so but at the time our Savior spoke there had been but the one sign, and there has never since been added another. Hence I cannot see but we are shut up to the conclusion that "the sign of the Son of Man" remains still "the" sign. And we may expect its reappearance prior to or in conjunction with the Son of Man himself. And we may add that this latter thought is the more likely to be correct as the Star in the East did not make its appearance till the "Young Child" was born.

It seems certain therefore, or at least highly probable, that at the time of the second advent of our Savior, a bright and peculiar star will appear in the heavens in the latitude of Jerusalem which will attract universal attention, and convey to the thoughtful and pious the intelligence that the Master has come. To serve the purpose of a sign it must remain long enough suspended in the heavens to be a subject of study and investigation and hence of comment and conversation, that men may reap the benefit designed.

The 30th verse of Matt. xxiv. is full is as follows: "And then shall appear the sign of the Son of Man in heaven: and then shall all the tribes of the earth mourn, and they shall see the Son of Man coming in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory."

It thus appears that the appearance of the sign of the Son of Man in heaven is in close conjunction with the coming of the Son of Man himself in heaven. It would seem as if the Savior could hardly have more significantly pointed out or appointed the identity of the sign with the appearance of himself in the clouds of heaven than he has by this language.

It will then be asked, why did he refer to the sign at all if he himself is the sign? and if he is the sign how can a star be the sign? The answer is that he is to appear as "the Bright the Morning Star."

This I have more clearly shown in a former article to which the reader is referred. If Jesus than first appears with the holy city as a bright star—suspended over the region of Jerusalem long enough for every eye to see him, long enough for the bride to recognize his identity and rise to meet him; long enough for disaster to heap upon disaster and terror to succeed terror till "all the tribes of the earth mourn," he will accomplish in his own person all the requirements of a vision and fulfil all the particulars of the Scriptural account of "the sign of the Son of Man in heaven." And then when he descends "in power and great glory" to deliver Israel from his enemies all the prophecies on the subject will be exactly and literally fulfilled in the precise order laid down. I submit whether this thought is not well worthy the attention of those who are patiently waiting the coming of the Son of Man and look for his sign.

A FEARFUL PICTURE.

A. B. MACKEEVER.

What a striking testimonial of the fearful apostasy from the faith and practice of the Bible religion—and of the growing neglect and even contempt of God's law—"men waxing worse and worse, deceivers and being deceived," which it was predicted should characterize the perilous times of the last days" in which we are now living—is presented in the following graphic and truthful account of the religious state and condition of Europe, and which is fast becoming equally characteristic of the times in our own country. Let the reader ponder the moral lesson of warning.

Germany seems to be declining in its religious interests. In the city of Hamburg, which has a population of 150,000, there are but five parish churches, and of its people, 147,000 pay no manner of worship to God. In Berlin there are 670,000 Protestants, of these only two per cent. (11,000) attend church on Sundays, and among them nearly 3,000 go merely for a musical treat, leaving only about 8,000 real worshippers. The religious indifference of the people appears also in the fact that out of 23,968 burials, only 3,577, or less than fifteen per cent. were attended with a religious service. The church attendance of the Protestants in Darmstadt is only 3.3 per cent. of their number, and 31.5 per cent. of their marriages are without any religious service. In Geneva, the original seat of Calvinism, now a city of 25,000 souls, at the only Sunday service held there, the congregation numbered only 200 females and 23 males. Throughout Germany only 14 out of 100 persons attend any kind of religious service. In a large number of places the number of marriages and of burials which are performed without any recognition of even the forms of Christianity ranges all the way from thirty to sixty per cent. This fact shows, as almost no other circumstance could show, the dying out of all regard for religion. In most countries, even those persons who have given up all habitual observance of Christianity are anxious to have their dead buried with a religious form."—The Philadelphia Times.

Brother Kramer has given us a feast of gospel truth on the confession of Christ before men. Matt. x. 22: "Whoso confesseth me before men, him will I also confess before my Father which is in heaven."

This confession was made to embrace the faith, and the obedience of faith, as to Jesus' Messiahship. Nay more, the scriptural confession includes an open confession from the lips. We must believe with the heart and confess with the mouth, that Jesus is Lord to the glory of God the Father. Rom. x. 6-13; Phil ii. 11.

Furthermore, this confession recognizes the three-fold offices of Christ, as Prophet, Priest, and King. Of course this includes the second coming of our blessed Lord to reign, to judge, and bless in all the plenitude of the oath-confirmed promise to Abraham and his seed. Amen.

The grouping of the Scriptures was sublime. The foundation for faith and confession was made more firm than a pavement of granite rock. "Trust ye in the Lord Jehovah! for in the Lord Jehovah is everlasting strength—the rock of ages." In Hebrew the word for strength is rock, and that for everlasting is ages—hence we have "the rock of ages."

I would like to do more for the paper than I am doing, but at present I cannot. The fact is I have had poor health for the last seventeen years, much of the time not being able to perform manual labor of any kind, and of late have been obliged to retire from manual labor and also from preaching the word, the latter being quite a trial. My wife has also been sick since June last, not being able to attend to household duties. Doctors bills and hired help keeps us reduced financially. Yet we are told that everything works together for good to them that love the Lord, to them that are called according to his purpose. We have no doubt but that we are called according to his great purpose in purifying the earth and filling it with a pure and holy people. Hence it behooves us to make our calling and election sure.

Certain it is we hail with joy every note and tiding that comes from the East showing us that our redemption draweth nigh—showing us that the acceptable year is at hand. Then we can "Strike our sweet anthems of praise to the great Queen mingled with sorrow and pain. May the Lord sustain us and ask in his cause I am.

I am glad to see the hearty response by a Texas brother to Brother Magee's request. May the Lord stand by his truths and sustain it until it has accomplished its purpose.

Editor Restitution:

As I read the letters of encouragement and instruction I am led to think perhaps some would like to see a few words from our little company. I may say, we are not afraid of the gospel but are trying to abound in the work of the Lord.

Orthodoxy and infidelity hurl their threats at our ranks, but we have workers who are not afraid to take the "Sword of the Spirit" against all antagonism. Oh, how much we need to have on the whole armor in these times of peril that we may work successfully. How much we need the meek spirit of the Master and the great love that he possessed to enable us in our weakness to let our light shine that others may see our good works. As we look around on the dying, perishing sons of Adam, and realize that amongst them are our neighbors, our sons and daughters, oh how we long to cry out in the fulness of our hearts, "Repent and be converted that your sins may be blotted out."

Oh, brethren, this is no time for jars and dissension in the church of God. No time for pulling the mote out of your brothers' eye. No time to lay up the riches of earth and neglect to preach to dying men. No time to slumber until the Master comes, and lack oil in our lamps as did the foolish virgins. These are trying times to those who would live godly. The spirit of rebellion and ungodliness is so prominent in the world and even amongst ourselves that we see [illegible] and at what may be one in Christ, and that the love and sympathy that he possesses may become prominent in all our works and cement his children together in unity.

Brethren, work on, wield the trusty sword through all the storms of life, that beyond the clouds of darkness, beyond the gloom of Gentile times, be found the reign of the king of terrors, we may all meet in our Father's mansions.

Oh yes, by the eye of faith we can see across life's stormy billows grasp again the dear hands now cold in death and sing the song of the redeemed with the loved ones who cheer us in life's troubles. Earth's shadows will then have passed away and the bloom of Eden rest o'er all of God's creation.

May we all be there where all wrongs will be righted, all sorrows unknown, and all lives sweetly blend together in harmony to adore and worship our great Creator.

I am all alone in the enemy's land. During the last few years I have made the Bible the book of my choice and found it not to harmonize with the Orthodox view. My convictions have been that of the Advent and Church of God faith, having started in the ministry as a member of the F. B. Church, but I could not advocate the horrible doctrine on account of it not harmonizing with the Bible. I had to stick to the truth as taught by the oracles of God. I began to set life and death before the people, I also told them that we were not immortal or any part of us. That immortality was a thing to seek for and that without a resurrection we were entirely without a future hope. Persecutions began to assail me—was set out from the creed to which I belonged; a loving wife turned her back upon my faith; father, mother, brothers and sisters denounced my belief, infidelity was the cry, and thus I was almost wrecked. I have been robbed of all my earthly goods, I give it all for the truth's sake, they can take life but not my faith. I have been told by a friend that in fellowship I belong to the Advent faith; but victory is mine, the wife is coming to the faith, others are coming to the truth. The authority of God must stand and the decree of man must bow to it.

Yours Respectfully.

They grew in beauty, side by side,
They filled their home with glee—
Their graves are severed, far and wide,
By mount, and stream, and sea.

The same fond mother bent at night
Over each fair sleeping brow;
She had each folded flower in sight—
Where are those dreamers now?

By a dark stream is laid—

Sagacity of Shepherd Dogs.

Charles Hancock, the celebrated painter of animals, relates the following anecdote of some Scotch Collie dogs:

I was once staying with Lord Kinnaird at his seat in Scotland, when his lordship expressed a wish that I should see some of his prize sheep, which were then feeding with some hundreds more on the brow of a hill, nearly three miles from the house. Calling his shepherd, he kindly asked him to have the prize sheep fetched up as quickly as he could. The shepherd whistled, when a fine old sheep dog appeared before him, and seated on his hind-quarters, evidently awaited orders. What passed between the shepherd and the dog I know not, but the faithful creature manifestly understood his instructions.

"Do you believe that the dog will bring the sheep to us out of your large flock?" I asked.

"Wait awhile, and you will see," said his lordship.

The dog now darted off towards the sheep, at the same time giving a significant bark, which immediately called forth two younger sheep dogs to join in the mission. Accustomed as I was to the remarkably sagacity of the [illegible] at what now took place. On one side of the hill was a river, on the other side a dense forest. One of the younger dogs, on arriving at the foot of the hill, turned to the left, while the other darted off to the right hand. The former stationed himself between the sheep and the river, while the latter stood between the sheep and the forest. The old dog now darted into the middle of the flock, when the sheep scampered right and left, but were kept at bay by the two watchers. The old dog speedily singled out the particular sheep desired, and in a few minutes the three dogs were quietly driving them toward us.

Mother's Grave.

A wealthy merchant was passing out of the gate of a village cemetery when he met a group of children. Their intelligent countenances and subdued manner, evidently the result of grief, impressed him deeply. He followed them at a distance, observing them without letting them perceive that he was doing so. He saw the children go to a particular grave, which, from the direct path they took, he inferred must have been visited before by the same little feet. They stood by it for a few minutes looking at it, while tears trickled down their childish faces. Then the oldest girl knelt down and lovingly deposited a wreath on the grave, her sister and little brother meanwhile thoughtfully looking on. The children remained nearly an hour and then left it with reluctance.

The merchant was a childless man, but he loved children, and he was drawn toward the little group by sympathy with their evident grief. Only two years before in the same cemetery he had buried, within a few weeks of each other, his only son and daughter, and his house had for him still a forlorn and bereaved association. Its silence seemed to him like the silence of the tomb, and the pattering of tiny feet with which its rooms had once been familiar he missed sorely. He followed the children as they left the cemetery, drawn toward them by a fellowship of suffering. They had not far to go. A boarding-school stood a short distance away and they entered its gates and were lost to his sight. He walked sadly to the depot, whence he was swiftly carried to the city. On arriving at home he told his wife of the interest invoked by the children, and a project was discussed and decided on.

The next day the merchant was in the city again and called at the boarding-school to learn the story of the children. He was told that they were orphans. Their mother was Catherine Howard, a lady of education and refinement, but with little pecuniary resources. She had been left a widow when still young. Her husband had been carried off in all the strength of a healthy and robust manhood, and in his last moments had committed the children to her care. His temperate and thrifty habits enabled him to leave a small property, barely sufficient for their maintenance and education while they were little ones, and as for the future, he always said he could confidently confide them to God if he and their mother did not richly train them when they were young.

On the death of their father, she was the only assistant and constant aim of Catherine Howard. But after two years had passed, she was herself laid upon the bed of sickness, and unable to do anything but pray for her children and write a few loving words to them as they returned from school. When at length the doctor announced that there was no hope whatever of her recovery, though greatly distressed at first on account of the children, her firm trust in God soon enabled her to say "Thy will be done," and readily commit their temporal and spiritual interests to Him. Even before the final sentence passed by the doctor, her feeble frame gave way to the rapid consumption which had seized it, and her remains were carried by sympathizing neighbors to the quiet little cemetery where the merchant had met the children.

The merchant inquired as to the disposition of the children, and learned that it was worthy of all praise. He made their acquaintance, and after a year's interval, during which they often visited at his house, he and his wife adopted them as their own, and as the confidence their father and mother had placed in God's protecting care was fulfilled.

Obituary of One of Our Little Readers.

We are called this week to give an account of the death of one of our little readers in the Youths' Column. We hope all our young friends will learn to love and serve the dear Savior who loved the children and who said—"of such is the kingdom of heaven." The following is the account of the manner of the life and the death of one who read our Youths' Column. It is given in a letter from her mother.

Friends of The Restitution:

On the morning of the 23d of March, our darling little Flora, aged 12 years, 5 months, and 20 days, died of inflammation of the bronchial tubes caused by measles. For ten days and nights our little one suffered but without complaint, though she had scarcely ever been sick a day in her life. O, how anxiously we watched our little lamb hoping and fearing, struggling till the shadow of death covered our darling, and she reached out her little hand to bid us the last good by. O, how gladly we would have taken her place; life was so sweet to her—a heart so full of love and affection she saw the good in all—loving and beloved by her schoolmates—seeking and enjoying the society of the old, she found happiness in all things—on the farm, in the garden, every place was our little darling at home—her little willing hands and feet ready at every call. She seemed to have a strong desire to learn the Bible, always ready for meeting or Sunday School. Verses from the New Testament are written in all her books, with a spiritual tone in all her sentiments. In one book we found where she had made a picture of a child with hands folded in prayer with a sweet childish petition underneath. So often lately she has inquired—"Ma, how long do you think it will be before Christ will come?" She always read the children's part in THE RESTITUTION as soon as it came. O, how long will the tyrant reign and tear from us our darling babes and leave us desolate? O, the longing that cannot be filled. We feel how little value is the glitter and wealth of all this world.

Six of our family had measles, and were all very sick. Brother Hatch's family, living near lent us a helping hand. Anorah helped to make our darling's last dress, and she fixed her so sweet that she looked like an angel asleep. All through her sickness such a heavenly smile was on her lips that all noticed it, and she appreciated every attention. Mrs. Buford and Mrs. Brooks came to us in our distress, leaving their own. Others were kind, and all have our heartfelt thanks. Now we are left and must take up the thread of life and toil—waiting and watching for the day when there is no more death, and when sorrow shall flee away.

Yours in hope

WILLIAM MELVIN.

THE MODERN CANAANITES.

There are some 200,000 Canaanites still living in Syria. Most of them reside in the far north of the land on the northern sides of Mt. Lebanon. Among these Canaanites we find the Arkite still living in his city and Area, and the Sinite at Sin, the ancient seat of this people. Raud or Arvad, Zemri, and Hamath are still found upon every modern map of the country as active towns (read Gen. x. 15-20); and it is impossible to hear little children in the street calling the pieces of their homes by the names given to them 4,000 years or more ago. The [illegible] the southwest of Lebanon, between Lebanon and Hermon, are villages of these people, who were driven further from the south by Joshua the son of Nun, and are ever since held their own in the midst of a surging, and changing population. The people as a whole are called Nusairiyeh. They have a peculiarly heavy and forbidding physiognomy, are fearfully depraved and licentious, and their present immoral character justifies the fate assigned to them by Jehovah, as food for the sword of Joshua and the children of Israel. But little was known about them until nearly twenty years ago. They are very exclusive and uncommunicative, and look and act as though they had a grudge against every man and every man a grudge against them. About twenty years ago, however, one of their number, Suleiman Efendi (Solomon the Noble), deserted their ranks and embraced the Christian religion. He made a complete exposure of their moral and religious state. Shortly after this event (1865) the village of [illegible] revolted and turned to the missionaries of the American Board for advice and instruction. This act was accompanied by the utmost sufferings inflicted by the Greek Bishop and the Turkish Government. The people were driven out of their houses, everything broken that could be broken, eaten that could be eaten, and the women left to the brutal lusts of the Turkish soldiers. In the dreadful situation they were overtaken by two cholera, and untold sorrows were endured. But they remained steadfast to their confessed Christ and of some of them it could be said: of [illegible] not found a street faith, no, not in Israel." But persecution preceded persecution, and their cries became so intolerable that in an hour of mingled despair and hope they went out and cut down the cedars and trees and tore up their vineyards and made so complete a destruction of their homes that the Government, which allowed them to return to their village, were likewise deprived of their gardens. They are, however, nearly all back, the storm and their spirits have greatly improved. They are looking forward to Christmas as the occasion to [illegible] the locust and the Syrian cicada season. Since [illegible] spoiling the fields and vineyards, we, we [illegible] record that a Canaanite has been the object of Christ's pitying grace until this record [illegible] of the Spirit, which seems to be the record of a genuine work by the Holy [illegible] of God.

TAKE NOTICE.

By a mistake on the part of our pressman, we have not added an extra leaf of our first page to-day, and persons wishing tracts to distribute should avail themselves of this opportunity at once. There are six kinds; "Is our belief A sin to some not a heresy," "State of man in death," and "Life and death." We will send postpaid 50 copies of these tracts for 20c., or 100 copies for 35c.

We have also just printed a new edition of "A letter to a Friend," on the covenants of promise by Mrs. C. C. Woodard. Single copies 10c., seven for 50c., sixteen for $1.00.

The Restitution.

"THE RESTITUTION OF ALL THINGS WHICH GOD HATH SPOKEN BY THE MOUTH OF ALL HIS HOLY PROPHETS SINCE THE WORLD BEGAN."

VOL. XXXI. PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, MAY 10, 1882. NO. 18.

THE RESTITUTION.

TERMS--TWO DOLLARS PER YEAR, Payable in advance. Three and Six Months at the same rate.

Address all Letters and Communications to The Restitution, Plymouth, Indiana.

TO CORRESPONDENTS:

THE RESTITUTION advocates the Acts "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christian King of Kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

COMING AGE---ITS PROXIMITY.
No. 110.

Analysis of Rev. xiii. Continued. Persecution of the Saints. Same Power as the Little Horn of Dan. vii. Civil Power the Executioner: Papal Hierarchy the Court. Ecclesiastical Element of the Seven-Headed and Ten-Horned Beast. Two-Horned Beast, another Civil Power, Causes an Image of the First Beast to be Made.

J. P. WEETHEE.

Rev. xiii. 4. "And they worshipped the dragon which gave power unto the beast: and they worshipped the beast, saying, Who is like unto the beast? Who is able to make war with him?" This worship had two elements of idolatry: (1) a servile devotion to the beast itself; (2) the ascribing to the beast of Divine power: "Who is able to make war with him?" allowing the beast might, which belongs to God only.

Verse 5. "And there was given unto him a mouth (an extra mouth) speaking great things and blasphemies; and power was given unto him to continue forty (and) two months."

"A mouth was given to him." As a body, or government, civil, a mouth or power to speak, and issue edicts, was one of its national attributes; the mouth given him was an extra attribute: this is evidently the one belonging to the little horn (Dan. vii. 8), since it speaks, as that mouth spake, the eyes were there also, since it is evidently the same power: for "it was given to continue (make war) forty (and) two months"--the length of the war on the saints by the little horn. Dan. vii. 25.

Verses 6-10. "And he opened his mouth in blasphemy against God, to blaspheme his name, and his tabernacle, and them that dwell in heaven. And it was given unto him to make war with the saints, and to overcome them: and power was given him over all kindreds, and tongues, and nations. And all that dwell upon the earth shall worship him, whose names are not written in the book of life of the lamb slain from the foundation of the world. If any man have an ear, let him hear. He that leadeth into captivity shall go into captivity: he that killeth with the sword must be killed with the sword. Here is the patience and the faith of the saints."

1. It must be readily seen that the fourth beast of Dan. vii., and the beast here described by John, are identical.

2. The persecuting and blaspheming elements described above, and in Dan. vii. 21-27, are the same.

3. These elements belong to that body of human rulers; in a word, the fourth monarchy is the saints' executioner; while his ecclesiastical court, symbolized by the eyes and mouth of the little horn in Dan. vii. and the extra mouth of this first beast, seen and described by John, is the court that apprehended, tried, and convicted the said saints.

4. This body of civil rulers, under a scarlet guise, the dress of the harlot, carries the harlot to the bar of the judgment of the Ancient of days. Dan. vii. 9, 10. This will be more particularly noticed when we examine Rev. xvii.

Verse 11. "And I beheld another beast coming up out of the earth; and he had two horns like a lamb, and he spake like a dragon." This verse gives a personal description. He comes out of the earth: with lamb's horns and a dragon's mouth.

Verses 12-18. "And he exerciseth all the power of the first beast before him, and causeth the earth and them which dwell therein to worship the first beast whose deadly wound was healed. And he doeth great wonders, so that he maketh fire come down from heaven on the earth in the sight of men. And deceiveth them that dwell on the earth by (the means of) those miracles which he had power to do in the sight of the beast; saying to them that dwell on the earth, that they should make an image to the beast, which had the wound by the sword, and did live. And he had power to give life unto the image of the beast, that the image of the beast should both speak, and cause that as many as would not worship the image of the beast should be killed. And he caused all, both small and great, rich and poor, free and bond, to receive a mark in their right hand, or in their foreheads: And that no man might buy or sell, save he that had the mark, or the name of the beast, or the number of his name. Here is wisdom. Let him that hath understanding count the number of the beast: for it is the number of a man; and his number is, six hundred threescore and six."

We have here three problems to solve: each one of which is supposed to involve more or less difficulties. For a more easy solution of the three, we shall commence with the second:--What is the image to the beast?

An image is a likeness, or imitation of any thing: something that is constructed after a pattern; as the tabernacle was made after a pattern shown Moses in the mount. It was the image of the heavenly tabernacle—the universe. Political and moral images can be formed. One person may be the image of another. Christ is the image of God. 2 Cor. iv. 4. Col. i. 15; iii. 10. A church can be an image of a state. Its organic structure may be an imitation of a civil establishment.

This image was made in imitation of, and for, the first beast which is clearly shown to be Daniel's fourth beast—a body of civil rulers—and truly and properly the Latin empire. After its formation it was the beast's constant companion, and an object of worship with the beast:—"Worship the beast and his image." Rev. xiv. 9, 10. "Victory over the beast and his image." Rev. xv. 2. "Them that worship his (beast's) image." Rev. xix. 20. "Not worshipped the beast, neither his image." Rev. xx. 4. They seem as closely connected as the harlot and beast in Rev. xvii. 1. And why are they not identical? Their relationship is the same: their worship is similar, and their structure is similar. Rome civil, and Rome ecclesiastical, are alike. One is the image of the other. Can any one read the history of the rise and establishment of the Papal hierarchy, without noticing its exact likeness? From the Pope to the least officer in the Roman church. Lord Middleton, in his visit to Rome, thus wrote: "You may there see the present people of Rome, worshipping at this day, in the same temples (as those built by the heathen)—at the same altars—sometimes the same images, and (almost) with the same ceremonies, as the old Romans; they must have more charity, as well as skill in distinguishing, than I pretend to, who can absolve them from the same crime of superstition and idolatry with their ancestors."

The Roman hierarchy has a similar head—Pope—emperor. In the place of the Roman senate, they have a college of cardinals; Bishops of various grades in the place of Governors of provinces. Their territory is similarly divided—on the same territory were erected two empires; the one civil; the other ecclesiastical; the ecclesiastical being the younger, is the image of the former. The image is, therefore, the harlot—the Roman hierarchy. This is a moral demonstration; and the middle problem is solved.

We are now prepared to investigate the first problem, the two-horned beast. What power is symbolized by the two-horned beast? To answer this question requires a wider range of investigation. Who made the image? The two-horned beast caused it to be made. His acts may be divided as follows:—(1.) He exerciseth all the power of the first beast; (2.) Caused all to worship the first; (3.) Caused fire to come down from heaven in the sight of men: (4.) saying that they (people) should make an image to the first beast. (5.) He gave life to the image—power to speak and persecute. (6.) Caused all to receive a mark of the first beast.

What power outside of the Latin empire answers to these six distinctive features; also, to two others?

1. It is a civil power, since its symbol is a beast.

2. It must be erected on the territory of one of the four universal monarchies, but it could not arise on the proper territory of the fourth monarchy, since that was then occupied by the Latin kingdom and his family.

3. It must synchronize with the first beast during these acts.

4. It must be in the presence of the first beast—his neighbor.

5. It must do these six acts stated above, viz: exercise all the power of the first beast; cause all to worship said power; cause fire to come down from heaven; order an image to be made; give life to the image and make it a persecutor; cause a mark to be made; cause all to receive the mark. It has to answer, in these nine particulars, since it cannot be the first beast, nor it- rider, the harlot; as the harlot and image are identical: we must look for another empire that will answer the conditions of the prophecy.

We shall now search history to find a power, civil, that will answer the symbols of the two-horned beast, being persuaded that it has had its day: since no such a power is named as taking a part in the final great national struggle. Our attention has been directed to one power for the last thirty-six years. We have seen no reason, during that time, to change our view.

God was pleased to outline the four great monarchies of the Gentile world to Daniel his beloved prophet by a variety of symbols: such as the metallic image, and four great beasts. History has followed the order of these symbols. John's visions cover the fourth of these great monarchies. Two of these empires were in the East—in Asia; and two were in the West—in Europe. The Bible distinguishes between the "lives" of these kingdoms, and their "dominion." The territory on which the government was erected, belonged to it as its original possession; this was its farm, its home; here it lived. Kingdoms subdued by it formed its dominion. These four monarchies had their original locations. In the order named these kingdoms, by conquest, became universal. Babylonia with its surroundings was the original territory of the first of these four kingdoms; Media and Persia that of the second; Macedonia and Greece, that of the third; and Italy and Western Europe constituted the original territory of the fourth monarchy. God parceled out the world to these four Gentile races. No two was to occupy the same original territory. Ambitious aspirations carried them each far beyond its proper limits. As each succeeding kingdom took away the dominion of the preceding nation, the conquered one fell back, dependent, into its original territory. Three of these nations have passed through these revolutions. Dan. vii. 12.

The times about which we are now writing have nothing to do with the first two kingdoms; and but little with the first form of the third kingdom. Under Alexander the Great, king of Macedonia and Greece, that kingdom became a universal monarchy. It then appeared unto Daniel, under the symbol of a one-horned he-goat. His dominion, under his generals, was erected into four lesser kingdoms, but adhering to the same great family, they are therefore called horns, or powers, civil, of the Grecian family. These were towards the four winds of heaven. Dan. viii. 8; xi 4. It will be seen that the third, or Grecian kingdom, has its power divided into two parts, called former time, and latter time. Dan. viii. 23. The former time belonged to Alexander, and his successors; the latter time we shall now proceed to notice. When does it commence? What is its history? It arises at that period in the world's history "when the transgressors are come to the full." Dan. viii. 23. Let us give a brief sketch of the latter times of the Grecian empire. Under the reign of Constantine the Great, who died A. D. 337, a new colony was planted on the confines of Europe and Asia. It was composed, originally, of a Grecian colony, whose chief town was Byzantium. He searched many localities, and fixed upon that spot, declaring that God, in a vision, had so ordered him.

He at first proposed to build his contemplated city on the spot where the Romans first had their origin. This fabled spot was selected, and he began to build the capital of his empire, when by Divine direction, he removed operations to Byzantium.

We shall not name the power till we have fully described a power that will answer the description in all the various particulars

ORIENTAL SKETCHES.---No. 13.

Bashan and its Giant Cities.

J. L. PORTER, A. M.

The morning we left Suweideh dawned gloomy and threatening. A heavy thunder-storm had passed over the place during the night. Never before in Syria had I seen rain heavier or lightening more vivid. For an hour or more the flashes seemed to form one continuous stream, lighting up the ruins of the city, and the glens and rocks of the neighboring mountains with an intense though lurid blaze. In the morning, dark, lowering clouds still swept along the surface of the ground, and enveloped the whole mountains. The air was cold, and the smart showers which fell at intervals made it feel still colder; but as the wind was high, and veering round to the north, we knew the day would be fine; for the Scripture statement still holds good in Scripture lands.—"Fair weather cometh out of the north." Job xxxvii. 22.

A few minutes' ride down the rocky slope of the ridge on which Suweideh stands brought us into the plain of Bashan, properly so called. I had heard much of its richness. I had heard of the wonderful productiveness of that deep, black, loamy soil, of the luxuriance of its grass, and of its teeming crops of grain; but up to the moment I first set foot on it, I thought—indeed I was fully persuaded—that a large amount of exaggeration must run through all those glowing descriptions. Now I saw that there had been no exaggeration, and that [illegible] time could be compared in fertility to the plain of Bashan [illegible] over the parcelled tribes [illegible] Manasseh made choice of this district country, preferring its wooded hills and grassy plains to the comparatively bleak and bare range west of the Jordan, visible from the heights of Moab. The plain extended in one unbroken expanse, flat as the surface of a lake, for forty miles, to the base of Hermon. Little hills—some conical, some cup-shaped—rise at intervals like islands, and over their surface, and sometimes round their bases, are scattered fragments of porous lava, intermixed with basalt of a firmer texture; but the rest of the soil is entirely free from stones. On or beside these tells many of the ancient towns stand; and their black walls, houses, and towers, shattered by time and the horrors of war, often look in the distance like natural cliffs.

The Roman road which anciently connected Damascus and Bostra, passing close to some of the chief cities of Bashan, lay a few hundred yards to the right of our path. Its line can still be traced,—indeed the old pavement is in many places quite perfect, as much so as any part of the Appian way; and yet, in a ride of some twenty miles this day along that route, we did not meet, we did not see, a single human being. The "way-faring man" has "ceased" here, and "the highways are desolate." Before reaching the town of Ary, about eight miles from Suweideh, we passed two villages, and we saw four others a little way up the mountain side, on the left,—all of which contain a few families of Druses; while away on the plain, to the right, not less than five towns were in view in one moment, entirely deserted. The words of Jeremiah are surely fulfilled: "I beheld, and lo there was no man. . . . . I beheld, and, lo, the fruitful place was a wilderness, and all the cities thereof were broken down at the presence of the Lord, and by his fierce anger." Jer. xl. 25, 26.

The town of Ary stands on a rocky tell. It is about a mile in circuit; but there are no buildings of any importance; nor are there any traces of wealth or architectural beauty. It appears to have been a plain country town, which became the seat of a bishopric about the fourth century, as we learn from the old ecclesiastical records.

We had ascended the hill side, and were quietly occupied in examining the ruins of what seemed to have been a church, when a party of inhabitants came up, headed by their sheikh, and invited us to accept of their hospitality. They would take no excuse. It would be a disgrace to their village if they would permit us to pass: it would be an insult to their chief if we should attempt it. They entertained as Abraham would have done at his tent door, or Lot at the gate of Sodom. We entered the sheikh's house; and while coffee was being prepared, the whole household—in fact a great part of the town—got into a state of commotion. A woman came into the apartment with a large copper vessel in her hand,—took a measure of flour out of a huge earthen jar in the corner, poured on water, and commenced the process of "kneading unleavened cakes." A moment afterward we heard a confused noise of cackling and screaming; then a flock of hens flew in terror past the open door, followed by a troop of women and boys in full chase. We saw they had resolved to make us "a feast." The flocks were at a distance, and it would take hours to obtain a lamb or kid,—fowls must therefore serve as a substitute. We were fully aware of the despatch of Arab cooks, and that in this respect they were not surpassed even by the patriarchal; but our time was too precious to be wasted in mere ceremony, however interesting. Firmly, but respectfully, we assured our worthy host that we must proceed at once to Bozrah. To the evident regret of the stately sheikh, and the unbounded astonishment of crowds of his people, who gathered round us, and who could not understand how it was possible for any polite or respectable person to decline proffered hospitality, we mounted our horses and rode off.

Our route lay near the base of the mountains of Bashan, which rose up in dark frowning masses on our left, most of their conical peaks wooded to the summit. Kuleib, the highest of the [illegible] in full view, its top covered with [illegible] spurs here shot far out into the plain, having between them rich vales covered with luxuriant pastures. Through the midst of each vale, between high alluvial banks, now flowed a tiny winter stream. Passing the villages of Mujelmir and Wetr, we gained the crest of a ridge commanding a noble view over the plain southward. We drew bridle for a few minutes, to examine more minutely this magnificent panorama. On the west, south, and south-east, the plain was unbounded. Every section of it to which we turned our eyes was thickly dotted with large towns and villages; yet, with the exception of a few spots near us, there was no cultivation, and we did not see a single tree or bush on that vast expanse. Mahmood pointed out the more important cities. One southward, some five miles distant, a broad black belt extended far across the green plain; in the midst of it rose the massive towers and battlements of a great castle; while other towers and tapering minarets shot up here and there. That was Bozrah, the ancient stronghold of Bashan, the capital of the Roman province, and the first city in Syria captured by the Saracens. We saw Jomurrin, Keires, Burd, Ghusam, and a host of others on the right and left—all deserted. Low in a valley, on the south-east, lay the widespread ruins and ancient colossal house of Kerioth, one of the old cities on the plain of Moab, Jer. xlviii. 24; while away beyond it, on the horizon, rose a graceful conical hill, crowned with the castle of Salcah, which Joshua mentions as the eastern limit of Bashan, and of the kingdom of the giant Og. Josh. xiii. 11, 12.

This southern section of Bashan is richer in historic and sacred associations than the northern. I looked at it now spread out before me with feelings such as I cannot describe. Those large deserted cities, that noble but desolate plain,—the whole history of the country for four thousand years, from the Rephaim down to the Osmanlis, is written there. The massive dwellings show the simple style and ponderous workmanship of Giant architects. Jewish masonry and names; Greek inscriptions and temples; Roman roads; Christian churches; Saracenic mosques; Turkish desolations;—all, all are there; and all alike are illustrations of the accuracy and confirmations of the truth of the Bible.

JEWISH QUESTION IN ROME.

Public interest in the Jewish question is as great in Italy as in other countries. The vivid contrast of their present condition with the persecutions they have suffered in the past in Rome, is an honor to the present government. Here the Jews have a history second only to that of Palestine. A Jewish colony existed here before the time of Julius Cæsar, and the Ghetto has been inhabited by them since Titus brought thousands of captives from Jerusalem. Their five synagogues are all built on the site of the ancient one where their forefathers worshipped centuries ago.

The Colosseum was built by twelve thousand Jewish captives: the public squares of Rome often witnessed their martyrdom, and the prisons their torture. The Jews ran races during the Carnival on the Corso, and when they were finally permitted to substitute horses, an annual tax was laid upon them. They were obliged to stand on the bridge of St. Angelo when the Pope passed, with the Old Testament in their hands, and be publicly vituperated because they denied the New Testament. No shame, no reproach, no tax or torture was spared them. But the dark night of their sorrows is passed. There is now no difference between them and other Italian citizens, except perhaps an unusual kindness and attention to their asylums and schools, as if the modern Romans would thus atone for the sins of their fathers. The changes in the city will soon require the destruction of the Ghetto, where the poor Jews live and have leases on their houses made centuries ago, which gives them now at a merely nominal rent. But when the time comes to remove them they will be treated justly and generously.

The wealthier Jews are in parliament; they are professors in the university and superior schools; philosophers, doctors, lawyers, merchants, editors. They are rich and honored, and they love the youthful nation which, in breaking its own bonds, liberated them also from the oppression of ages.

The tempest has raged for the Jews in Germany, Russia, Roumania, Morocco, and Tunis; but in Italy, Holland, England and the United States they are protected, and not a shadow of the old hatred disturbs the present tranquility.

The Jews number in Europe about six million, 2,700,000 being estimated in Russia alone. A large proportion, according to population, is in Roumania, and their exclusion from equal rights in that country, about two years ago, excited the indignation of the other European nations.

In Germany their number and influence are constantly increasing, their number in Berlin alone being now 45,000, whereas in the beginning of this century it was very small. The Roumanians see in them the future ministers, deputies, and bankers of the kingdom; the Germans have their Rothschilds, Mendelssohns, Baumgarten, Lasker, and Auerbach; the Russian peasants rebel against the supremacy which the Jews have acquired by their industry, economy, and genius, and which, it must be confessed, they do not always use with moderation.

The record of the outrages in Russia, which began in June at Elizabethgrad and ended on Christmas Day at Warsaw, is still fresh in our minds, and we ask ourselves, in wonder, if the Middle Ages have returned. One hundred thousand families were reduced to poverty or sent into exile; many were murdered. Petitions were made that the Jews should have neither synagogues nor schools, and the Jewesses should wear neither silk nor satin, and forty-one towns were destroyed by fire.

If the sanguinary scenes committed in Russia are not possible in Germany and Austria, on account of the superior culture of the people, the antipathy is not less, and it even perhaps intensified by the rank and position of those who indulged in it. The chief crime of the Israelites of Germany is that they are too rich and too powerful. They represent the largest banking institutions, the most powerful business houses, and in the arts and sciences, as well as the professions, the highest genius. Heine once wrote that "Judaism is not a religion, but a misfortune," and this was verified when Pastor Stocker said "forty-five thousand Jews in Berlin are too many." This was the origin of that persecution which spread like a flame, not only over Germany, but over Russia.—Sotia Bompiani, in N. Y. Observer.

PALESTINE.

But, as by common instinct, the thoughts of all nations turn to Palestine as the ultimate refuge of the persecuted Jews. In a Russian town last year they were driven from their homes to the refrain: "Go to Palestine! Go to Palestine!" The heart of the faithful Jew responds to this even when the "red cock crows," and he sees the terrified faces of his beloved ones by the lurid glare of his burning possessions. "The dominant idea of the Eastern Jew, whatever may be that of his co-religionist in Western countries, is to return to Palestine." This is the observation of Mr. Laurence Oliphant, who is occupying himself in a colonization scheme for their relief. Not only the poor, who might desire the return in order to share in the charity which is dispensed in Jerusalem, but the wealthy Jew also thinks of inhabiting once more the land of his forefathers. This is no longer a dream of visionary Bible readers, but an actual reality. The desert already begins to rejoice and blossom as the rose. More than one wealthy Jew is farming in Palestine, and about five years ago a colony was formed near Lydda. This colony possesses a territory five miles long and one and a quarter wide, owned by eighty families. In Moldavia there is an emigration society of 1,000 persons, who have decided to colonize Palestine, and a similar society exists at Galatz, where many families have subscribed the funds necessary to buy ground and implements in the Holy land. There are also colonization societies in Czeu and Bucharest of Roumania, and the movement is constantly extending in Russia. Many Jewish capitalists of Russia have resolved to erect factories at Jaffa, where there is already an agricultural colony. Old rabbis of the strictest orthodoxy have recently said that "whosoever puts his hand to the working of the soil of the Holy Land acts more meritoriously than he who passes his time, day and night, in the study of the Beth Hamedrash." The English sympathizers with the emigrants will appoint an agent at Jerusalem to protect them from the local authorities and select places for them. There is an old law in Turkey by which great privileges are afforded to colonists, and the general laws affecting the tenure of land are remarkably just. There are large tracts of rich waste land in certain parts of the country to which three years occupation gives a prescriptive title. The Turkish government is not unwilling to receive Jewish emigrants provided they will consider themselves subjects of the existing government. Two years ago Mr Oliphant proposed a scheme of Jewish emigration to the Porte which political complications prevented from being accomplished. Another effort recently made has resulted in the purchase of land near Palestine. These capitalists have a fund of two million pounds sterling, and already have agents in all the provinces of Turkey. The Israelite alliance is sending boys from nine to fifteen years of age from the persecuted districts of Russia to Jaffa. Companies of these children will be sent frequently from Odessa, Kew and Elizavetgrad to learn agriculture in the Holy Land, and grow up with the thoughts and habits of the country. The emigration of the Jews to the east begins to engage the attention of the local press there. The principal Greek journal publishes a long article on the inconveniences and dangers which would result from the settling of large numbers of Jews in the provinces of Turkey. The writer, after explaining the habits of the Jews and their peculiar tendencies, calls the attention of the government to the subject and exhorts it to prevent their emigration. But as the Ottoman government is no longer supreme in Turkey, this warning will have little influence on the question, which now seems to be one that interests all the nations.—N. Y. Post.

THE RESTITUTION.

S. A. CHAPLIN, EDITOR.

Plymouth, Indiana, May 10, 1882.

We have decided to go East next week if nothing unforseen should transpire to hinder.

When flooded with communications some must be deferred. Our space is limited, our readers demand variety, our labors are arduous and perplexing, and we are very imperfect, but with God's blessing will try to do the best we can. Pray for us.

To our ministering brethren in making appointments would first ascertain the desires of the churches as to having preaching, it would be far better for all. Appointments sent without my consultation, may be wholly importune, or may clash with other arrangements.

The book of human history has its dark pages from the very first. The unwritten leaves are filling up with records of a useless dismal character. Consuming fires, devastating floods, contagious diseases, and red-handed crimes, now beset the chapters narrating passing events. The end is not yet. All these are but the beginning of sorrows—the foreshadowings of the last-day troubles.

The following item of news and editorial brevity is from the Evening Journal of May 6th. It is all we have space left for in the present number DUBLIN, May 6.—Lord Frederick Cavendish and Under Secretary Burke were murdered this evening in Phœnix Park. Only last Thursday Lord Frederick Cavendish was appointed by the Gladstone Government as Chief Secretary for Ireland, to succeed Mr. Forster, with Thomas Henry Burke as Under-Secretary, and on last Saturday he reached Dublin to enter upon his official duties. On the evening of that day while taking a stroll together in Phœnix Park, these two gentleman were set upon by armed assassins, who had hastily driven up in a carriage, and, after a desperate struggle—neither of the assailed gentlemen being armed—both of them fell bleeding and dying, in which condition they were discovered by passers-by, while the assassins fled undetected. The murdered men were literally carved to death with knives, both of them being covered with stabs. Before they could be removed to their quarters they were dead. The assassination of the Queen or of Gladstone could scarcely have shocked the British nation more profoundly or aroused popular feeling to greater intensity than has this sudden and bloody tragedy, which, as an act without justification and utterly diabolical, finds its historical parallel only in the shooting of Garfield by the wretch Guiteau.

The following remarks on the symbolism of baptism are extracted from a sermon preached by J. H. Pettingell, A. M., on Sunday, April 16, in Wilmington, Del. It is only since we learned that the life everlasting is from Christ, and attained only by a resurrection from the dead, that we could see the force of the apostle's question—"Else what shall they do which are baptized for the dead, if the dead rise not at all? Why are they then baptized for the dead?" This is, in short, to say—Why practice an action showing a resurrection of the dead by a similitude, and at the same time deny this resurrection? From Rom. vi. 3, 4, 17, taken collectively, we learn baptism was a form—Greek, τυπος, model, pattern, example—of the death, burial, and resurrection of Jesus Christ, as well as of the resurrection of his people. The doctrine taught was the resurrection, and its representative model is baptism. As the letter corresponds to the type, and the medal or coin to the die, so must the likeness between the resurrection from the dead and its representative ordinance exactly correspond. We may remark that sprinkling, pouring, and trine immersion want the requisite resemblance:

"I have always stood by the simplicity of the gospel and its ordinances and institutions, and have opposed that propensity, which has ever manifested itself in the church of Christ, to magnify the importance of forms and ceremonies and to make a merit of outward acts, and to depend upon them, rather than on the inward grace which can alone give them any efficacy. Still we have need of both in our present state. Religious truth needs to be objectively represented, or we lose our hold upon it, and it is soon forgotten.

But since I have come to see, size Christ as the Resurrection and the Life, as man's only source of life from the dead, I have come to see a new meaning and force in this rite of baptism, which I had never seen before, and which, alas, the great majority of the Christian church have long ignored, and which too many even of those who practiced it in plain by immersion fail to recognize, but which cannot be represented exemplin by the ordinal form of its administration.

I have come to see in the dying and beauty in this ordinance, which Christ instituted as the initiatory ordinance of the Christian dispensation, and a new truth, not merely in the word baptize, but also in those passages which represent the believer as buried with him in baptism, and rising with him to the new life beyond—a truth which is greatly obscured, or entirely hidden by the false philosophy in which I was educated, and which so extensively prevails throughout Christendom.

These texts which are regarded as obscure, or at most as referring to primitive wishes and customs, which the world has outgrown, and are thought to be no longer obligatory on us, set forth unmistakably the great Christian doctrine of the resurrection—a doctrine which was first in the thoughts of the primitive disciples, and upon which they rested all their hopes for the life to come. Though as a doctrine it is still left in our creeds, it has but little influence over the faith of the disciples of the present day.

Why should it have any place in the thoughts of men, or in the creeds of the church, if the prevalent philosophy is true? If death is not actual death, but only a change of state; if we are immortal by nature, and need no Savior to give us immortality; if when men seem to die, they only go into another world, the righteous indeed to be blessed forever, and the wicked to be forever miserable, then why should there be any resurrection from the dead? Why should the Christian comfort himself in the loss of believing friends or in the prospect of his own death with the thought that the dead shall all be raised at the coming of Christ, and that he will then claim his own, and that they shall forever thereafter be with the Lord, if, as the popular theology teaches, they go at once to be with him when they die?

If every man rises by a natural process of development, and not because of anything that Christ has done, as this philosophy teaches, then surely we are not indebted to him for the hope of living again after death.

It is now evident to me that this great and glorious doctrine, which occupied so prominent a place in the teachings of our Lord and in the faith of the early disciples, has lost its true place in the Christian system, through the influence of this Platonic philosophy, that came in so early to corrupt the faith of the Christian church. It would not have been so easily displaced had the ordinance of baptism been allowed to continue in its original form, to bear its testimony to the death, burial and resurrection of our Lord, as the true foundation of all our Christian hopes. Its testimony needed to be suppressed and its form of administration changed, in order to an easy victory of the doctrine of the natural immortality of man.

Nor do I believe that this lost faith will be restored to the church without the restoration of the form of this Christian rite, that it may testify, as it originally did, and as it was designed to testify, not merely to the need of the regenerating influence of the Holy Spirit, but also to the death of the believer to sin and on account of sin and his resurrection to a new spiritual life, and from the power of death in the grave, to an immortal life through Christ the Savior.

When one comes to recognize the true meaning of this rite, those passages of Scripture bearing on this point become clear and full of meaning. Take the following passage in 1 Cor. xv. 29: "Else what shall they do which are baptized for the dead, if the dead rise not at all? Why are they then baptized for the dead?"

This passage has given commentators a great deal of trouble. A great many different solutions have been proposed, which I will not take time now to notice, for none of them have been really satisfactory to those who have offered them, much less to others.

It occurs in Paul's masterly argument, beginning in the twelfth verse, to the end of the chapter, on this very question of the resurrection of the dead—and evidently makes one of the main points in his argument. He is showing that as Christ rose from the dead, so his people will rise, and because he rose. That this is their only ground of hope for living again. If he did not rise, or rather had not risen, all their hopes of living again would be vain, and they who had already died must inevitably have gone to naught, or perished, as would all who should hereafter die. And then he inquires, what is the use or meaning of this ordinance of baptism which signifies, by its very mode, this very doctrine—death, burial and then, a resurrection? Why are they baptized for the dead, or for their belief in the doctrine of the resurrection of the dead? "Why stand we in jeopardy every hour" for a doctrine which has no solid foundation in the resurrection of our Lord?

When we read this passage in this sense, as a part of Paul's argument, it is exactly in point, and perfectly luminous. And there seems to be no other consistent or sensible interpretation that can be put upon it.

The Greeks of Corinth, as well as those of Athens so far as the philosophy of Plato prevailed among them, believed in a ghostly kind of future state, such as that philosophy teaches at the present day. None of them would have been surprised, or offended, if he had only preached a future life apart from Christ and a state of rewards and penalties hereafter, for they all believed this, both Jews and Greeks. But we are told that when they heard of the resurrection of the dead, some mocked, and others said, We will hear thee again of this matter." And especially, when he founded this doctrine on the resurrection of Christ, they called him a "setter forth of strange gods." No wonder it was if and necessary to change the form of this Christian ordinance of baptism—which so evidently symbolized this doctrine of the resurrection of the dead—in order that the doctrine of Plato which promises to all men life after death, as a law of nature, and an immortality of their own, without a Savior, might have free course and be glorified.

Again. How evident the allusion to this mode of baptism, and how forcible in this view, and how entirely vague, in any other, is this passage, Rom. vi. 3-5: "Know ye not that so many of us as were baptized into Jesus Christ were baptized into his death, that like as Christ was raised up from the dead by the glory of the Father, even so we also should walk in the newness of life. For if we have been planted together in the likeness of his death, we shall be also in the likeness of his resurrection."

See also a similar passage in Col. ii. 12: "Buried with him in baptism, wherein also ye are risen with him, through the faith of the operation of God, who hath raised him from the dead." It is to be observed that the apostle, in the context, takes occasion to warn these Colossians of the [illegible] of living by the full power of the [illegible] dealing of the which we have spoken.

Eighth verse—"Beware lest any man spoil you through philosophy and vain deceit, after the tradition of men, after the rudiments of the world and not after Christ."

In this view, much light is thrown also upon that very obscure and difficult passage in the first epistle of Peter, which Platonists are so fond of quoting, and which they interpret, or misinterpret as I think, to prove the existence of an intermediate state of probation, in which the dead have the offer of salvation.

Urging his Christian brethren to patience under the severe trials that their faith had brought on them, he says, I Peter iii. 18: "For Christ also once suffered for sins, the just for the unjust, that he might bring us to God, being put to death in the flesh, but quickened by the Spirit." That is, suffering the same physical death to which all mortal men are subject, but made alive by the power of the Divine Spirit within him, which could not die. And then by a somewhat unexpected association of ideas, he refers to the example of Noah, who preached by the inspiration of the same Spirit, to sinners in his time, and to the manner of his salvation by water, as it were, in the ark. Then coming back to the case in hand, with both the death of Christ and the rescue of Noah before him, he says: "The like figure whereunto even baptism doth now also save us (or prefigure our salvation)—not the putting away the filth of the flesh, but the answer of a good conscience toward God—by the resurrection of Jesus Christ."

All the difficulties of this complicated passage may not be cleared up in this view, but the main point is made quite evident. For we see plainly how these persecuted Christians are comforted, not merely by the example of Christ, and of his servant Noah, but especially by the hope of a resurrection through Christ, and we see how their baptism is made to typify and guarantee, as it were, their resurrection to life.

In view of the symbolical import of this ordinance, and of the importance of its true and proper observance at this time, especially, to set forth and emphasize the doctrine of the Resurrection to Life through Jesus Christ, which has been so obscured and perverted by the prevalence of a false philosophy, I am led to inquire, What is my duty in the premises?

I am confident that the Christian churches generally throughout Christendom have grievously departed from the faith once delivered to the saints, on this question of life and immortality through Christ the Savior. And I am anxious to do all that I can to expose this great philosophic error that has thrown a blighting influence over them, and to recall them to the faith as it is in Christ. It seems to me that one step toward this would be, to insist on the administration of the ordinance of baptism in its positive mode, which so plainly sets forth, and was designed to set forth—not merely the doctrine of death to sin, and a kind of spiritual resurrection to a reformed life but—actual death and an immortal life with Christ and through Christ the Savior.

But how can I consistently urge this upon others, if I do not submit to it myself?

It is not a little humiliating, I must say, after being a member of the church of Christ for more than half a century, and after having administered this ordinance to so many, according to the popular form, to confess my error and to go back to the very beginning, and to submit to this initiatory rite in another form. I am well aware of what others who cannot sympathize with me, nor appreciate my motives will think and say. But there is One who can, and it is he whom I am most anxious to please and honor and glorify. And to any one who would dissuade or forbid me, I will say as he did to John, who would have dissuaded him, "Suffer it to be so now; for thus it becometh us to fulfil all righteousness."

LAST WORDS.

The following little pieces of composition are supposed to be the last words committed to paper by Sister Sarah Barnhill. They will possess a more than ordinary interest from this circumstance. It is well known to all the friends, who knew her, that she was extremely deaf. This fact will explain some of her expressions:

Now we see through a glass darkly, but then face to face.

Now the eye of faith reaches onward to a time I shall see Jesus as he is, and praise him as I ought, and my home will be with all the redeemed throng of all ages; where no tears of sorrow ever fall, no sighs of grief ever heave the breast, no voice of misery ever salutes the ear; but, instead, the delightful breezes of that country are [illegible] with the [illegible] Paradise; its music more melodious that any that ever fell on [illegible] with the [illegible] of living [illegible] nations; and over its gold-paved glittering streets move in shining splendor, the marshalled hosts of God's elect; and the triumphant song, first raised at the coronation of the Son of God, swells along the battlements of the New Jerusalem, and bursts forth in still louder strains, when the saints of every age—with Jesus at their head—shout a song of eternal joy. There I shall be permitted to see Jesus, my Savior, to cast my crown at his feet and sing redemption's song.

O, ye beloved of earth, will you meet me there? Shall we strike hands on the fair banks of eternal deliverance, beyond the reach of sorrow—beyond the cry of misery?

And the following lines are relative to her deafness, and the never-ceasing sounds always ringing through her ears in consequence:

What is this so constant ringing—
Something all day in my ear?
Can it be the singing—ringing
Such sweet music that I hear?

There's a rushing always near
Like the sound of many voices;
May I still this concert hear,
Till I see the Rise of Kings!

While my days I thus am spending
In sweet communion with the blest,
Smiling are my moments wending
Till I gain that heavenly rest.

[A few words changed for more perfect rhyme.]

WE IN CHRIST AND CHRIST IN US.

If any man be in Christ, he is a new creature.—2 Cor. v. 17.

My little children, of whom I travail in birth again until Christ be formed in you.—Gal. iv. 19.

How can we be in Christ and Christ in us? Difficult as the solution of the question might at first seem, yet the great expounder of heavenly things has made it plain in his wonderful illustrations. In his discourse on the vine and branches—John xv. 1-7—the branch is in the vine by its vital union with the life sustaining stock, and the life energy of the stock is transfused into the branch, and thus the branch is made to produce its pendant bunches of precious fruits. In nature we have the vine—the mysteriously vitalized sap—the branches drawing their life energy and fruit-producing capabilities from the stock, and then the clustered grapes. In the supernatural we have Christ—then his quickening spirit—and then those whom belief of and obedience to the truth have brought into him—and finally the fruits of the spirit as the result of this blessed union. A separated branch on the ground, though in the vineyard, is only a useless dry stick—and such is a Christless professor with the mere form of Godliness, though in the church—he is neither in Christ, nor Christ in him. "If any man have not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his."

Youths' Column.

Willie's Valentine, or the Sheep Astray.

[illegible]

Away—Willie's mother is dead and gone,
And Willie's grieving many a weary day,
For true was Willie, and true to his trust,
But Charley's wandering far from the shepherd's care.

They have stolen a sheep from the Shepherd's fold
They are hiding it in the pleasure woods,
And now Willie and two brothers, poor sheep,
Will have to find the sheep or suffer and weep.

But as night threw [illegible]
And [illegible]
Willie would not leave his brothers there,
For they'd have wandered and found your sheep.

So they kept their feet from [illegible]
Their hearts from sin,
Let the sinner be [illegible]
The weak of the flock he has sought once to win;
Besides, God pursues, he loves to weep,
For they'd have wandered and found your sheep.

Stretch It a Little.

A little girl and her brother were on their way to the ragged school on a cold winter morning. The roofs of the houses and the grass on the commons were white with frost; the wind very sharp. They were both poorly dressed, but the little girl had a sort of a coat over her, which she seemed to have outgrown.

As they walked briskly along, she drew her little companion up to her, saying;

"Come under my coat, Johnny."

"It isn't big enough for both," he replied.

"Oh, but I can stretch it a little," and they were soon as close together and as warm as two birds in the same nest.

How many shivering bodies and heavy hearts and weeping eyes there are in the world, just because people do not stretch their comforts beyond themselves.—Anon.

Nothing Remarkable.

"Father," said a little girl, "why does everybody speak so much of poor E——'s goodness? We never hear of her doing anything remarkable."

"My child," asked the father, "what is the lamp doing?"

"Nothing, father."

"You are right, my child; it is not doing anything. Nevertheless, it is lighting up the whole room."

"Let your light so shine before men," said one, "that they may see your good works and glorify your Father who is in heaven."

About Bad Boys.

How came the boys so bad? What has made them so? "Why it's their natural depraved natures," says Mr. Depravity. No sir! you are wrong; it may help a little in some cases, but not in all. We have known many boys to arrive at a certain age with language and habits as pure as the beautiful flowers that grow free and unwarped by education and influence, and this education and influence is just what is ruining our boys; but do not mistake our meaning. There is an education, not of books or of a Christian mother's teaching, and were our boys free from it their lives would be as beautiful (in most cases) as the free bright flowers and the birds. Man is to blame! Bad men make bad boys. Yes we are aware that this is contrary to the general opinion, but we have taken a broad view of the subject, and we can prove our assertion.

Man first, then the boy—if we look to the garden of Eden. But setting this view aside; where is the bad boy who has not gained his influence from some bad man or men? We doubt very much about their being any bad boys if we had no bad men. The little prattler, just fresh and untainted from the hand of its Maker, has made more good men than men (on the other hand) has made good boys.

Says the boy just entering his teens: "I am old enough to choose for myself now; fathers and mothers are good enough in their way, but they don't know what is best for me; all the men smoke and swear and play cards—even lots of the church members—and they are all called gentlemen; now it must be right or so many wouldn't do it; our folks are behind the times that is all; a body can't be a good fellow unless he does as others do. I've got to go with the crowd as the fine gentlemen do, if I ever expect to be a man; you only get laughed at for your pains if you try to do any different from the rest."

Yes, boys, there is too much truth in your soliloquy. It is a sad case I assure you, and I pity everyone of you, and I will pray for you all, all the rest of my life. But boys why can't we have more individuality? We delight in asserting our wills in opposition to those who would direct us right; why then can't we exercise this will power on the other hand, and say I will do right, I've my own character to make. I will be a man, and not follow in a wrong path because a crowd leads the way. "Yes I'll be a man whatever they choose to think of me." Be sure my boy, the few friends that do encourage you will be worth to you more than all the rest. Suppose a beautiful oak has sprung up in a large field which produces only weeds and briers. It sees no companion like itself. Says the oak, "I will not be this great tree any longer. I must associate and associate with my companions. I will be a briar or a thorn; I will not stand this being a great beautiful tree all by myself."

Alas, what a coming down that would be! And yet, my dear boys, it would not be half so bad as your coming down from your purity which a Christian mother has taught you, to the level of many gentleman, falsely so called. You are the sapling of some great future men! Keep your place and grow on, tower above and beyond, in goodness and purity, your weed and thistle companions, and become the mighty oak of pure and noble manhood! Let the thistle and weed people pass on; they would soon become extinct; no more bad men—hence no more bad boys.

But we digress. Oh man! man! can you not see the evil you are doing? Whither can our boys flee to be away from your contaminating influence? We led a bright little boy through the street one day, and in our path stood some roughs, taking the name of God in vain; we crossed over to the other side, not wishing such language to reach his ears. On the other side, however, stood two gentlemen (such they looked at least in dress and feature) who were speaking of their crops, and, I should judge from what I heard that God had blessed them bountifully; but alas! they talked of these rich blessings with a curse at the end of each sentence. If there is an excuse for one provoked to swear, how is it with him who has no provocation? Where then are our little ones safe? Not even by their own home firesides, for how often the father, who should be guardian angel of that child, indulge in the same wicked practice; but if our own hearthstone is free from the evil curse, it flies in at the open window and door—the very air at times being blue with curses and tobacco smoke—and yet we wonder what makes the boys so bad.

The Christian mother's cheek pales when her youth must start out to their different avocations for a livelihood. Is the store our workshops and offices are free from contaminating influences? We fear not many of them, and some she knows hold even the gambling table and their accompaniments. God alone can help our boys, when men will continue such education and example before them. But more terrible than all the rest, our boys are drinking "just a little harmless beer" says the bad man who holds it out to them, and then, . . . our youth many of them are carried home in a state of intoxication, and this boy-drinking is alarmingly on the increase. Oh man! oh woman! there must be something more done than getting up before a crowd and talking temperance. It must be lived daily, hourly; wines must be kept out of their food and drink, also out of their homes and places of business; this will be more to the point than lectures. One of the most gifted temperance lecturers we ever listened to, has often gone from the rostrum to her home to find her only son in a state of beastly intoxication. "Why" says breaking hearted parents, "are our boys so bad?" Reason enough. A bad education is constantly instilled into their otherwise pure minds. Until our men change, we have no hope for our boys—save in a sympathizing Heavenly Father.

Mothers we can fly to him, and not leave undone all we can do for ourselves; but we must in some way reach the hearts of men and convert them from the error of their way, before there is hope for our boys. Oh, ye bad men, think of the millions of boys who must fall by your example. God help you to reform, and save our boys.

The Boy's Friend,
MRS. U. F. HALL.

PARIS, May 2.—The ex-Empress Eugenie, who has been staying at Lyons on her way back from Marseilles, was mobbed and hooted as she left her hotel for the railway station yesterday.

POLAR BEARS ON ICEBERGS IN THE ATLANTIC.

BOSTON, May 1.—The British steamer Glamorgan, arrived here this morning from Liverpool. On April 23, in latitude 46 deg. 20 min., longitude 42 deg. 30 min., she passed an iceberg fully five hundred feet high, on which were a number of polar bears. At about 4 A. M. on the 26th she ran into a field of pack ice and icebergs. Chief Officer May reversed the engines and soon got clear. A run of twenty miles was made to the southeast, when the ship was put on her course again. She steamed 160 miles on the southern edge of the ice field, and during that time passed fully 100 large icebergs on which were seen polar bears.

JAFFA, Palestine, Dec. 15, 1881.

After eight years acquaintance with my American countryman, Rolla Floyd, I regard him as incomparably the most accomplished and efficient and in every way trustworthy conductor of travel in Palestine and Syria. I traveled in the Holy Land under his advice in 1873, and under his personal guidance with my wife in 1881.

All my prolonged and varied experience with Mr. Floyd has convinced me of the entire justice of the really unmeasured commendation which it is well known has been heaped upon him by hundreds of travelers whom he has conducted through the Holy Land, and especially by the London firm of Cook's Tourist Agency, of which he was the foremost representative in Palestine and Syria, for seven years. This firm has often eulogized in the strongest language in its official pamphlets and periodicals. Mr. Floyd's honesty, courage, intelligence, skill and success as a conductor of travel.

It has pointed with pride to Mr. Floyd's knowledge of the Holy Land, his extraordinary familiarity with Scriptural allusions to the sacred places, his perfect command of the Arabic language, and the universal esteem in which he is held by the Arabs, and even by the Bedouin tribes.

Acting now as an independent conductor of travel, Mr. Floyd is sometimes treated by powerful tourist agencies as a dangerous rival.

It remains true, however, that the commendations just cited are thoroughly deserved, and that Mr. Floyd's eleven years experience has made him unsurpassable in his department. I take pleasure in commending him to the visitors of the Holy Land, and I write this testimonial without his solicitation.

ANNIVERSARY OF MY BIRTHDAY.

NEWELL BOND.

My days are fourscore years and four,
—Swift as the Indian's arrow flown—
And dreamy as a tale that's told
They are forever fled and gone.

My feeble step is insecure,
My shattered frame says I am low,
The lamp of life burns dim and pale,
It flickers in the socket low.

I stand upon the river's brink,
And hear the swelling billows roar,
And sigh for me in mortal life
O, lord me safe on Canaan's shore.

The checkered scenes of human life
Are to the closed as easily done;
All's known soon the tale is told
And all is lost in human view

Is this the end of a mortal man,
—Made in the image of his God—
To fall like leaves in autumn's day
And never sleep here with the clod?

As sure as nature does her work,
So sure the dead will live again,
To an immortal life arise
No more to die among the slain.

We soon shall pass the mortal bound,
Our spirit soon will be no more,
A bell the resurrection hears
—Life from the dead forevermore.

Ye saints are scenes of joy and woe
Such as this world has never known,
The saints arise to meet their Lord,
The left to weep and wail and moan.

MRS. DAVIS AND HER MISSION.

Leaves from My Journal.

Jerusalem, Feb. 5. It is still very cold; the wind is blowing a hurricane, almost. Frank went to the post office but no letters. He heard that the boat capsized, and the mail went to the bottom. I shall be very sorry if this is so, as I have no letters to-day, nor this week.

I think this wind would destroy our American houses; but, thank God, our houses here can neither burn or blow down; we are quite safe.

Feb. 9. The storm which has been raging for ten day has not yet abated. It commenced with thunder and lightning the most vivid, I think, that I ever saw; just one flash, then a terrible peal of thunder. It rained all night and during the next day; the day following was rainy, and the next morning when we awoke we saw a foot of snow on a level. It soon commenced to rain however, and in a few hours our rooms were flooded with water; and from that time we have been moving our beds and clothing about to keep them partially dry.

Unfortunately I was out of wood, and it has been a test of the kindness of these poor Arabs who are no better off than I. They have divided with me so cheerfully; and one evening they all came and brought dry mats and a nice supper, and we sat on the floor, as is the custom, and ate and drank coffee from tiny cups, and afterwards they played with the cups, which was very interesting. These poor souls, they thought of me, a stranger, and have tried to cheer me in my solitude. Yesterday I was sick in bed all day, and they all came and made a fire and did all they could for me.

To-day we have hardly a dry spot to sit on. Some neighbors have abandoned their houses fearing they would fall. There must be danger of the stones falling as the mortar is so wet down to the floors. It will be a wonder if they stand. But as I have no place to flee to I must stay, and if I die, all is well. There is not a house in Jerusalem, except four or five which are tiled, that is not in just the same condition as ours. The Mosque of Omar, Holy Sepulchre and Haram, are the same. Many things are destroyed. Pictures, furniture, books, and clothing; all have shared the same fate. The English Consul's house is worse than mine. Should the storm continue we must flee from Jerusalem. As I am now writing the storm seems to increase. We can get no wood or charcoal while the rain falls. Very few shops are open. Nothing is brought to market, but there is provision sufficient for the people, and we shall not starve. Those who have money are well enough, but the poor are suffering fearfully.

If one house could be built to shelter us from the storm we could go there in such a case as this. I hope some one may be sent to build one before next winter. If I live through these trials I may hope to live forever; but this will be a calamity unless things change soon.

Frank heard last night that small-pox was raging in America terribly. Everything seems to be raging all over the world, and will rage for several years. We have only begun to see trouble; and there won't be many who will escape it. But I have no wish to return to America. I am sure this is the best place in the world when it is dry, and that is nearly all the time. I will wait in patience till deliverance comes.

This is a very wicked city, though very religious. It must be purged soon. But who can stand the process? All the prophecies have a different meaning to me, from what they did before I came here. A new light has come which I could not see from afar. Jerusalem must be purged by fire, famine and war! Then shall she be Holy.

Ten o'clock, evening. Still raining. We have about eight feet of dry room to sleep in, but are afraid to go to bed as the rain may reach us in the night. I think there never was such a flood since the flood of Noah.

Feb. 11. No letters yet. I have four feet of dry room; but, thank God, the rain has ceased and the sun has appeared.

I must tell you that these people bear trials better than we can, possibly. I have learned to bear trials from them. Jerusalem is washed clean; and that is good. The people are very happy this morning.

I shall still love Jerusalem as long as I have four feet of dry bed, and if that gets wet I will not leave. God bless Jerusalem in her wretched state. I pray for her continually rain or shine, thunder, hail or hurricane! I will fight it out on this line. No place like Jerusalem—earth, wet or dry.

Feb. 14. I gave you an account in my last of the flood which has nearly overwhelmed us in these mountains. The flood however, has been chiefly confined to our houses, of which none have escaped, including the Mosque of Omar. Many families have been obliged to leave their homes and accept temporary shelter in some spot where the force of the storm was not so keenly felt. We have had, since my last, three days of snow, hail and rain. All say that a similar tempest never occurred.

Well, I have had a chance to study the Arabic character during these trials, and to do justice to these people, I must tell you that they bear misfortunes and trials bravely; acknowledging that all evil is from God.

Feb. 15. It is clear this morning, and quite warm. The cause of the leaking in the houses was the frost, which is very unusual here. In fact, I learn that never before was there such an occurrence. Well, the men are at work on the roof and we shall be all right soon. Our landlord, the Sheik, did feel sorry for us. He said it was all from the Lord, which is quite true.

I am now sitting in the court in the sun, which is as hot as June in our country. God bless Jerusalem, more and more. I love the city. It seems like my home, and no misfortune can make me dislike it. I love the kind people, too; and I hardly realize that I ever liked anywhere else. No one wants to leave here who stays three months.

Evening. I have been to Siloam, or En Rogel, to spend the day with my neighbors. They came and said I was to go with them, as it was a great feast day, and all the people were going. Siloam is two miles away, through the most romantic and lovely country in the whole world, I should think. We enjoyed the walk much, as we had a merry and intelligent company, many of them speaking English.

We arrived in due time and found a large company on the spot and as we drew near I could easily imagine myself on Boston Common on the Fourth of July. The band was playing, and soldiers, carasses and pageantry were riding over the picturesque hills in gay costumes. Temporary coffee shops, erected for the occasion and in full blast, were seen everywhere. Piles of bright oranges dotted the grounds all about, which, with the pretty and gay attire of the ladies, made a beautiful and cheerful scene. Whole families with cooking utensils, Nargelee and mats covered the ground. I assure you I never saw a happier gathering.

This well is very ancient; and we can see that it was used for bathing. The water seems to boil up from a hole three feet below the surface, and then spreads into a lovely stream, six or eight feet wide. The stream is swift, the water clear as crystal, and very sweet. We sat on the shore, which is lined with trees, and I assure you that we found the shade very agreeable on the 15th of February.

The water is very warm. The children were bathing in it as in summer. I was surprised to see them bathing so freely, as I supposed the water must be very cold, but I found upon dipping my hand in it, that it was nearly blood warm.

We enjoyed the nice lunch brought by our friends, and the day past very agreeably. I wish I could properly describe the rich and varied scenery of these hills and valleys at this season of the year, but it is beyond my power to do them justice. I shall try to send a sketch sometime. We shall go again to-morrow, when I hope to make a picture.

What do you think would become of us in America, if we were exposed to such a storm as we have had for the past fifteen days? The snow laid on the ground for three days; and during the rest of the time it rained through the roof like a sieve. Our beds were wet, our clothes were wet, and we put them on wet. The chairs even were wet, but I have not felt the slightest inconvenience from it as yet. No cold or wet seems to hurt us. I have never had even the slightest cold in my head; but I may feel the effects of this terrible storm hereafter. But this is, indeed, a wonderful country, in many respects.

LETTERS ON THE RESURRECTION. No. 1.

WM. C. TAYLOR.

In the preceding letter we have already seen that according to Paul the nature of the body spoken of as "sown" in 1 Cor. xv., is entirely different from that referred to as "raised" in the same chapter. He tells us the body sown is "a natural body," and at the same time speaks of the body raised as being "a spiritual body." He also tells that the former bears the common stamp of mortality—corruption, dishonor and weakness: while the latter, in contrast, bears the unmistakable marks of immortality—incorruptibility, glory and strength.

The body is clearly affirmed to be "sown a natural body," and "raised a spiritual body." the only question is, Do we understand the force of the words "sown" and "raised" as Paul intended, and have we the same ideas impressed upon us which the reading of them called up to the mind of the Corinthian Church? As far as can be we wish to stand in relation to the great apostle just as they did, and learn the truth of this matter as he taught it to them.

Of what he meant some say one thing, some another. We assume he meant just what he said, and therefore enquire if we understand the meaning of the words "sown" and "raised" in their natural sense, as used by the apostle, and understood by the Corinthians.

The word "sown" is σπειρω—speiro, and according to Bagster's Analytical Greek Lexicon it means, To sow seed. Matt. vi. 26; xiii. 3, 4, 18, 24, etc. In the New Testament used with variety of metaphors. Matt. xiii. 19; xxv. 24; 1 Cor. ix. 11; 2 Cor. ix. 6; Gal. vi. 7, etc.

Another authority gives the meaning, To sow, or scatter, as seed; to spread, or scatter, as the word of God. Applied to giving alms, 2 Cor. ix. 6; to burial, 1 Cor. xv. 42, 43; and to spiritual effort generally. Gal. vi. 8. Green's Handbook to the Grammar of the Greek N. T.

As will be seen from the above, the common literal meaning of spiro is to sow, as we speak of sowing seed, and it occurs oftener in the New Testament in such a connection than in any other. "Behold, a sower went forth to sow, and when he sowed, some seeds fell by the wayside," affords a familiar example of its use. Even in the chapter we are discussing, the word is used by Paul in its natural sense as applying to the sowing of seed in verses 36 and 37.

He says, "Thou foolish one, that which thou thyself sowest is not quickened, except it die; and that which thou sowest, thou sowest not the body that shall be, but a bare grain, it may chance of wheat or of some other kind."

Undoubtedly this illustration of how Paul understood and applied the word gives us the true key to its use throughout the chapter, for in the absence of any hint to the contrary, to be fair to the apostle we must assume he used it in the same sense in verses 42 and 43, that he did in verses 36 and 37.

But it may be asked, How came Paul to speak of human bodies as being sown? It would certainly be a rather strange word to use for burial in almost any connection other than that brought before us in this chapter. The question was the resurrection of the dead, and the apostle, trying to show how such a thing could be, drew upon the natural world for the illustration of the seed. He says, "Thou sowest not the body that shall be, but a bare grain of wheat, . . . but God giveth it a body according as he pleased."—Alford. So also is the resurrection of the dead, he replied, "It is sown in corruption, it is raised in incorruption," etc. Thus in passing from the illustration to apply the lesson to the mind illustrated Paul was naturally led seeing the two subjects had so much in common to speak of the burial of the body as he had of the burial of the seed. In either case the earth was the objective point in the sowing or burying. Whatever the earth covers the seed; there the new life springs into sight, and wherever the grave of any saint of God is made from that identical spot will he be raised to enjoy the better life. This would hardly be worth saying, and to many it may seem foolish, but then let it be remembered that it is said the saints are not really raised till after appearing at the judgment seat of Christ, while it really does not appear to us that Paul contemplated the idea they could be buried in one place and raised at another.

Having then made it clear, as we hope, that when Paul spoke of the body as being sown in corruption, weakness and dishonor, he was applying those terms to describe the nature of the body which was sown or buried, and that the sowing spoken of was simply what we understand by burying, we will now consider the meaning of the more important word translated raised in our version.

The real stress in this argument falls upon the meaning of the word "raised." Paul said, "The dead shall be raised incorruptible." What did he mean? Was it simply that the dead would come forth from the grave in immortal bodies, or was it that, as has been said by one speaking of the resurrection, "They are raised to exist when they come forth from their graves; but they are not caused to exist incorruptible, until they shall have been approved at his tribunal when the raising will be complete." Is it possible, we ask, that this word had a meaning so comprehensive as would admit of a process such as this would imply?

The word is εγειρω—egeiro, and in the authorities already quoted its meaning is given as follows:

"Egeiro, to excite, arouse, awaken. Matt. xxviii. 25; mid. to awake, Matt. ii. 12, 20, 21; met. mid. to rouse one's self. . . . Rom. xiii. 11: to raise from the dead. John xii. 1; and mid. to raise from the dead, Matt. xxvii. 52; met. to raise. . . . 2 Cor. iv. 14; to raise up, cause to rise up. Acts iii. 7; and mid. to rise up. Matt. xvii. 7. . . . to raise up again, rebuild, John ii. 19; to raise up from a lower place, to draw up or out of, to raise up, to cause to arise or exist, to arise, exist, appear." — Bag. Anal. Greek Lexicon.

How are we to apply these meanings of this word to the resurrection of the dead? Remember the question was "How are the dead raised up?" It was a question of how the dead would come to life again, and the answer would have. If we have a clear idea of where the dead are, it will not be difficult to gain a correct sense of the force of the word raised as applied to them. Where are the dead? In the grave every heart replies. Then as we have already said the place which received them in death must be the same which will give them back to life again, and Paul's question really was, "How are the dead raised up (from the dead), and with what body do they come (from that place)."

The word, as any one can see, is a connecting link bridging the gulf that separates the dead from the living, and its whole force is spent the instant the dead body appears in life upon the earth again. Then that which was dead has been raised up, rebuilt, caused to arise, exist or appear. This is the real meaning of the word, simply the action of bringing back the dead to the world of life from which they were parted by death.

Thus Paul in 1 Cor. xv. 4, says that "Christ died for our sins. . . . and that he was buried, and that he rose again the third day according to the Scriptures." Christ himself said it was from the dead he was to rise, and Paul declares in verse 12, of the same chapter we are considering that this fact was a subject of their preaching. No one questions that Christ rose from the dead or from the grave, and no one doubts that in the thirteen cases where egeiro occurs from the 1st to the 20th verses of 1 Cor. xv. and is translated rise, rose, raised, risen, it was used by the apostle as applying to the bringing or coming up out of the grave of those who had been dead. So far this was the sense in which the word was used by the apostle, and it hardly appears we have any right to give it a different meaning in verses 42 and 43 as the subject under discussion continues the same, and in the absence of any hint the word had a more extended meaning here, or on account of any difficulty in understanding it as already used throughout this chapter. Failing then of a reason why this word should have a different meaning here from what it has elsewhere, we read verses 42 and 43, as follows, supplying the implied sense of the passages:

It (the body) is raised (from the dead or grave) in incorruption.

It (the body) is raised (from the grave) in glory.

It (the body) is raised (from the dead) in power.

It (the body) is raised (from the grave) a spiritual body. I Cor. xv. 42, 43.

Still continuing the apostle declared at verse 52. "The dead shall be raised (from the dead) incorruptible."

Thus in every case where egeiro is used in this chapter, the full sense is as applied to the dead that the raising is from the grave. But the author we have already quoted says, "The dead are caused to exist when they come forth from their graves, but they are not caused to exist incorruptible until they shall have been approved at his tribunal when the raising will be complete."

This tribunal which is spoken of as coming between the existence state of the resurrection, has spoken on, and the complete raising has no place in Christ's account of this matter, nor has it so far as the word has aided us to find any place in the entire Book. It was simply impossible that such a barrier to a complete raising could exist and not be spoken of by the apostle. Besides, it was not so much a question of the kind of existence that would be enjoyed in the resurrection as the simple fact of any future existence at all for the dead that occupied Paul's attention. If by any power a man who has been dead, and buried is caused to exist or live again; that man has been raised from the dead. It is said he only exists, but then should he be approved before the tribunal spoken of above and raised completely, no more could be said of him, even then, than that "he exists." The dead must be raised in order that they may exist, when they do exist they may appear at any tribunal for which they are ordered, but the fact that they can do so shows they have already been raised from the dead. The finding of such a tribunal could not raise a man from the dead who was able to appear at its bar in the full enjoyment of life.

The idea is possible that it could change the kind of life such a man enjoyed, and such a thing would be a change of living bodies, but it would not be a resurrection of the dead, and such a process and kind of resurrection would not have been an intelligible answer to the Corinthians of the question, "How are the dead raised up (from the grave) and with what body do they come (from that place)."

But if any doubt still remains as to the meaning of the word raise a consideration of what examples we have recorded of what resurrection really is will set the matter at rest. It is said that the simple fact of bringing a body back from the grave to the world of life is not the idea intended by the word. The difficulty with this view is that it not only disagrees with the meaning of egeiro, but also with the three examples of resurrection we find recorded in the New Testament. Lazarus was raised from the dead, and it cannot be urged in his case that the dead was immortality, yet the same word egeiro is used as follows:

"Jesus . . . . came to Bethany where Lazarus was which had been dead whom he raised (egeiro) from the dead." John xii. 1.—Alford.

"The Jews. . . . came. . . . that they might see Lazarus also, whom Jesus had raised (egeiro) from the dead." John xii. 9.—Alford.

The remarks preceding the above apply with equal force to the next example. We read: "And the graves were opened: and many bodies of the saints which slept arose. (egeiro) and came out of the graves." Matt. xxvii. 52.

In these passages the same word is used to indicate resurrection, as in 1 Cor. xv. 42, 43, and we simply quote them to prove as is so well seen in the last passage that egeiro simply means to be raised up out of the grave. Matthew, Mark, Luke and John use the same word in relating the circumstances of Christ's resurrection. The angel said to the women who came to see the sepulchre where Christ had been laid, and before they had seen the risen Lord himself, "He is risen (egeiro); he is not here, behold the place where they laid him." That place was Joseph's new made tomb, and from it, his resting place in death —"He is risen," said the angel, while as yet no mortal eye had seen him. "Go quickly and tell his disciples that he is risen from the dead."

From all this, advanced to show the meaning of the word translated rise, rose, raised, risen, we hope it will be seen that when applied to the dead it simply means the raising of a dead body from the grave to life again. Lazarus was raised, Christ was raised and many of the saints arose. These resurrections although different in destiny were identical so far as the idea of resurrection went. Lazarus and the saints were just as completely raised as Christ was, although they only enjoyed a brief prolongation of life while the latter was alive forevermore. This ought to show that to be raised from the dead is simply to be raised to life, and that a man raised to life in a mortal body is as much raised from the dead as another with an incorruptible body. The word raise conveys no idea of change in the nature of the body. If anything of that kind takes place another word must be the source of the idea. It is simply said of Lazarus that he had been raised from the dead, the language affording no suspicion of the slightest physical change. In 1 Cor. xv. the case is quite different. Remember the question was, "How are the dead raised up (from the grave) and with what body do they come (from that place)."

Here was a question put with the idea of a possible change, and the point is, Did Paul in his answer use language that would indicate a change and if any the nature of it. We say he did, and that in direct reply to the query, "With what body do they come," i. e. from the grave? There never was a more direct answer to a direct simple question than Paul's in this case. He said:

"It is raised (from the grave) in incorruption."

"It is raised (from the grave) in glory."

"It is raised (from the grave) in power."

"It is raised (from the grave) a spiritual body."

"With what body do they come?" said Paul. It is sown a natural body it is raised a spiritual body—glorious, powerful and incorruptible he replied, and if this left any doubt in the Corinthian mind, or in ours, his positive declaration that the dead shall be raised incorruptible, removes the slightest misgiving, and closes all argument upon the subject.

This then was what Paul came to in unfolding this mystery to the Corinthians. Of his declaration we have but one idea. Its simplicity and positiveness disarms argument and prevents the possibility of the truth being misunderstood. This is how Paul's reply admits us, yet we say in giving our answer to this question, let us think what impression Paul's words made upon the Corinthians? Was there misunderstandings and divisions? We hear nothing of such a result. They heard him put the question, "How are the dead raised up, and with what body do they come?" and heard him make reply. It is sown a natural body, it is raised a spiritual body, and I am constrained to say that from these words they did believe, as we cannot help believing too, could we for a moment forget the present, and by a mental effort sit with those early believers, as they listen with baited breath to the first reading of Paul's first Corinthian letter, that, "the dead shall be raised incorruptible."

SHANNON HILL, VA.

To the editor of THE RESTITUTION, and all the believing readers, the undersigned desires health and peace, from God our Father, and from our Lord Jesus Anointed:

The undersigned has been endeavoring to be "swift to hear, and slow to speak." For more than fifty years he has been humbly trying to be a disciple of the Lord Jesus. He is encouraged in this by what is stated in John viii., "If ye continue in my word, ye are my disciples indeed, and ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free." In the second epistle to Timothy, the apostle exhorts him to watch thou in all things, endure affliction, do the work of an evangelist, make full proof of the ministry. For I am now ready to be offered, and the time of my departure is at hand. I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith: henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous judge, shall give me at that day: and not to me only, but unto all them also that love his appearing." In his epistle to the Galatians, he says, "I am crucified with Christ: nevertheless I live, yet not I, but Christ liveth in me: and the life which I now live in the flesh, I live by the faith of the Son of God, who loved me and gave himself for me." Let us follow the example of the apostle in his manner of living. Let us make ourselves largely acquainted with the Holy Scriptures, in all they teach concerning God our Father, and concerning his beloved Son. If we perfect our love, we shall desire his appearing, and we shall have this as an assurance that he will give us crowns of righteousness.

In the epistle to the Ephesians the apostle says, "I bow my knees to the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, of whom the whole family in heaven and earth is named, that he would grant you, according to the riches of his glory, to be strengthened with might by his Spirit in the inner man; that Christ may dwell in your hearts by faith; that ye being rooted and grounded in love, may be able to comprehend with all saints what is the breadth, and length, and depth, and height; and to know the love of Christ which passeth knowledge, that ye might be filled with the fulness of God." This seems to teach that if we have Christ dwelling in us by faith, then we are filled with the fulness of God, and we must necessarily love the appearing of the Lord Jesus Christ, and thus we pray and run, and shall rejoice in the hope of being with him, as the redeemed with the Redeemer. According to Isa. xxxv. and li., the redeemed are to come to Zion, with singing and everlasting joy upon their heads. And according to Isa. lix., the Redeemer is to come to Zion. Consequently, the redeemed and the Redeemer will be together, according to the teaching of the Lord Jesus, in John xiv. In Malachi we learn, that they who feared or reverenced the Lord, spake often to another, and the Lord hearkened and heard, and a book of remembrance was written before him, for them who feared the Lord, and who thought upon his name. And they shall be mine, saith the Lord of hosts, in that day when I make up my jewels; and I will spare them, as a man spareth his own son that serveth him.

The writer has had a very acquaintance Brother A. B. Magruder. He had the gratification of having baptized Bro. M. He wishes to state that he has read Bro. M.'s defence of the Bible against the lectures of Ingersoll. He has read it with great satisfaction. He thanks the Lord for having enabled Bro. M. to write so ably. He has also had a long acquaintance with Brother Wiley Jones. Brother Jones lived one scholastic year with the undersigned, and was an excellent boy. The writer will be 79, if he lives till the 13th of May. So he cannot expect to trouble you much longer. He has sought acquaintance with you and your contributors, by reading THE RESTITUTION. He requests the prayers of all the disciples of the truth, that the Lord will enable him to endure to the end, and to come off a conqueror, through faith in the one only true God, and in the Lord Jesus Anointed. It is a high gratification to him, that there are comparatively so many advocates of the gospel of the kingdom; he remembers the time, when he was acquainted with but one man who professed to believe in the kingdom to be on the earth. Now there are not only hundreds but thousands, who profess to believe it.

Accompanied by his wife, he made an excursion of about five months, in advocacy of the gospel in the year 1881. Some obeyed the gospel. He also spoke much for the benefit of the young disciples.

He remains yours in the truth, for the truth's sake.

A. ANDERSON.

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

The Quarterly Assembly of the Church of God, will commence Friday evening before the fourth Sunday in May, which will be May 26, in a grove near Bro. John J. Spaid's, Hampshire Co., Va. All the brethren and people in general are respectfully invited to be present.

N. J. MORGAN.

I will be at Scireleville, Saturday before the 4 Sunday in May, to continue over Sunday, as Brother Thurman may arrange.

J. P. WAGONER.

The Annual Conference of the State of Michigan will be held at Watson Corner, Allegan county, Mich., commencing June 1, and lasting over the following Sunday. Those coming by rail from the north or south on the Grand Rapids and Indiana Railroad will stop at Monteith, and take the Allegan division to Fisk's Crossing, three miles from Monteith, where ample provision will be made for all that shall come. A general attendance is desired at this meeting as we expect this to be the best Conference ever held in Michigan. Let all come praying the Lord's blessing to be with this meeting. Able ministers will be in attendance to preach the word.

K. N. WOODWARD, Sec.

Truths on the Covenants,

Permit me to say to our brethren, through THE RESTITUTION, that I have ceased page 288 on my book, and that by the 20th inst. it will be ready to go to the binder, ready for distribution by June 10. I have now within four or five names, received the 200 pledges as requested, for which I am thankful, and will be glad to have many more. Orders sent in after this might be accompanied with the price of the book, $1.00.

A VISION.—Rev. vii. 9-17.

ELLEN H. R. GATES.

Whence come they? Whence come they? this wonderful crowd
That cannot be counted? They seem like a cloud;
Their garments are gleaming with light from the skies,
And never, that is perfect, looks out from their eyes.

They come from the ranks of the greatest and least;
Among them are martyrs, and prophets, and priest;
And still, and forever, the song that they sing
Is love of the kingdom and love of the King.

Among them are faces that once were so dear;
Long, long have we missed them: but lo! they are here!
Through faith did they conquer; they "fear from afar
His name on their foreheads" as bright as a star.

They witness for Jesus, this wonderful crowd,
As round the bright throne they float like a cloud—
And still, and forever, the song that they sing
Is love of the kingdom and love of the King.

LETTER FROM ARKANSAS.

I read in THE RESTITUTION of April 12, one of the series of letters of Mrs. A. E. Davis, dated at Jerusalem. I read it with interest and sympathy, even to tears. Very affecting is the thought of the terrible bereavement, and the agony of sorrow, which she has had to endure, and every Christian reader will sincely pray that the bitterness may be abundantly followed by peace, and the deep joy of rest in God. Not having read THE RESTITUTION for a time, I know little of Mrs. Davis' peculiar mission—but I always love to read of Jerusalem, its geography and its promise—its actual present and its prospective development. "City of our God." "They shall prosper that love thee." Gladly would I go there—gladly live there—joyfully make it a metropolis of all earthly sympathies, interests, labor, reflections and expectations, and gladly help to realize by personal effort and actual residence, those glorious fulfillments of prophetic destiny and Divine intention, which have made so many hearts beat with pleasurable anticipation. But there is nevertheless something in the way. I am teachable, but not confident. I would by no means thrust a single least impediment in the way of every possible and Scriptural growth towards the foreordained grandeur and greatness. Will some one help me? Here is one of my troubles. The Jews are absolutely in unbelief relative to Messiah having ever yet come to their land and nation. They are "branches broken off." They absolutely "know not" what they did, in rejecting the son of Mary — supernaturally conceived — and Divinely endowed—they are in darkness. The nation has never repented of the rejection. They own and know no Mediator but Moses—long ages ago, dead. Their religious status is absolutely unchanged for the nineteen centuries of the Christian era. Christ came, in his Father's name, and they received them not—if another should come in his own name, him they would receive—apparently with a kind of popular unanimity; and the question is, if the last act of choice thus predicted is not yet to be manifested, before the national restitution."

What course may we fairly expect affairs will take? What next feature in the future of the Jews? What now about a coming glory for the land and the nation? Most gladly would I believe and hope the glorious consummation of their prophesied power and peace was at hand if I dared. I ask again—will some one help me?

Let us look a little more closely yet. Do the Scriptures teach their conversion by the preaching of the gospel? I scarcely care to quote the Scriptures here for they are easily found by every diligent reader. Read Rom xi, I can not recollect that their conversion is promised through preaching. But this is promised, "Out of Sion shall come the Deliverer, and shall turn away ungodliness from Jacob." (I am not not forgetting individual conversions, here and there, or the considerable fruit of apostolic labor among the Jews in the past—occasion days of God's power—when intrepid men of God preached with the Holy Spirit mightily attending the word). Then if the Jews are not to be Christianized by missions or missionary or gospel work—they are to be converted by the Lord in person, graciously manifesting himself to them, and shining on their minds with glorious power and love, filling them with contrition and astonishment, and constraining them to say, "Blessed: blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord," i. e. if we mistake not—Jesus, their Messiah.

The query is, will they not confederate with an enemy—a deceiver, first? If it is not so, I am most ready to know that, and glad to believe it. If there is nothing in the way—if the times are auspicious—if Israel is now soon to be gathered—if six or eight millions of Jews are now nearly ready to reverse their course, abjure their long unbelief, and accept the gospel; if they are willing and waiting to come to the land of promise, and lay aside and abandon their old and age-long ignorance and error, and be constituted as a Christian nation in Judea—then I would rejoice. I would be glad to go there too. I would say, "All hail: thou day of jubilee and renovation! Blessed be the old land of so many million loves and prayers and glories—and farewell, all sins and pains and shame of both land and nation, through departing from the God of salvation and righteousness." To what I say, I only speak suggestively, nay, even inquiringly, and when any well-intentioned work of love and hope and mercy is inaugurated and entered upon I would with all my power sanction and encourage it, if it is in harmony with the truth and wisdom of God's word and purpose. And most certainly I hope, those who are engaged in any benevolent enterprise for the benefit of the people and land of history and hope—above any other on earth, may be blest.

Last night we had solemn revelry and roar for hours together—lightning for eyes, and thunder for ears, and rain for the earth, in grandeur and power. Electricity so vivid, and so busy, and so untiring, in its wonderful ways and works, so unwilling to cease its ardent and awful frolic in the ink-black sky, was something to make a note of.

I often feel, how glad I am there is a God—I am glad that he knows and notices me—and that I can and do and must appeal to him. It is impossible to live without this breathing and begging importunity. I say to him, "Lord, without thee, I am no better than a dead man—without thee, life is literally worth nothing—thy blessing is necessary to give charm and value to existence." This might seem to some an exaggeration, but one who has lived a life of dependence and prayer, who has got tastes and inspirations of him, his goodness and greatness—finds it at length a necessity of existence, to draw vitality and supporting power from him. There are many experiences that are intensely secret—intensely real but almost ethereal—that come and go—experiences of conference with the Lord—islands of communion in the sea of life—that may be not so very large, but yet they are spicy—and heavenly. The thought is, "Now Lord make a note of this—I may forget, but do thou keep the record—remember how I this moment serenely and intensely see thee by faith." I was at meeting the other day—only a listener—and there came a wave of, beseeching, "O, give me the Spirit—give me that, don't forget my prayer—fill me full with the power of God—I may forget, but do not thou forget."

I suppose what many of us ardently desire, is a deep, calm, grand, and enduring satisfaction. This a great goal for which the spirit studies and yearns and strives. Not a stupid, but an intelligent satisfaction, in which heart and conscience, and bodily functions are all healthy and harmonious—a satisfaction that has reason and right on its side, and in which there is no room for little upstart queriats of doubt, and against which critics and accusers have no power. Now it is God's sympathy and tenderness that does so much for weary hearts—that lends such a little passing sweetness to the mind—that is worth more in a moment than all the ingenuities of wit or the self-deceptions of natural hope. Give us a breath of air from his presence. Give us a touch of his hand. Give us a heart-beat—a pulsation, a little wind—wave—a life breath, an interior possession that is truly and certainly Divine.

I have often thought, "O, if one only had some way of catching and keeping all the little thoughts he has, the little glimpses, the little reasonings, the pictures and perceptions! But they are gone before I get them fastened." One needs a photograph or a phonograph in himself. What are we to do with our worries? Some wise head will say, "Don't have any." But this is almost like a command to the sea not to betray itself with an eruption, an eruption of white caps. The great thing is to find a medicine for the mind—oil of quiescence for the spirit of perturbation. I will give a hint of the medicine, nay, it is an exercise, an expedient rather than a medicine. It is this: Turn thy worried heart, fronting and facing God; let its perturbation mingled with prayer, and gaided by the will, expend itself toward him—and so either expire and dissolve, or actually be changed to joy.

There are wonderful ways of one's finding out by being full of prayer, and looking to the Father of mercies. Looking, looking, looking—always looking, is duty, privilege, necessity and instinct. Who can live, or dare live, or even would live without making God one's confidant, or finding in God one's comfort? Life becomes wofully wanting, where God is unsought. Intelligent volition like a magnetic needle, or the power that governs it, will point to the unseen object of faith and desire, that is, God. And this is done best by being taught how to do it, by being enabled to do it, and teaching and enabling come by seeking and teachableness. Things are learned and received more by seeking, than communicated by supernatural favor alone. It is a law in religion—study to know, and labor to get. Christians are not made rich and strong by simple good fortune.

I would like to speak of Arkansas again. Some brethren, I trust, are coming soon from Kansas. We want a colony of Christians for this place. I am not sure but it might be called "the Believer's colony." Trees loaded with peaches, oaks full of acorns, bushes full of berries, (and here we find berries in trees, just now ripe and ripening—I mean mulberry trees) huckleberries, peas, potatoes, these last three in April, and many such things make Arkansas desirable. And grapes and persimmons coming—wild grapes by the thousand bushels. The other day an Illinois farmer dug a well. It was done with a little help of an assistant. About noon of the second day, I think, it was finished, and the family rich and happy with pure water. The stiff sub-soil is so firm that stoning is unnecessary.

When the cold wave swept through the north, a few days ago, and blossom-trees were caught and nipped with frost, we were mercifully preserved. I have sometimes thought inquiringly, "Is there some region midway between tropic heat and polar cold, where God will in His Providence temper coming judgments on the world, and soften the asperities of trial?" I do not pretend to say. I am here in His hand. My prayer is, may the Lord send us wise, enterprising, capable, and praying people, none with faint hearts or wavering minds, men and women of courage and intelligence, who can utilize the possibilities of the country. (And a little capital is needful, too, to begin with.) It is not mechanical skill that is needed so much, it is agricultural, horticultural, and fruit raising taste, experience and zeal that seem to promise best. I cannot tell what profits may be stored up in [illegible] called forth by [illegible] tures of turpentine, resin, [illegible] from the pine trees, or of vinegar from the thousands of bushels of wild grapes, or of other preparations from these and various other fruits. Who can guess the tons of black-berries now fast hastening to maturity, all over this region? But I say no more. A large number of thorough people could find or found homes, before another winter, if they chose, and we would have a community of noble souls, loving God, and loving his service and word.

Now to God be all glory, while we intensely beseech His power and goodness to rest like a cloud of brightness on our souls, God of all knowledge and majesty, help us wonderfully, and quicken us with magic of infinite grace. The God of apostles and prophets and patriarchs, sanctify and satisfy us, heal all our sorrows, rectify all our disorders, forgive all our transgressions, multiply our consolations, and divinely animate our hopes.

Comfort and relieve all who suffer, protect the weak and innocent, and heal the broken-hearted. The Lord pour oil of gladness into aching hearts, send rest to the worn and weary, give unutterable sweetness of pity and peace to the buffeted and discouraged. The Lord bless all of you, O beloved, that suffer and struggle amid disappointments and afflictions. The Lord breathe a heavenly balm of air most fragrant, and medicinal, to soften all your secret and indescribable anguish of sorrow, and make your hearts to nourish with preciously commingled life and growth of love and faith and hope. O weary souls, rest,—rest in God! May your peace be great, your trust be perfect, and your deliverance wonderful.

C. GILLESPIE.

An Obituary Notice and a Biographical Sketch Combined.

Died in Robinson, Maine, Mrs. Nancy Bond Felt, at the advanced age of 87 years, only two left of a family of nine children, of which with our parents, we will give a biographical sketch.

We deem it proper and commendable especially in this infidel age, to keep in remembrance and bring before the public such worthy examples of the Christian name.

Our parents were of the New England Puritan stock, deeply impregnated with the principles embodied in the Declaration of American Independence, viz: that all men are born free and equal, and have certain inalienable rights to the pursuit of life, liberty, and happiness. Thanks be to God that the mantle of our parents has fallen upon their children. Our parents were of English descent, but were early in life Americanized; they came of Christians who believed and worshipped the God of the Bible; at the age of fourteen my father, Jonas Bond, entered the Continental army, took the first shot under Major Monroe, on Lexington Plains: served through the seven years' struggle for American independence, was at the taking of Cornwallis, at the capture of Burgoyne and his army at Crown Point, was one of the few who scaled the walls of Quebec and escaped with his life, was taken captive three times by the Indians, gave himself to die twice with hunger and cold but was taken up and saved. Early in life he married Lydia Hapgood, of Petersham, Worcester Co., Mass., a worthy woman in every sense of the word. Our parents were brought up and educated in the Congregational faith and were Orthodox in the strictest manner, till about the middle of life, when they changed off for Methodism, which was very unpopular at that time.

Eight of the nine children became Methodist at or near the same time. It was the custom in those days for Methodists to be honest and live out their religion.

Not only has the mantle of our parents fallen on the children in relation to our American ideas, but also of pure Bible christianity in the full and literal sense of the word, they showed their faith by their works.

I can give but one illustration. Thanksgiving has always been a great day in New England, and a good time is always expected. Father believed that the Savior meant just what he said, when thou makest a feast call not thy rich friends, but call the poor, the lame, etc., for they cannot recompense thee, but thou shalt be recompensed at the resurrection of the just. They provided a good dinner, invited all the poor of the village. What a sight at that table, and what an impression, yea what a deep conviction of the wrong of modern Gentileism; how has the gold changed and the fine gold become dim. After a lapse of seventy years the whole scene of that Thanksgiving dinner is fresh and clear as the noon-day sun, and we have resolved never to give a sumptuous dinner to our well-to-do friends, but to treat all with respect and kindness. [illegible] our neighbors. Deacon Bond is a good man and a Christian, but he need not be so odd and so very scrupulous to set out the literal rendering of Christ's words; he could have saved the mortification of his family and friends. Much more might be said but we forbear.

Our parents are gone, with seven of our brothers and sisters; all died as they lived, practical Christians. But two are left—the writer, and a younger brother who is an Episcopalian of the strictest kind—not a stain or a blot on the fair escutcheon of our family record. What is still better all have given the strongest testimony to the reality of pure Bible christianity.

What a happy meeting only a little way in the future, when the old patriarch and his companion will say, Here Lord, are we and our children thou hast given us. Now at the age of four score years and four, I stand on the margin of the river, and view our Eden home, and ask, Shall I pass over with the host of God's elect and enter that goodly land, or must I like Moses the servant of God, die and be buried in sight of that heavenly Canaan, and sleep a short time, to be awakened by the voice of the archangel and trump of God to join the shining retinue who will come forth clad in immortality and ascend to meet the Lord in the air?

God's holy will be done, but with Paul I say, if by any means I may attain to the resurrection out from among the dead ones, but above all and beyond all considerations I may not be among the left when the righteous shall be taken. For this and we deuotedly pray and strive. Oh the deep and profound interests of the present moment! Our fervent prayer is that the grandchildren, relatives, and friends may emulate the noble example set them.

NEWELL BOND.

Skobeleff is a young man for his rank, being still under forty. He is very tall and well built, and gives external appearance of the great physical force and endurance with which he is credited. The expression of the general's face, however, is singularly good and mild. He wears a long auburn beard, flowing down on his breast. Skobeleff speaks French as well as Russian. He makes no secret of his desire to free thoroughly, if not annex, Bulgaria, and says he has only to hold up his hand to make forty thousand of the inhabitants rise as one man.

SOME THOUGHTS ON GOD.

J. P. GELLENLY.

As a father pitieth his children so the Lord pitieth them that fear him, for he knoweth our frame, he remembereth that we are dust.

One of the besetting errors of mankind has always been the conception of our Maker as a harsh and exacting Being. Even apart from the horrible and absurd doctrine of the eternal tormenting of "lost souls" it takes other phases. One of these conclusions is derived from a misunderstanding of the spirit of the law to Israel. The infidel, in his endeavors to scandalize the Bible, points to the law of blood for blood, eye for eye, tooth for tooth. They point to it as indicating a spirit of revenge, and predictive of hatred. This idea, with ingenious oratory, can be made to have a good show of plausibility. A specious argument can be set up by quoting such texts as "I am a jealous God," "Vengeance is mine, saith the Lord." This last, especially when the face is worked into a scowl and it is hissed through the clenched teeth, accompanied by profuse and violent demonstrations with the fists, can be made to do service in the work of blasphemy. Of course, where it is read with the proper admonitory tone, and especially with the beautiful context—"Dearly beloved brethren, avenge not yourselves, but rather give place unto wrath; for it is written, Vengeance is mine, saith the Lord,"—it loses all the fervency and rancor that is attached to it by the enemies of the plain truth.

Yet the principle embodied in the law of eye for eye and tooth for tooth, is even by some well meaning people irreconcilable with the spirit of christianity, particularly as our Lord took occasion to supercede and abolish it as unworthy of his followers. He embodied the whole law in two commandments—love to God and our neighbor: now strange though it may seem, the law of eye for eye and tooth for tooth is the next of kin to "thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." It is plain to the most casual observer that a man who loves his neighbor as himself, will be as careful of his neighbor's eyes and teeth as he is of his own. His neighbor's life and property will be as precious in his sight as his own. This is what the perfect law of love enjoins. But in what might be termed the period when society was in its minority; before the "perfect" law was comprehended, the motive of fear was called to perform the work that love was ultimately to do, namely, the work of mutual protection,—the first principle—upon which all human society is based, for by the strong hand and the outstretched arm of the law, those who had no respect for their neighbors would still have a care for themselves, and so force bound them into "brotherkeepers."

During the period of minority of individuals we find that it is necessary in education, to call into our service the motive of force. I know that while I state this many voices will be uplifted to say No! No! but both Solomon and experience testify "that the fear of the rod bringeth instruction, and a child left to itself bringeth its father to shame."

This does not imply that fear should be the ruling motive of the household but the evil controling motive. The big burly policeman, as it were, patroling around, good natured and so forth, but carrying his club round, all the same, sheathed at his belt and handy. Fear is the method, both human and divine, of curbing villiany; it is used by every nation and every parent, and every schoolmaster in some form or other, with various degrees of wisdom or foolishness, as the case may be, and it was the method that God used to restrain wickedness in Israel and induce mutual respect.

Thus we can see the Fatherhood of God. Thus we can see how the law was a schoolmaster, to bring us to the perfection of gentleness as embodied in Jesus. At school we learn by rote, through compulsion, what in after years we ought to put in practice. And so the law to Israel was righteousness and justice by rote. Afterwards in the fulness of time, christianity is righteousness and justice in practice.

Besides, even during the period of Israel's law, justice was modified by mercy. "I will have mercy and not sacrifice," was the proclamation. Revenge was not encouraged. If I have a neighbor's note for $100 the law binds him to pay it, but it does not bind me to exact it. And so we return to the wisdom and gentleness of God. Wisdom in clearly defining his idea of strict justice, compassion and gentleness in its administration. Surely it is the goodness of God that ought to lead to repentance, and perfect love ought to cast out fear.

True honor does not attach to position or place, but to character; and a man may possess a good character in a very humble position, or a bad character in a very exalted place.

Brevities.

The British and Foreign Bible Society has printed a Basuto Bible at a cost of $20,000. This is the ninth complete Bible in the native tongues of Africa. The translation is the work of a French missionary, M. Mabille.

The wedding of Princess Maria of Schoa to the Crown Prince of Abyssinia, which took place a few weeks ago in Ankobar, was a gay affair. The nuptial festivities lasted a fortnight, during which period a long programme of banquets and balls, races and hunting parties was carried out to the letter. Throughout the marriage ceremony Princess Maria wore upon her head the most precious heirloom of her family—a massive golden diadem, enriched with twelve huge rubies which was once the property of King Solomon the Wise. The Schoa dynasty is the oldest royal house in existence, and Menelik claims unbroken descent from the Queen of Sheba, whose visit in state to the Court of Jerusalem is recorded in the Scriptures.

WASHINGTON'S SERVANT DIES AT THE AGE OF 115 YEARS.

Yesterday morning an old colored woman named Maurice Ramey, died at her residence, Twenty-Fourth and Howard streets, this city. She came here about six years ago from Virginia, and stated that to the the best of her knowledge she was then 110 years old. This would make her now 115, although there are many who believe that she was still older. She was in full possession of her faculties up to a short time before her death, and related with accuracy many incidents of early times, now a matter of history. She was at one time a servant in the family of George Washington, and remembered the father of his country and the members of the family as well as she did the incidents of her own life. She has children and grandchildren residing in this city, some of whom are old people.—St. Joseph (Mo.) Herald.

THE COMING GREAT COMET.

If the comet that was discovered by a young astronomer in Albany a week ago fulfills half of the promises made for it, we may expect to behold, in May or June, a celestial spectacle such as has not been equalled since 1858 or 1811. This comet, although some 200,000,000 miles from its perihelion, which it will not reach for three months, shows a bright tail and a starlike nucleus. The inference is fair that the comet is a very large one, and that when it gets into our neighborhood it will present a magnificent appearance. Moreover, Prof. Chandler's figures show that the comet is plunging almost straight at the sun, which it will probably approach within 100,000 miles. The only other comets, in the long list of those bodies whose orbits have been calculated, which approached anything like as near to the sun as this are the comet of 370 B. C., the comet of 1668, the comet of 1680, often called Newton's comet, the comet of 1843, and the comet of 1880. The last named was observed only in South America and Australia and at the Cape of Good Hope. Concerning the comet of 370 B. C., of which frightful things are related, and which is said to have split in two, not much is known, but the measurements made in the other cases are generally to be depended upon. In fact, it was the nearness of the approach of the comet of 1680 which led Newton to anticipate possible peril to the earth from the fall of a great comet into the sun. This is not the popular view of the danger from comets, the fear usually being that they may strike the earth, or produce pestilence by mingling the substance of their tails with our atmosphere. Of late, the other view has been made more conspicuous, especially since Mr. Proctor's recent article on what he calls the menacing comet of 1880, which he anticipates may return in 1897.

THE TEMPLE OF SOLOMON.

The information that orders have been given by the Sultan, Abdul Hamid, to resume the restoration of Solomon's Temple is of considerable importance. The work was commenced under the reign of Abdul Aziz and discontinued some five years ago. If carried out conscientiously now, it must add considerably to our knowledge of the topography of the most interesting spot in the world. In speaking of Solomon's Temple, it should be borne in mind that not one, but three temples have been erected on this site—the temple of Solomon, that of Zerubbabel, and finally that of Herod, a thousand years after Solomon's. We cannot tell as yet what may be the nature of the work undertaken by the Turkish authorities, but in all probability, the restorations will include the latter buildings, Zerubbabel's and Herod's. Indeed, it would be impossible to exclude them from the operations of the pickaxe, since they must be above any earlier structures built on the same site. The building of Herod enclosed a larger space than its predecessors, but in reality the Temple of Zorubbabel was repaired rather than rebuilt by Herod, so that we have principally to consider only two buildings, or as they are generally termed, the First and Second Temple. These two edifices did not quite agree in their arrangements and dimensions, but as their principle features were identical, the name of Solomon's Temple may be justly applied to the whole mass of ruins which lie buried in the Haram, and is probably so intended to apply in the present announcement.—Jewish Messenger, San Francisco, Cal.

The true Christian is like the sun, which pursues his noiseless track, and everywhere leaves the effect of his beams in a blessing upon the world around him.—Luther.

The different renderings of various passages in the New Testament are the foundations on which most of the sects of Christians have been built up; with this work each reader may judge for himself whether the words there literally translated are so arranged in the common version as to express the exact meaning of the New Testament writers.
New improved edition on larger paper, 864 pages, cloth $4.00, Library binding $5.00.

The COVENANTS.

A TREATISE ON,

I. The Abrahamic covenant, its terms, its extent, its duration, its covenantees, and when persecuted.

II. The Sinaitic covenant, its terms, its relation to the Abrahamic covenant, where given, to whom given, the unity of the Law, its duration and its terminus, the Sabbath and its purposes.

III. The New covenant, the covenantees—not the church, but Israel; conditional prophecy considered, restoration from Babylon considered, future restoration of Israel as covenantees, our relation to the New covenant—as the Seed of the Abrahamic covenant. As the Mediation body, as a Royal and an Eternal Priesthood—now upon the plane of the flesh and seed, then through the veil upon the plane of spirit: restoration of the Aaronical order of priesthood to the house of Judah under the Princes and subordinates to the royal priesthood; the necessity and the nature of sacrifice in the ages to come.

IV. The Davidian covenant, its terms, the kingdom divided, the kingdom removed, the seed abolished, the kingdom to be restored under Messiah, the reign eternal.

V. Twelve objections to the position, that the kingdom of Christ in organization is yet future, answered, and the law of induction into the kingdom or the birth of the water and of the spirit.

This work is now in press and will be ready for distribution in June or early in July. It will make from 300 to 350 pages, and will sell for $1 per copy. We are now receiving names for the work, to be paid when the book is delivered. We want your name: give us your name for the work.

The Restitution.

"THE RESTITUTION OF ALL THINGS WHICH GOD HATH SPOKEN BY THE MOUTH OF ALL HIS HOLY PROPHETS SINCE THE WORLD BEGAN."

VOL. XXXI. PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, MAY 17, 1882. NO. 19.

THE RESTITUTION.

TERMS—TWO DOLLARS PER YEAR, Payable in advance. Three and Six Months at the same rate.

Address all Letters and Communications to THE RESTITUTION, Plymouth, Indiana.

TO CORRESPONDENTS:

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of Kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the earth during the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief of the gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

COMING AGE—ITS PROXIMITY. No. III.

Rise of a New Empire. Its Growth. Its Capital. Its Civil Rulers. Its Relationship to the Old Greek Empire. Its Relationship to the Latin Empire. Its Character as Developed in History. Its Acts Examined.

J. P. WEETHEE.

Byzantium was located on the European shore of the Thracian Bosphorus near the boundary between Asia and Europe. Byzantium was the location of an old Grecian colony, B. C. 667. It had a checkered existence for a thousand years. Thrace, whose capital was Byzantium was a province of the Macedonian empire under Philip, and his son, Alexander the Great. Under Alexander's successors, it was in one of the four divisions of that empire. The Macedonian or Grecian empire is the subject of some very distinct prophecies, which the reader will find here quoted.

"His (metallic image) belly and thighs of brass," explained, "Another third kingdom of brass, which shall bear rule over the earth." Dan. ii. 32, 39. "After this I beheld, and lo another, like a leopard, which had upon the back of it four wings of a fowl: the beast had also four heads; and dominion was given to it." Dan. vii. 6. "And as I was considering, behold, a he-goat came from the west on the face of the whole earth, and touched not the ground: and the goat (had) a horn between his eyes. And he came to the ram that had (two) horns, which I had seen standing before the river, and ran unto him in the fury of his power. And I saw him come close unto the ram, and he was moved with choler against him, and he smote the ram, and brake his two horns: and there was no power in the ram to stand before him, but he cast him down to the ground and stamped upon him: and there was none that could deliver the ram out of his hand. Therefore the he-goat waxed very great; and when he was strong, the great horn was broken; and for it came up four notable ones towards the four winds of heaven." Dan. viii. 5–8. Explained. "The ram which thou sawest having (two) horns (are) are the kings of Media and Persia. And the rough goat is the king of Grecia. And the great horn that (is) between his eyes (is) the first (kingdom). Now that being broken, whereas four stood up for it, four kingdoms shall stand up out of the nation, but not in his power. And in the latter time of their kingdom." Dan. viii. 20–23. "Behold, there shall stand up yet, three kings in Persia; and the fourth shall be far richer than they all: and by his strength through his riches he shall stir up all against the realm of Grecia, and a mighty king shall stand up, that shall rule with great dominion and do according to his will, and when he shall stand up his kingdom shall be broken, and shall be divided towards the four winds of heaven." Dan. xi. 2–4.

The Grecian empire, under Alexander the Great, overthrew the Persian empire. Under Alexander, the Macedonian, or Grecian empire, was a universal empire, the third in the metallic image.

After his death, it was erected into four kingdoms, towards the four quarters of the earth. These divisions were as follows:

"Ptolemy had Egypt, Lybia, Arabia, Coelo-Syria, and Palestine: Cassander had Macedonia and Greece: Lysimachus, Thrace, Bithynia, and some other provinces, beyond the Hellespont and the Bosphorus: and Seleucus, all the rest of Asia, to the other side of the Euphrates, and as far as the river Indus."—Rollin.

It will be seen that Grecia Propria, was but a small part of the Macedonian empire under Alexander and his successors; one small part of the Macedonian kingdom, (one of the four) under Cassander.

For one hundred and thirty years Alexander's successors were disputing the right of empire with each other and with the Romans. In the battle of Pydna, (June 22, B. C. 168) between the Romans, under P. Æmilius, and Perseus, king of Macedonia, the latter was defeated, and his kingdom came under the Romans.

The former time of the Grecian monarchy, under Alexander and his successors, continued about 165 years. From B. C. 168, to A. D. 330, at least, Thrace, Macedonia and Greece proper, were simply Roman provinces.

Under Constantine this new colony, at Byzantium, then called Constantinople, situated in the Thracian division of the Grecо-Macedonian empire, grew with amazing rapidity. In laying out the city Constantine professed to be under the guide, seen in his vision, "I shall advance (said Constantine) till He, the invisible guide who marches before me thinks proper to stop." Like old Rome, it occupied seven hills, which arose "above each other in beautiful order." In one century the city had so increased as to cover the seven hills. Under Theodosius the younger, it was surrounded with walls. It was eleven miles in circumference. To build this new city the wealth, the labor, and genius of millions were occupied. Heathen monuments were crowded into the city. Though its founder was a Christian by profession, it had nothing to distinguish it from other heathen cities.

This rising empire, whose capital was Constantinople, was as truly a Greek empire, as the one in Italy, whose capital was old Rome, was a Latin empire; and was as justly entitled to that name as the one under Alexander and his successors. It originated on that territory; was a Grecian colony, and always used the Greek language; and in the strictest sense, was the latter time of the Grecian kingdom.

The final division of the Roman empire into the Eastern, or Greek empire, and Western, or Latin empire, was accomplished by Theodosius the Great, about A. D. 390. It was divided between his two sons, Arcadius and Honorius. "Arcadius had the Greek empire, capital, Constantinople, with the provinces of Thrace, Asia Minor, Syria, and Egypt, from the Lower Danube to the confines of Persia and Æthiopia. His younger brother, Honorius, assumed, in the eleventh year of his age, the nominal government of Italy, Africa, Gaul, Spain, and Britain."—Gibbon.

The reader will readily recognize, in the division of Arcadius, the old Macedonian empire of Alexander and his successors: since Macedonia and Greece were included in his division: the little kingdom of Greece, existing since 1827, has no place in Daniel as the Macedonian empire in the latter time of their kingdom. Compare the former and latter times. Former times of the Macedonian empire, from B. C. 330 to B. C. 168—162 years. Macedonian or Grecian empire in their latter time from A. D. 310 to May 29, 1453—1063 years. Space between during which they were under the Romans 558 years. This space is sufficiently long to allow the expression, "Latter time of their kingdom." Before entering upon the character and agency of the Greek empire, allow us to take notice of a few points which may be termed deductions. Christ's commission was, Go teach (disciple) all nations; not the Jews only, but all Gentile nations. What shall we teach them? Teach them what I have taught you. God designed that the mission of his Son should be heard and read by all nations. To this end a great preparatory work had to be accomplished, in what seemed to be a natural way.

1. The ten tribes were scattered; and, for a time, lost among the nations.

2. The two tribes were carried captive, disciplined, and returned, to keep up the worship of God, and prepare a people to receive his Son.

3. The world is brought under the Grecian domination; and when their language is spoken over all the earth the Greek Scriptures (Septuagent) appear.

4. When the Romans are to govern the world, the Latin Vulgate appears. When the last call is about to go forth the Scriptures appear in all the principal languages of the earth.

We have said these preparations seemed to be made in a natural way. We will illustrate this idea by one example.

Ptolemy Philadelphus, the thunder, was the first heir to the throne of Egypt, since he was the son of Ptolemy Soter's first wife, Eurydice. Berenice, a younger wife, through her unbounded influence, obtained the crown for her own son, Ptolemy Philadelphus. Ptolemy Philadelphus had a taste for books and learning, and collected an immense library. He gathered books of all nations. Learning that the Jews had a copy of the laws of Moses, he immediately entered upon the work of securing a copy. He released 120,000 Jews that his father had reduced to slavery, at a cost of 8314,400. He then sent a letter to Eleazer, making known his desire. Eleazer sent six learned Jews from each tribe (72), with a copy of the Mosaic law, written in Hebrew letters of gold. This copy was translated into the Greek language.

"These 72 elders were conducted by Ptolemy to a building in the isle of Pharos and sustained by his own means while they were at their work. In seventy-two days they completed the book commonly called the Septuagint Version—70, the round number, though it was the work of 72. That copy of the Greek Scriptures cost the king over one million dollars! Who cannot see in this great work a Divine hand; as distinct as that which wrote upon the walls of the palace of Belshazzar? Nations associate for exchange of commodities. The masses are in pursuit of worldly gain. For this, seas and lands are constantly swarming with a busy population. The wants of civilization and refinement convert every land into a work-shop. The various necessities give rise to various occupations, these occupations divide the human family into distinct classes. These classes are composed of every grade of talent; actuated with every variety of motive from that of the brute to the holy aspirations of the unfallen angels.

All seem to move and act freely. With the large majority the world is their home, and Mammon is their god. His law is their guide. They delight in his servitude. In him they live, and move, and have their being. They send no aspirations upward. The social and political worlds bound their thoughts and their desires. They have no king but Cæsar. Are these views correct? How do they compare with the Divine Revelations to the holy prophets? The king of Babylon once thought as rulers, and their people now think: "Is not this great Babylon, that I have built for the house of the kingdom by the might of my power, and for the honor of my majesty?" After seven years' habitation in the open field, exposed to dews, and tempests, with the food of oxen, we hear him again speak: "All the inhabitants of the earth (are) reputed as nothing: and he doeth according to his will in the army of heaven, and (among) the inhabitants of the earth: and none can stay his hand, or say unto him, What doest thou?" "The Most High ruleth in the kingdom of men, and giveth it to whomsoever he will, and setteth up over it the basest of men." Dan. iv. 17, 35.

Who but the Most High can delineate future history? Who but Jehovah can name persons and kingdoms, centuries before they here exist? It can be done by him alone who is the God of the future as well as of the past. Who printed that metallic image on the minds of Nebuchadnezzar and of Daniel? The same Being that showed Moses a pattern of the tabernacle. We should study history to see God's footprints. And we should read his history of the future with the same assurance of its accomplishment, as we peruse the records of fulfilled history. So certain as the four Gentile monarchies have existed, and still exist in some form, so certain will the stone make dust of the image; become a great mountain and fill the whole earth. Amen. Come, Lord Jesus—quickly.

Like flakes of snow that fall unperceived upon the earth, the seemingly unimportant events of life succeed one another. As the snow gathers together, so are our habits formed. No single flake that is added to the pile produces a sensible change: no single action creates, however it may exhibit, a man's character.—Jeremy Taylor.

HUTCHINSON, Kan.

Editor Restitution:

Some two months ago I held a public discussion in the court house in this city, with T. W. Woodrow, Universalist. Woodrow affirming that those who die in wilful disobedience to the gospel of Jesus Christ shall enjoy eternal life.

Having been requested to write out a synopsis of the arguments, pro and con, but knowing that you are overrun with communications containing valuable and important matter, have concluded to give you a summary of my arguments as presented during the ten evenings of discussion, showing the two classes of persons; also the two distinct and very different destinies, of the righteous and the wicked.

|---|---|
| Abominable, corrupt, filthy, lost, miserable, blind, naked, ungodly, foul or evil, desperately wicked; unbelievers, dead, denied, cut off from the Tree of Life, shall not exist, destroyed, utterly consumed, cut off. Shall be burnt up, shall be as though there had not been, as stubble fully dry, as thorns; will make an utter end, blasphemers, unholy, fierce, breakers, false-accusers, headstrong, haters of good, despiteful, proud, lovers of self things, disobedient, without God, without Christ, without life. No place, no hope, no escape, no name in the Book of life, shall not inherit eternal life, shall not inherit the kingdom, shall not inherit the promises, shall not see God; in whom God has no pleasure, shall not enter into rest, shall exclaim Lord Lord, shall never enter, shall be destroyed, are not written with the righteous, a brute beast; shall be utterly perish, as thorns and briers, shall have an utter end, devoured as coming burnt sacrifice in burning, be brought to nought, shall die, are extinct, etc. | Our fellowship is with the Father, ye are the body of Christ, ye are members with him, ye are buried with Christ, raised to walk in life, have been quickened together, raised up together, sitting together in heavenly places, living together, walking together, suffering together, glorified together, ye are the light of the world, ye are sons of God, ye are His children, ye shall reign with him, ye shall reign for ever; ye are heirs of all things, heirs of God, heirs of Christ, servants of God. Ye are without fault, ye are holy, undefiled, ye are sons of God, ye shall receive a crown of glory, elect of God, clothed in white raiment, believers unto salvation, believers have faith, stand by faith, walk by faith, are saved by faith, adopted by faith, justified by faith, sanctified by faith, saved by faith, we are purified by faith, we are pardoned, we inherit the promises, we inherit the kingdom, we inherit eternal life, we have peace with God, we are blessed, we are forgiven, we shall not come into condemnation, we will not walk in darkness, we shall never hunger, we shall never thirst, we shall live, we shall be permitted to meet the saints of all ages in Eden restored, and Eden restored is the Paradise of God. |

The above is only a brief synopsis of the matter presented, all of which was sustained by the plain reading of the Bible. Mr. Woodrow is a man of more than ordinary ability, a fine talker, and can see and feel the weakness of his cause when contrasted with the plain teaching of the word of God. Eccl. xiii. 22, but he has a work to do, and it must be done; a salvation that most interests all such preachers, is to save themselves from starvation, and unless the preachers of Universalism do this they are of all men the most miserable.

W. L. WINSLOW.

ORTHODOX TRAINING.

Two detached leaflets from "The Church Catechism" fell into my hands to-day, and perhaps some questions and answers printed thereon may prove interesting to your readers, by way of pointing out the "training" a child undergoes in the Episcopal church.

QUESTION: What do you mean by sponsers?

ANSWER: Those who made promises to God for me.

Q. When did they make promises for you?

A. When they brought me to God in baptism.

Q. What did God do for you then?

A. He made me a part of Christ's church.

Q. What else did he do for you?

A. He adopted me for his own dear child.

Q. What did he promise to give you?

A. A place in his home in heaven.

Need we wonder, with this before us, that so many are alienated from Christ through the ignorance in them? Babes at the knee fed on unwholesome food are not likely to reach manhood, and are even less likely are children imbibing untruth, to reach that healthy Berean state of mind which proving all things holds fast only to the good. What a misnomer to call that Church Christ's that conforms to a practice he never established, and heralds a promise he never made!

When, and where, did he promise one who through inability to make an intelligent confession, and who promised by proxy to "fight sin, the world, and the devil," that the reward for such "worship" will be "a place in his home in heaven?" When and where did the apostles set as "sponsers" to those who embraced the truth as it is in Jesus? The terrible errors that are planted in the fresh minds of children by this "Church Catechism" must bear fruit; and of what kind? Even that of eternal death!

What sane parent would knowingly poison his child? Surely it is all done through ignorance: and yet this ignorance so often assumes the complacency of knowledge that to approach it, much less remove it, requires faith, wisdom, and love that God, through his holy word, alone can give.

One or two more questions and answers:

Q. What gift will God give you when you are confirmed?

A. His Holy Spirit.

Q. What must you learn first?

A. The Church Catechism!

Alas for the enlightenment of the age! The gift of the Spirit of God dependent on a knowledge of the Church Catechism! If this is not grave darkness, what is it?

May some honest hearts who have been fettered by these bonds, lay hold on truth, and breaking forever from slavery, rejoice that they are indeed free.

ORIENTAL SKETCHES.—No. 14.

Bashan and its Giant Cities.

J. L. PORTER, A. M.

BOZRAH.

"And Judgment is come.....upon Bozrah."—Jer. xlviii. 24.

I spent three days at Bozrah. There is much to be seen there,—much of Scriptural, and still more of historical and antiquarian interest; and I tried to see it all. Bozrah was a strong city, as its name implies—Bozrah, "fortress,"—and a magnificent city; and numerous vestiges of its ancient strength and magnificence remain to this day. Its ruins are nearly five miles in circuit, its walls are lofty and massive; and its castle is one of the largest and strongest fortresses in Syria. Among the ruins I saw two theatres, six temples, and ten or twelve churches and mosques; besides palaces, baths, fountains, aqueducts, triumphal arches, and other structures almost without number. The old Bozrites must have been men of great taste and enterprise as well as wealth. Some of the buildings I saw there would grace the proudest capital of modern Europe.

It is a work of no little toil to explore Bozrah. The streets are mostly covered, and in some places completely blocked up, with fallen buildings and heaps of rubbish. Over these I had to climb, risking my limbs among loose stones. The principal structures, too, are so much encumbered with broken columns and the piled-up ruins of roofs and pediments, that one has great difficulty in getting at them, and discovering their points of interest or beauty. In trying to copy a Greek inscription over the door of a church, I clambered to the top of a wall. My weight caused it to topple over, and it fell with a terrible crash. It was only by a sudden and hazardous leap I escaped, and barely escaped, being buried beneath it. And we were hourly exposed to danger of another and still more pressing kind. Bozrah had once a population of a hundred thousand souls and more; when I was there its whole inhabitants comprised just twenty families! These lived huddled together in the lower stories of some very ancient houses near the castle. The rest of the city is completely desolate. The fountains near the city, and the rich pastures which encircle them, attract wandering Bedawin,—outcasts from the larger tribes, and notorious thieves and brigands. These come up from the desert with a few goats, sheep, and donkeys, and perhaps a horse; and they lurk, gipsy-like, about the fountains and among the ruins of the large outlying towns of Bashan, watching every opportunity to plunder an unguarded caravan or strip (Luke x. 30) an unwary traveller, or steal a stray camel. The whole environs of Bozrah are infested with them. Our arrival, numbers, and equipments had been carefully noted; and armed men lay in wait, as we soon discovered, at various places, in the hope of grappling and plundering some straggler. Once, indeed, a bold attempt was made by their combined forces to carry off our whole party. We had fortunately taken the precaution on our arrival to engage the brother of the sheikh as guard and guide during our stay; and to this arrangement, joined to the fear of the Druse escort, we owed our safety. So true has time made the words of Jeremiah: "The spoilers are come upon all high places through the wilderness .....no flesh shall have peace" Jer. xii. 12. The words of Ezekiel, too, are strikingly applicable to the present state of Bozrah: "Thus saith the Lord God of the land of Israel: They shall eat their bread with carefulness, and drink their water with astonishment, that their land may be desolate from all that is therein, because of the violence of them that dwell therein. And the cities that are inhabited shall be laid waste, and the land shall be desolate." Ezek. xii. 19, 20.

The sheikh of Bozrah told me that his flocks would not be safe even in his own court-yard at night, and that armed sentinels had to patrol continually round their little fields at harvest-time. "If it were not for the castle," he said, "which has high walls and a strong iron gate, we should be forced to leave Bozrah altogether. We could not stay here a week. The Bedawin swarm round the ruins. They steal everything they can lay hold of,—goat, sheep, cow, horse, or camel; and before we can get on their track they are far away in the desert."

Two or three incidents came under my own notice which proved the truth of the sheikh's statement. One day while examining the ruins of large mosque, the head of a Bedawy appeared over an adjoining wall, looking at us. The sheikh, who was by my side, cried out, on seeing him, "Dog, you stole my sheep!" and seizing a stone he hurled it at him with such force and precision as must have brained him had he not ducked behind the wall. The sheikh and his companions gave chase, but the fellow escaped. One cannot but compare such scenes, scenes of ordinary life, of everyday occurrence in Bashan, with the language of prophecy: "I will give it (the land of Israel) into the hands of strangers for a prey, and to the wicked of the earth for a spoil;.....robbers shall enter into it and defile it.....The land is full of bloody crimes, and the city is full of violence." Ezek. vii. 2, 21–23.

Bozrah was one of the strongest cities of Bashan; it was, indeed, the most celebrated fortress east of the Jordan, during the Roman rule in Syria. Some parts of its wall are still almost perfect, a massive rampart of solid masonry, fifteen feet thick and nearly thirty high. With great square towers at intervals. The walled city was almost a rectangle, about a mile and a quarter long by a mile broad; and outside this were large straggling suburbs. A straight street intersects the city lengthwise, and huge beautiful gate at each end; and other straight streets run across it. Roman Bozrah (or Bostra) was a beautiful city, with long straight avenues and spacious thoroughfares; but the Saracens built their miserable little shops and quaint irregular houses along the sides of the streets, out and in, here and there, as fancy or funds directed; and they thus converted the stately Roman capital, as they did Damascus and Antioch, into a labyrinth of narrow, crooked, gloomy lanes. One sees the splendid Roman palace, and gorgeous Greek Temple, and the shapeless Arab dukkan, side by side, alike in ruins, just as if the words of Isaiah had been written with special reference to this city of Moab: "He shall bring down their pride together with the spoil of their hands. And the fortress of the high fort of thy walls shall He bring down, lay low, and bring to the ground, even to the dust." Isa. xxv. 11, 12.

It might perhaps be as trying to my reader's patience as it was to my limbs, were I to trace with him all my wanderings among the ruins of Bozrah; relating every little incident and adventure, and describing the wonders of art and architecture, and the curiosities of votive tablet, and dedicatory inscription on altar, tomb, church, and temple, which I examined and deciphered during these three days. Still I think many will wish to hear a few particulars about an old Bible city, and a city of so much historical importance in the latter days of Bashan's glory. To me and to my companions it was intensely interesting to note the changes that old city has undergone. They are shown in the strata of its ruins just as geological periods are shown in the strata of the earth's crust. Some of them are revealed, too, on monumental tablets, containing the legends of other centuries. In one spot, deep down beneath the accumulated remains of more recent buildings, I saw the simple, massive, primitive dwellings of the aborigines, with their stone doors and stone roofs. These were built and inhabited by the gigantic Emim and Rephaim long before the Chaldean shepherd migrated from Ur to Canaan. Gen. xiv. 5. High above them rose the classic portico of a Roman temple, shattered and tottering, but still grand in its ruins. Passing between the columns, I saw over its beautifully sculptured doorway a Greek inscription, telling how, in the fourth century, the temple became a church, and was dedicated to St. John. On entering the building, the record of still another change appeared on the cracked plaster of the walls. Upon it was traced in huge Arabic characters the well-known motto of Islamism:—"There is no God but God, and Mohammed is the prophet of God."

One of the first buildings I visited was the castle, and on my way to it I passed a triumphal arch, erected, as a Latin inscription tells us, in honor of Julius, prefect of the first Parthian Philippine legion. It was most likely built during the reign of the emperor Philip, who was a native of Bozrah. The castle stands on the south side of the city, without the walls; and forming a separate fortress, was fitted at once to defend and command the town. It is of great size and strength, and the outer walls, towers, gate, and moat are nearly perfect; but their interior is ruinous. On the basement are immense vaulted tanks, stores, and galleries; and over them were chambers sufficient to accommodate a small army. In the very centre of the structure, supported on massive piers and arches, are the remains of a theatre. This splendid monument of the luxury and magnificence of former days was so designed that the spectators commanded a view of the city and the whole plain beyond it to the base of Hermon. The building is a semi-circle, 270 feet in diameter, and open above, like all Roman theatres. It was no doubt intended for the amusement of the Roman garrison, when Bostra was the capital of a province and the headquarters of a gio.*

*This opinion has been questioned by M. Rey, an accomplished French savant, who in the year 1858 retraced my footsteps through Bashan, and reviewed my "Five years in Damascus" on the west along. I had the pleasure of meeting M. Rey on several occasions, and was impressed alike with his gentlemanly deportment and accomplished scholarship; but being an intimate friend with M. De Vogüé, whose pretended discoveries in and around Damascus I had criticized perhaps a little too severely, I am not surprised that he should make an occasional attempt at retaliation.

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

The Quarterly Assembly of the Church of God, will commence Friday evening before the fourth Sunday in May, which will be May 26, in a grove near Bro. John J. Spald's, Hampshire Co., Va. All the brethren and people in general are respectfully invited to be present.

N. J. MORGAN.

The Annual Conference of the State of Michigan will be held at Watson Corner, Allegan county, Mich., commencing June 1, and lasting over the following Sunday. Those coming by rail from the north or south on the Grand Rapids and Indiana Railroad will stop at Monteith, and take the Allegan division to Fisk's Crossing, three miles from Monteith, where ample provision will be made for all that shall come. A general attendance is desired at this meeting as we expect this to be the best Conference ever held in Michigan. Let all come praying the Lord's blessing to be with this meeting. Able ministers will be in attendance to preach the word.

THE RESTITUTION.

S. A. CHAPLIN, EDITOR.

Plymouth, Indiana, May 15, 1882.

THE word printed importune in an editorial brevity last week, should have been important.

OUR paper will come out in its regular issues. As there are five Wednesdays in May, no paper will be sent out for the last week in the month. We expect to write for the paper while abroad, and it will be managed with care in our absence.

WE hope the communication in the present number from the pen of Sister Magruder will be carefully read and well pondered. It is only those that endure to the end that will be saved. Something more than a single act of obedience is required to give a passport to the kingdom.

PROF. Charles Gardner has kindly furnished a translation of a part of the xv chapter of 1 Cor. as we requested not long since. This translation and the accompanying explanations will be of special interest to all our readers. To the learned Professor we tender our sincere thanks for this contribution to our columns.

IT is Monday April 17th we write this editorial brevity. We expect to start for New York in the evening about 9 P. M. to be about two or three weeks. We shall go by the line of travel operated by the Pennsylvania R. W. Company, as it is the short direct line to all the Eastern cities and as a desirable route of travel not surpassed by any other. We shall have something to say about important places along this great thoroughfare, in their historical connection, in our communications for THE RESTITUTION hereafter.

LUKE.

Editor Restitution:

In an article in the World's Crisis, April 12, 1882, in a paragraph in the first column, on the first page, is the following statement:—"The gospel of Luke, himself a Gentile, was designed especially for the instruction of Gentiles," etc. Now is it true that Luke was a Gentile? If so please give us the evidence. I have always supposed that the twelve apostles were Jews. Please answer in THE RESTITUTION.

Yours for the truth.

IRA EDMANS.

By consulting Matt. x. 2–4, we learn that of the four evangelists, only two —Matthew and John—were apostles. On the nationality of Luke we will quote Dr. Bloomfield:—"Of this evangelist—as of St. Mark—little is known with certainty, except what is learned from the New Testament. The traditions of the early fathers are few and slight; and those of later ones merit little attention. They, and the older commentators in general, are of opinion that he was a Jew; but their proofs are by no means strong. It is more probable that—as many recent expositors suppose—he was descended from Gentile parents, but had in his youth embraced Judaism, from which he had been converted to Christianity. But whether even this be true, may be doubted; for there is great reason to think that Luke was but a very young man when converted to Christianity; and it is not likely that he had before that time, passed over from Paganism to Judaism. It may rather be supposed that he was born of Jewish parents; or at least—as in the case of Timothy—of parents, the father a Gentile and the mother a Jewess. The Hebrew-Greek style of his writings and the accurate knowledge shown in them of the Jewish religion, make it probable that the writer was not a Jewish proselyte, but a Jew, on the mother's side, though a Greek on the father's. Thus also we are enabled to account for the power of the Greek style which he occasionally evinces. For it is likely that he would by his father be competently instructed in Greek literature."

From the Bible Commentary we add concerning Luke:—"The writer of this gospel is universally allowed to have been Lucas—an abreviated form of Lucanus, as Silas of Sylvanus—though he is not expressly named in the gospel or in the Acts. From Col. iv. 14, we learn that he was a 'physician;' and by comparing that verse with v. 10, 11 —in which the apostle enumerates all those of the circumcision who were then with him, but does not mention Luke, though he immediately afterwards sends a salutation from him—we gather that Luke was not a born Jew." With these brief accounts the longer article in Smith's Bible Dictionary substantially corresponds. In this longer statement Tertullian is quoted as saying—"Lucam non apostolum, sed apostolicum; non magistrum, sed discipulum, utique magistro minor, certe tanto posterior quanto posteritatis apostoli sortatur, Paulo sine dubio" This freely translated signifies.—Luke was not an apostle but an apostolic—i. e. one converted, instructed and sent out by the apostles—not the master but the scholar, and no inferior to the master, and, certainly and without doubt, though a follower of the last of the apostles, Paul, far below him.

Communications.

A tract of thirty-two pages entitled "The Two Covenants," by U. Smith, was handed me to read etc. and the elder's object appears to be of the purpose style—showing the mistakes of Moses—in regard to the covenant of which he was the Mediator. And if the tract is correct, is true, it proves the sad and fatal "mistake" of God in the choice of Moses as the Mediator of his will, covenant, or testament to the children of Israel for forty years, in the wilderness!

Smith assumes that the first covenant is to be found in Exod. xix. 1–7 the proposition of God through Moses to Israel—if they will obey his voice indeed, and keep my covenant," etc. Yet it was on the third day after the above proposition was made and they had sanctified themselves, then they did hear my voice indeed and that "voice" did declare "my covenant." But my covenant is recorded in the 20th instead of the 34th chapter of Exodus.

On fifth page "the old covenant has been abolished" of this there is no question, as Paul plainly states"—yet he does not give the chapter and verse of the apostle's letters. The author should be more careful of the apostle's testimony—I find he stated in Heb. viii. that the first or old was ready to vanish away. Yet the apostle evidently had no allusion to the proposition in Exod. xix., but to the covenant recorded by Moses in chap. xx. as the first or old. And if the Elder would "search the Scriptures" carefully he would find no allusion to Exod. xix. by Moses, the prophets, Jesus or the apostles as containing the first or old covenant!

On page 8, "it may be asked then how can the ten commandments be called the covenant?"—"there is just where the people are misled! They are never called the covenant—referring to the first or old covenant."

In answer to the above I would say, if "the people are misled" by calling the ten commandments the first or old covenant," they are simply adhering to the teachings of Moses instead of any other man not the Mediator not the recorder, not having heard the covenant, not having lived at the "day of the assembly" as Moses.

I acknowledge there would be proof of the assumption of the first covenant being in Exod. xix. if the Mediator had said so, and the Testator had written it "upon the two tables of stone"—but such is not the case concerning the first or old covenant, as we purpose to show by the Mediator of that covenant.

He says in Deut. ix. 9, "When I was gone up into the mount to receive the tables of stone, even the tables of the covenant which the Lord made with you." (10.) "And the Lord delivered unto me two tables of stone written with the finger of God; and on them was written according to all the words, which the Lord spake with you in the mount out of the midst of the fire in the day of the assembly." Exod. xix. 17, see as to the fire and the day. (11.) "At the end of forty days the Lord gave me the two tables of the covenant." (16.) "So I turned and came down from the mount and the mount burned with fire: and the two tables of the covenant in my two hands." (17.) He "brake them before your eyes." x. 1. "Hew thee two tables like unto the first, (2.) And come up—and make thee an ark of wood, And I will write on the tables the words that were in (on) the first tables." (4.) "And he wrote on the tables according to the first writing, the ten commandments, which the Lord spake unto you in the mount out of the midst of the fire in the day of the assembly: and the Lord gave them unto me." (5.) "And I turned myself and came down from the mount, and put the tables in the ark which I had made, and there they be, as the Lord commanded me."

I consider the above statement of the Mediator of that covenant delivered from Sinai and written on those two tables of stone by the Testator's own finger as conclusive evidence to me, that those "ten words" declared the third day after the proposition sent by Moses, and after declaring them to Israel from the mount—those writing those "ten words" on "the two tables of stone even the tables of the covenant."

In the above statement of the Mediator of the first covenant—

1. As to the day or time of the declaration of it to Israel.

2. The ten words constituted "the covenant" and "he added no more. And he wrote them in two tables of stone and delivered them to me." Deut. v. 22.

3. God the Testator declared unto Israel his covenant which he commanded them to perform (ten commandments) and he wrote them upon two tables of stone. Deut. iv. 13.

4. Moses recited that covenant and no other in Exod. xx. and Deut. v.

5. The Testator did not write in the two tables of the covenant any part or parcel of Exod. xix.

We have established the astounding fact that the "first covenant" consisted of "ten words" or "ten covenants," or ten precepts and that they were "declared" "on the mount," in a certain "day" "and he added no more," also he (the Testator) wrote those "ten words" on the two tables of stone" and Moses copied them in Exod. xx. and Deut. v. And calls those "ten words" God's covenant to Israel of which he was the Mediator!

Hence if the Testator declared what the Mediator says he did say and actually wrote these ten words with his own finger and says those ten words constituted the first or old covenant, and the "Sabbath" was the fourth word in that covenant, then Elder Smith contradicts and makes a great "mistake" when he declares that the old covenant has been abolished—if this there is no question as Paul plainly states.

Now if the Elder is correct, and the above statement is true, I ask why is he and his brethren pressing upon "the people" the necessity of "to remember the Sabbath to keep it holy" when the first covenant has been abolished? and the Sabbath to observe was the fourth word, or precept in the old covenant—as we have proven by Moses the Mediator of "the covenant."

We will notice the instituting of "the Sabbath for man" as given in the record of Moses in Exod. 16. The time not in "the creation" as the Elder claims; but in the time or day he took the children of Israel from Egypt to Canaan, and the place in the wilderness. The miracle produced was the falling of manna six days and the next the seventh from the commencement of the supply of manna, and is the first "Sabbath" made for man—in the history of man. Hence it is true "that the Sabbath was made for man, and not man for the Sabbath."

And as to the declaration that "Abraham kept the Sabbath" and that the children of Israel keeping the Sabbath of the Lord while in the service of the Egyptians 430 years, is simply impossible for the following reasons:

1. Pharaoh knew nothing of God or his Sabbath either. See Exod. v. 2, 13, "daily tasks."

2. It is quite evident that Moses did not know of a "Sabbath" (Exod. xvi. 23) for about eighty years of his life and it was what the Lord hath said "To-morrow."

Hence we agree to the time of the Sabbath being given as recorded by Moses above, and also see Ezek. xx. 10–27 and Neh. ix. 14, "thy holy Sabbath."

Now let us examine the people or nation the Sabbath of the Lord was given to. They are denominated by Moses as the children of Israel. God commands him "to speak unto the children of Israel." Exod. xiv. 2, and other places too numerous to quote here. Hence we conclude that God did not institute the Sabbath to any of the Gentiles or heathen, but actually did drive out through his covenanted and uncircumcised people, six nations in the land of Canaan, for Israel to have as a possession.

I believe I have established by Moses what the first or old covenant was, viz., "Ten words, no more." Who declared that covenant to the children of Israel. And the place Mount Sinai. And the time while the children of Israel were on their journey from Egypt to Canaan, and he was their Mediator. Hence the old covenant is not abolished—the Sabbath is yet to be remembered by the children of Israel—Paul's "brethren according to the flesh." And that the Gentiles are not now, or ever were, included in that covenant, or "to keep the Sabbath day holy," as is claimed by modern preachers and apostles and elders in the nineteenth century all over our land.

Beautiful Things.

Beautiful ground on which we tread,
Beautiful heavens above our head,
Beautiful flowers and beautiful trees,
Beautiful land and beautiful seas,
Beautiful sun that shines so bright,
Beautiful stars with glittering light,
Beautiful summer and beautiful spring,
Beautiful birds that sweetly sing.

Beautiful books that teach and pray,
Beautiful nights and beautiful days,
Beautiful lily and beautiful rose,
Beautiful every flower that grows,
Beautiful things of every form,
Beautiful life and beautiful worm,
Beautiful bodies of earth and sky,
Beautiful things to every eye.

Beautiful everything around—
Beautiful grass to deck the ground,
Beautiful fields and woods so green,
Beautiful ivy and silver sheen,
Beautiful flowers, and beautiful leaf,
Beautiful world, though full of grief!
Beautiful every day that—
Beautiful all that the Lord has made.

Helping a Fellow Up.

TOMMY is tugging away to another urchin who is raying on the ground.

"What are you doing Tommy?"

"Oh! only helping a fellow up."

That is right, Tommy. Now take that as your motto through life, to help a fellow up.

There is that drunkard—help him down through drink, and curse the man that is poor, or sick or tempted. Give each a hand and help a fellow up.

What would have become of Martin Luther, when he was a young man singing in the streets for his bread, if some one who had an eye to observe him and a heart to feel for him had not put out his hand and helped a fellow up? There are thousands today who never could have stood where they now are, if friendly souls had not extended aid to help a fellow up.

A Boy in Washington Territory.

It was in the spring time, and the sheep were not strong and fat as now, so Jack was especially watchful. In going and coming to and from the ranch the sheep had to cross a small creek, which was swollen at this season. The sheep crossed at a leap; but one night an old and weak ewe fell back exhausted, after repeated attempts to gain the opposite bank. Jack saw this, and ran down to her and commenced whining or crying, at the same time biting hold of the loose wool about the neck, and pulling back. He continually called to me, both by voice and manner. I went down and lifted her on the other bank. Jack was very glad. He jumped about, whined, and repeatedly licked her face and head, and by every manifestation showed his joy. After that he always watched at this spot.

On the range he was continually hunting up sleeping lambs in danger of being left behind. He would awaken them by pawing or rooting with his nose. It is simply astonishing how intelligent these dogs are. I could punish him with my steady gaze, and by my manner toward him, and he would be hurt as deeply as if I whipped him. He knew as well as I when he had done wrong.—Our Dumb Animals.

Improve the Odd Moments.

In almost every life there are moments of waiting, when there is nothing in particular to be done. In some cases these may be properly improved by rest, so that our work, when it comes, may be better done. In many instances, however, these odd moments may be best improved by having something to do—a book to read, or some light labor to perform.

It is surprising how much may be done by using a few moments at a time. Of course, they cannot properly be used for all purposes, since there are some duties which require continued application for a long time. There are, however, many kinds of light labor, and many subjects of study, which may be followed quite successfully by taking only a few moments at a time.

It is said that Elihu Burritt, who was known for many years as "the learned blacksmith," was in the habit, when an apprentice-boy, of having a grammar of English or some other language fastened before him on the chimney of the forge, so that while he was blowing the bellows he could get an occasional glimse of his book.

Ben Jonson, a celebrated poet, who lived over two hundred years ago, was in early life a bricklayer. It is said that he always carried a book in his pocket, and while waiting for the laborer to bring him mortar or brick, he improved the odd moments in studying his book.

Let our young friends try the experiment, and they will be surprised to see how much can be done by rightly using a few moments at a time. You need not take time from sleep to do this. Have a time for everything, and what you do, do thoroughly, whether it be sleeping, eating, working, or playing, for all these are, in their respective places, right.—N. Y. Christian Advocate.

Talks With Young People—Improving Time.

Most, if not all, of life's failures (so far as the present life is concerned) are caused by neglecting to improve the time and opportunities that come within the reach of every young person. Young people have many advantages in this free and enlightened land at the present day. Every one who is so disposed can become possessed of education and practical knowledge of business or mechanics sufficient to better his temporal condition in life, as well as become habitually industrious and thrifty, which always gives a self-satisfaction (not more or less) whatever men will happiness.

The facility with which books of instruction on all points of practical and theoretical knowledge come within the reach of all young people whose parents are "well to do" makes many young persons of that class depend too much on the information so imparted to them, rather than seek it for themselves by engaging in the struggle of life and obtaining knowledge by experience, which is by far the very best of schools.

It is surprising how much can be gained by methodically dividing and utilizing the hours of each day. I have known boys and girls who had plenty of time to spend in pleasure-seeking and gossip, to say that they could find no time for study or self-improvement, whereas their business calling only occupied them on an average ten or twelve hours out of the twenty-four. They rarely spent over seven or eight hours in bed, and so they wrote from four to six hours each day, of which, at least, two should be spent as a self-improvement.

I know a young man whose parents were very poor, and he had to earn his living at a very early age at a business that occupied him from thirteen to sixteen hours each day; but he tried to improve the little time that he had, and he has outstripped companions who had every help that could be bestowed by indulgent parents who had means that enabled them to give their children every advantage in the way of schools and books.

It seems to me that knowledge comes too easily to our young people now-a-days, and that they are above the application and economizing of time that made their parents able to give them the education which so many value so highly.

I know a youth who loved music, but he was so engaged in business that he had no time to attend a school, and he was too poor to employ a teacher, so he spent every few minutes he could spare from his calling in trying to get a knowledge of musical notation from books without the help of a teacher. The result was that he became more than ordinarily proficient as a reader of music at sight, and when struggling to obtain a living in a time of great business depression, his knowledge of music enabled him to add largely to his means of obtaining a livelihood by teaching a singing class as well as singing in a church for a salary.

Every young person should systematically divide his or her time. If our studies occupy us six or eight hours each day, we should spend a stated time in recreation for the body, and a stated time at learning some useful occupation or reading some useful book that will give us knowledge and strength of mind. If we spend too much time in reading light literature we become weak-minded and visionary in our views of life.

The remembrance of time well spent and improved is always a source of satisfaction and pleasure, whereas the recollection of wasted time and misspent hours is a great cause of remorse and sorrow ever afterwards.—A Christian Merchant in N. Y. Witness.

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

The next Quarterly Meeting of the brethren in Northern Indiana is appointed to be held at the Antioch Meeting House, in Marshall Co., Ind., about five miles south of Plymouth, and will commence on Friday, June 16, and continue over the following Sunday. A general attendance of our brethren and sisters is desired. Let us come together praying that the Lord will bless us and make this one of the best meetings ever held at "Old Antioch."

BY ORDER OF THE COMMITTEE.

The brethren will meet in conference at Lanark, Ill., June 23, and continue over Sunday. A general invitation is extended to all, and we urge the brethren to turn out and make this one of the enjoyable seasons. Come one, come all!

PALESTINE A NATION.

While men are absorbed in their little cares, alternately moved by hopes and fears, the grand and stately march of human events progress onward and irresistibly to completion in the fulfillment of an inevitable law which controls all human action. Men here and there raise their puny voices as if to stay this tide of advancement, arrest the fiat of the Eternal. As well might they attempt to stay the law which governs the universe. Races have as fixed a course to run as have the stars that dazzle in the blue vault above us, and the race of Israel is the bright fixed star amongst them. In all its wanderings it has been true to its course. Its mission has been foreseen and foretold and its final restoration to the Holy Land prophesied. That this prophecy is being fulfilled the signs of the times indicate. It is being accomplished so quietly and so practically that only those who have given the subject attention realize the importance of the work done. Our readers are today presented with a comprehensive statement of acts, facts and opinions in regard to this historic enterprise which cannot fail to interest all thoughtful minds. The picture presented has in it the essence of romance. It is at once real and ideal. Aside from the prophetic features of the subject, the political importance is of the deepest significance.

Palestine is a political necessity to the Jewish race. The founding of a nation in the Holy Land once more, means an exaltation of all Israel. It places her as a nation amongst the nations of the earth. It gives to the Jew that political power and sovereign right which means protection. It makes him a citizen of his country, and gives him a passport amongst the nations of the earth. This generation will live to see the day when a Jew born here in San Francisco the passer-by will read the sign as to-day we read the Consulate of Great Britain or any other nation. And it is not improbable that the Jewish Times will contain a card substantially as follows, except as to name:

JACOB COHEN, Consul of Palestine, giving the address on California or Pine street or some other centre of activity. The destiny of events are shaping themselves towards this consummate end. This may look impracticable to the man in the counting-room absorbed in his books, to the man in his store absorbed in figuring up his profits and losses, to the man steeped in the bliss of social pleasures, but it is as clear as the noonday's sun to whoever makes a study of the political horoscope.

The political autonomy realized, the Jews scattered throughout the world will not flock to Palestine in a body. There are 300,000 Jews in Asia, 100,000 in Africa, and 5,000,000 live in Europe. It is from these that Palestine will draw its life of restoration. The American-born Jew will undoubtedly remain on American, and if he should ever visit the Holy Land it would be for pleasure and travel and to see a land so famous as the chief birthplace of his heroic race.

It may be said that geographically speaking Palestine is too small to exert much influence as a political, intellectual or moral power among the nations of the earth. We reply that in ancient times Greece was a power, and that in modern times the little island of Britain is a power. Geographically speaking, what are they? It is intellect, moral force and pride of nationality that make nations great, and not extent of territory. It is intellect and moral power that will make Israel renowned among nations. —Jewish Messenger, San Francisco, Cal.

THE PLANETS IN JUNE.

There is to be a lively time among the planets during the month of May, according to the Providence Journal. It says: "Into one short month are crowded more important events than those that sometimes illustrate the records of several successive months. The conjunction of the three largest planets of the system with the sun; the conjunction of six planets with each other; the superior conjunction of Mercury; the total eclipse of the sun, and the occultation of Jupitor form a brilliant succession of phenomena as imposing to the mental eye as they are beautiful to the physical eye. The grand feature of the month is, however, the number of planets in line with the sun at nearly the same time, and the marvellous preponderance of planetary attraction pulling upon the sun in one direction. Mercury is the first to drop into line, Saturn and Neptune follow next, and gigantic Jupiter is the last to join the ranks. The sun is now passing through the maximum of sun spots. Whether the planets have anything to do with the commotion agitating his service is something which no astronomer has yet been able to determine. The problem remains to be solved in the astronomy of the future."

WATCHMEN, WHAT OF THE NIGHT?

Watchmen, on the walls of Zion,
What, oh tell us of the night?
Is the day-star now in sight?
Will the blessed news greet our sight?
After years of darkness
Shine the precious, cheering rays of light?

Tell us, oh tell us: are the luminaries
On our voyage all passed by?
Are we nearing port at last?
Has the storm-tide ceased to beat?
May we
On your guiding star look safely?

They answer—but I do not hear the meaning!
Are they lost in dull mid-air?
Have they lost their watch and vow, too,
Darkly keep the night?
Have they left us
In our need the port to weary?

Shrouded be the watchmen's answer!
He can from our cares relieve us;
If we call to him in trouble
Promptly will he hear us.
He watch over us
To keep safely from all evil.

Light is now struggling in the distance,
Let us not be blinded by it;
We should not be content to stay
Under midnight's shadow.
Saints, prepare to meet
Your redeeming God at his coming.

We have been waiting, short and tempted,
And we grow weary sometimes;
Ours is a race we must run bravely,
Ours a warfare we must wage;
Oh, be watchful,
Let us be sober, and pray.

Translation of 1 Cor. xv. 12-28, with Critical Explanations.

PROF. CHARLES GARDNER.

1 Cor. xv. 12. Now if Christ is being preached as having been awakened to life from among the dead, how do some among you say that there is no resurrection of the dead? If indeed there is no resurrection of the dead neither hath Christ been awakened to life, and if Christ hath not been awakened to life, vain surely is our preaching also, and vain is your faith; and we have been found also false-witnesses against God, because we have testified against God that he hath awakened Christ to life, whom he hath not awakened to life, if indeed the dead are not awakened to life. For if the dead are not awakened to life, neither hath Christ been awakened to life; and if Christ hath not been awakened to life, vain is your faith, ye are still in your sins; and forsooth those who have been caused (or put) to sleep in Christ have perished; if in this life we have hoped in Christ, we are of all men only the more miserable. But even now Christ hath been awakened to life from among the dead, a first-fruits of those who have been caused to sleep. For since through man there is death through man also is there a resurrection of the dead. For even as in Adam all die, likewise in Christ also will all have been made alive. But each one in his own appointed rank. A first fruits, Christ, next in order those who are Christ's at his coming, next the completion (the perfected state), when he shall surrender the kingdom to the God and Father, namely, when he shall have rendered useless all authority and all power and compulsion. For it behooveth him to reign as king until he shall have put all the enemies under his feet. Death is the last enemy which becometh useless. For he hath put all things under his feet. But when he (Christ) shall have said, all things have been subjected, evidently he will be excepted who hath made all things subject to him; and when all things shall have been subjected by him then he also the Son will subject himself to the one who made all things subject to him, that THE God may be THE all in all.

CHICAGO, Ill., May 9, 1882.

Editor Restitution:

I enclose herewith as requested a translation from the approved Tischendorff text of the passage in question with its context. A faithful translation of this passage seems to me to clear up the many and much mooted questions which have divided the world of criticism for centuries. Let me say in passing that the only important variation from the textus receptus in the latest Tischendorff is the old Homeric form of the present subjunctive of κομιδίζω in verse 24th, viz. κομιδίζει (Attic κομιδεῖ) instead of the aorist subjunctive in the textus receptus. This is an important difference as competent critics will observe. For the translation of the present subjunctive reads "shall deliver," and of the aorist "shall have delivered." One expresses a continuous thought carried over to its explanatory appositive which follows; while the other arrests and fixes the reader's mind upon a completed act; and it is very evident from the context that the writer does not intend to do this.

The disagreement and differences before which have arisen in regard to the meaning of this passage have had their origin primarily in mistranslation. For interpretation must necessarily follow in the wake of and be based upon translation. There is a great deal explanatory and in the line of interpretation that I would like to say about this passage, but I will not presume to trespass upon your space further than to call attention to the care requisite on the part of the reader in rightly applying the personal pronouns in the passage as the writer intended they should be applied, especially in the latter part of the passage where God, Christ, and Death, are spoken of each as persons. By emphasizing the pronoun when it refers to God I have purposed in my translation to assist the reader in keeping the personalities of Christ and God separate.

The only other point I will call attention to is the play upon the word ἄνθρωπος, the same two significations being intended here as it is in the 2d chapter of Hebrews, namely in the active voice, it meaning subjection by appointment or decree in the passive voice and verbal noun derived from a passive form it meaning subjection in reality or accomplished or execution. It seems to me that I should explain my translation of verse 32, or I may be supposed to have blundered. The adverb ἐπεί cannot by any law of pronoun modify a noun "life," as in the King James' version it is made to do "in this life only." If the writer had intended to say this he would have been used, viz., the adjective agreeing in gender, number, and case, with the noun "life." Its position in the sentence as well as other reasons which are good and sufficient lead me to think that the writer intended to have it modify the adjective "miserable," and I have so rendered the clause.

"THE HOPE OF THE GOSPEL."

J. CAMERON.

The gospel is finely adapted to the moral constitution of man. In the very lowest grade to which man has fallen in the scale of intelligence he possesses a power of apprehending the future. His grasp of the past may be extremely slight, and his thought and action may be almost entirely absorbed with the necessities of the present; but he never altogether fails to have some idea concerning the near or more distant future. Whatever be the cause of this power by which man is so clearly distinguished from the lower tribes, it is a fact which cannot be gainsaid. In addition to his intellectual powers of perception and reflection, he is said by phrenologists to possess a sentiment of a moral kind, to which they give the designation of hope. It is this power, they say, which, in combination with the reasoning faculties, enables man to concern himself with the future, and to be amenable to responsibilities arising out of the consequences of his present actions. In many cases the influence of the sentiment of hope is so strong as to exalt the future and depreciate the present.

"Hope (rising) eternal in the human breast,
Man never is, but always to be, blest."

And it is the hope of advantage in even the near future which gives so powerful a stimulus to the activity of our race in the pursuit of wealth and fame. Expectation and desire, of which hope is said to consist, are powerful factors in the motive power of humanity. An object of hope must be desirable, and at the same time possession must be possible. If either of these qualities be a-wanting there cannot be hope. With these in operation the sentiment of hope can be exercised in full vigor.

The distant future—that which stretches beyond the present life of a human being—is a field in which the hope of humanity has, with few exceptions, been more or less exercised. The love of life is strong in many minds. "All that a man hath will he give for his life;" even for its continuance in its present state; and from whatever source it may have come, the idea of a life beyond the grave is an element of human knowledge. This idea fits in to human desire, and has been cherished under various forms by different sections of the human race.

"Rise whence this pleasing hope, this fond desire,
This longing after immortality?"

The fear of extinction is, on the other hand, equally prevalent:

"Or whence this secret dread and inward horror
Of falling into naught? Why shrink'st the soul
Back on herself, and startles at destruction?"

The immortality of the soul, however, is a phase of human hope which lacks the element of expectation. It has no reasonable ground on which to rest, and the fact of death, so patent to the observation of all, is amply met by the Christian doctrine of the resurrection from the dead. The poet sings:

"'Dust thou art, to dust returnest,
Was not spoken of the soul.'"

Who then is the "thou"? The soul is held to be the true person, and must surely be represented by the personal pronoun. And if "to dust returnest" was not spoken of the soul," what else was spoken of it? The soul, which is held to have been the chief agent in the transgression, escapes altogether, and the body, the mere shell in which the true person is supposed to reside, is sentenced to return to dust, and is at the same time dignified with the personal pronoun "thou"! But the true person is a soul—a living soul; but neither an immaterial nor an immortal soul—terms which, strange to say, do not occur once in the sacred writings.

The hope of deliverance from the effects of such a sentence as that pronounced on Adam and Eve must necessarily have implied (if it implied anything) the being brought back again from the dust. Anything short of this would never satisfy any intelligent son of Adam, unless he was spoiled by the philosophy and poetry of human wisdom. The Apostle Paul looked to our resurrection as a one act now in his hope for a future life: "If, after the manner of men," he says, "I have fought with beasts at Ephesus what advantage (is it me if the dead rise not)? let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die." But we enjoy the present life during its brief continuance, for when we die (if the dead rise not) there is no advantage, even though one has suffered in the service of Christ.

Some of the disciples at Corinth, to which Church these word were written, had said, "There is no resurrection of the dead." At the same time they still believed that Christ had been raised. The probability is, they were formerly heathen idolators who had imbibed the idea of Plato, that the soul is immortal and constitutes the true personal part of man. They must have viewed Christ as an exception, especially as he had ascended to heaven. This might lead them to conclude that His resurrection body was of so ethereal a nature as to justify their denial of any resurrection for his disciples. Hence the difficulty put into their mouths by the apostle: "How are the dead raised up, and with what body do they come?" The gist of the apostle's reply is to assure them that it is the same kind of body as that of the Lord Himself. "As is the heavenly, such are they also that are heavenly;" in other words, "It is raised in incorruption;" "it is raised in glory;" "it is raised in power;" "it is raised a spiritual body." This is otherwise expressed by John: "When He shall appear, we shall be like Him, for we shall see Him as He is."

But this fellowship with the Lord in "His glorious body" is only a part of that oneness with Him which shall characterize all who are His. His own promise is, "To him that overcometh will I grant to sit with Me in My throne; even as I also overcame, and am set down with my Father in His throne." And as "flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God," because it shall have no end, it is necessary that those who are "joint-heirs with Christ" of an absolutely everlasting inheritance should either, if they die, be "raised incorruptible," or, if privileged to live till the Lord's coming, to "put on immortality." The Divine order is,—"seek ye first the Kingdom of God and His righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you." "Hath not God chosen the poor of this world, rich in faith, and heirs of the kingdom which he hath promised to them that love Him?" "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who according to his abundant mercy hath begotten us again unto a lively hope by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead; to an inheritance incorruptible and undefiled, and that faileth not away, reserved (guarded) in heaven for you, who are kept by the power of God, through faith unto salvation, ready to be revealed in the last time." "If ye be Christ's, then are ye Abraham's seed, and heirs (of the inheritance) according to the promise." "In the days of these kings shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom which shall never be destroyed; and the kingdom shall not be left to other people, but it shall break in pieces and consume all these kingdoms, and it shall stand forever." "One like the Son of man came with the clouds of heaven;...and there was given him dominion and glory and a kingdom, that all people and nations and languages should serve Him. His dominion is an everlasting dominion that shall not pass away, and His kingdom that which shall not be destroyed." "The saints of the Most High shall take the kingdom, and possess the kingdom for ever, even for ever and ever....And the kingdom and dominion and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High, whose kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and all dominions shall serve and obey Him."

To reign with Christ in His everlasting kingdom,—with Him who "liveth and was dead, and is alive for evermore," and who "has the keys of hades and of death," is to be the privilege of the faithful disciple. And this necessitates the bestowal upon him of everlasting life. And certain is it that the life shall be bestowed, that it is spoken of as if already possessed. "He that heareth my word and believeth on Him that sent me hath everlasting life and shall not come into condemnation, but is passed from death into life." But the believer dies like other men. The fact is, that he has everlasting life in virtue of his oneness with Christ. The life is deposited in Christ—our life is hid with Christ in God—and more literally, in Christ by God. The believer is even said to be dead. "Ye are dead and your life is hid in Christ by God." In the words of John, 1 John v. 11: "This is the record, that God hath given us eternal life, and this life is in His Son. He that hath the Son hath life." No one "hath the Son" actually to his possession, and there is no necessity for construing the following clause, "hath life" in the sense of actual possession, especially as it is declared in the same place, as already quoted: "this life is in His Son." On this account the Son is called "our life." "When Christ, who is our life, shall appear, we also shall appear with Him in glory."

For the same reason He is called "our hope." Thus, "Paul an apostle of Jesus Christ by the commandment of God, our Savior and, Lord Jesus Christ, who is our hope." The hope of the gospel is one of the conditions of Christian standing, and must be held fast to insure dis-ipleship. "Hint Christ as a Son over His own house; whose house are we, if we hold fast the confidence and the rejoicing of the hope firm unto the end."

And again:—"Take heed, brethren, lest there be in any of you an evil heart of unbelief, in departing from the living God. But exhort one another daily, while it is called to-day, lest any of you be hardened through the deceitfulness of sin. For we are made partakers of Christ, if we hold the beginning of our confidence steadfast unto the end."

And again:—"You hath He reconciled, to present you holy, and unblamable, and unreprovable in His sight, if ye continue in the faith; grounded and settled, and be not moved away from the hope of the gospel." The hope is also one of the most important parts of the Christian's armor for defense against his enemies. "But let us, who are of the day, be sober, putting on the breastplate of faith and love; and for an helmet the hope of salvation."

As a motive to the service and worship of God, the hope of inheritance in the coming kingdom is inculcated by the apostle:—"Wherefore we receiving a kingdom which cannot be moved, let us have grace, whereby we may serve God acceptably with reverence and godly fear: for our God is a consuming fire."

"Holiness, without which no man shall see the Lord," is to be promoted by cherishing the hope of being like Him when He comes again. "Behold what manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon us, that we should be called the sons of God! therefore the world knoweth us not, because it knew Him not. Beloved, now are we the sons of God; and it doth not yet appear what we shall be: but we know that, when He shall appear, we shall be like Him; for we shall see Him as He is. And every man that hath this hope in him purifieth himself, even as He is pure." The hope naturally springs from the faith of the gospel, and indeed forms a part of it.

"But call to remembrance the former days, in which, after ye were illuminated, ye endured a great fight of afflictions; partly, whilst ye were made a gazingstock both by reproaches and afflictions; and partly, whilst ye became companions of them that were so used. For ye had compassion of me in my bonds, and took joyfully the spoiling of your goods, knowing in yourselves that ye have in heaven a better and enduring substance. Cast not away therefore your confidence, which hath great recompense of reward. For ye have need of patience, that after ye have done the will of God, ye might receive the promise. For yet a little while, and he that shall come will come, and will not tarry. Now, the just shall live by faith; but if any man draw back, my soul shall have no pleasure in him. But we are not of them who draw back unto perdition; but of them that believe to the saving of the soul. Now faith is the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen."

Our Lord said to His disciples, "Seek ye first the kingdom of God and His righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you." And He sent about "preaching the gospel of kingdom," saying, "The Kingdom of God is at hand: repent ye, and believe the gospel. The faith and hope of this coming kingdom sustained the disciples under the many persecutions they were called to endure. We read that the apostles "confirmed the souls of the disciples, and exhorted them to continue in the faith, and that we must through much tribulation enter into the kingdom of God." And in his first letter to the Thessalonians, Paul tells the disciples, "Ye know how we exhorted and comforted and charged every one of you, as a father doth his children, that ye would walk worthy of God, who hath called you unto His kingdom and glory." For the coming of this kingdom Jesus taught his disciples to pray, "Thy kingdom come." And well might they so pray for it is the coming of that kingdom that shall bring blessing to the faithful of all past ages, by raising them from the sleep of death, and to the faithful in the age to which he delivers us from this present evil age and be invested to the glory honor and incorruptibility of the age to come.

For any object of hope to have an abiding and powerful influence upon the minds of them who possess it, it must be of an intelligible and tangible character. A hazy and indistinct hope can exercise but slight influence over any mind. The Gentiles are spoken of by the apostle as "having no hope." But it might be supposed that when the doctrine of Plato concerning the natural immortality of the soul came to be known, the Gentiles should have some hope. But it does not appear to have been so. Cato, in whose mouth the lines already quoted are put by the poet, had been reading Plato, and he is represented as giving the result of his studies:—

"It must be so. Plato, thou reasonest well;
Else whence this pleasing hope, this fond desire,
This longing after immortality? Or whence
This secret dread and inward horror
Of falling into naught? Why shrink'st the soul
Back on herself, and startles at destruction?
'Tis the Divinity that stirs within us;
'Tis the heaven itself that points out an hereafter,
And intimates eternity to man.
Eternity! Thou pleasing dreadful thought.
Through what variety of untried being—
Through what new scenes and changes must we pass?
The wide, the unbounded prospect lies before Me!
But shadows, clouds, and darkness rest upon it.
If there's a Power above us (and that there is
All nature cries aloud through all her works),
He must delight in virtue, and that which He Delights in must be happy. But When? or Where?
I'm weary of conjecture."

Here all is obscurity. "Shadows, clouds, and darkness," are a fitting description of the Platonic future as presented to the mind of one of the earnest students of that system. "That which God delights in must be happy. But When? or Where?" Plato could not tell. The contradictory issues of the dagger and the hook are but another mode of showing the confusion produced in the mind:

"The one presents the joys that lie before,
And this behind us: I shall never die."

How different from the assured confidence of the apostle: "I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith: henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord the righteous Judge shall give me at that day; and not to me only, but unto all them also that love his appearing."

Here is something that the mind of Paul had grasped, and which any simple mind can grasp, so as to have present peace and joy in the prospect of the future. "That day" is the day when Christ shall appear to establish His kingdom, as the apostle intimated immediately before: "I charge thee, therefore, before God and the Lord Jesus Christ, who shall judge the quick and the dead at His appearing and His kingdom."

Speaking of the persecution he endured, he expresses his confidence in the ability of Christ to perform what He had promised: "For the which cause I also suffer these things; nevertheless I am not ashamed; for I know whom I have believed, and am persuaded that He is able to keep that which I have committed unto Him against that day."

The hope of inheritance in the everlasting kingdom implies, as we have seen, the hope of eternal life. And we have this element of the hope expressed by the apostles in a way which throws light on such statements as we have noticed where eternal life is spoken of as a present possession. Thus "Paul, an apostle of Jesus Christ by the will of God, according to the promise of life, which is in Christ Jesus." "That being justified by his grace we should be made heirs according to the hope of eternal life." "This is the promise that he hath promised us, even eternal life."

These apostolic utterances are inconsistent with present actual possession of eternal life supposed to be taught in certain places, one of which we have quoted. They call up a well-known statement of Paul concerning the hope. He says:—"We are saved by (or rather in) hope," that is, as I judge, by anticipation. "But," he adds, "Hope that is seen is not hope: for what a man seeth, why doth he yet hope for? But if we hope for what we see not, then do we with patience wait for it."

That is, what a man has actually in possession can never be to him an object of hope. But what a man possesses that is retained in the custody of another, he may reasonably hope to possess in his own person. A man may have a thousand pounds in the bank, and may not have one shilling in his pocket to pay his fare a little food, and right actually die of hunger notwithstanding his deposit in the bank. In the same way the life of the Christian is deposited in Christ, and for want of actual possession of this life he dies like other men. And when he is spoken of as having been raised up with Christ," it is as really by anticipation as the succeeding statement that "he has been made to sit with Christ in heavenly places." But the promise is, "Because I live ye shall live also." This is distinctly putting the life into the future. Again to the same effect, and at the same time coupling the future life with the resurrection: "This is the will of him that sent me, that of all which he hath given me, I should lose nothing, but should raise it up again at the last day."

Some hold that regeneration is equivalent to the actual possession of eternal life, and to being actual partakers of the Divine nature. It is quite true that regeneration in a moral sense is a present blessing, but it is by no means a constitutional change in any physical sense. And the only passage which speaks of the possession of the Divine nature (2 Peter i. 4) clearly places that blessing in the future: "Grace and peace be multiplied unto you through the knowledge of God and of Jesus our Lord, according as his Divine power hath given unto us all things that pertain unto life and godliness, through the knowledge of him that hath called us to glory and virtue: whereby are given unto us exceeding great and precious promises; that by these ye might be partakers of the Divine nature, having escaped the corruption that is in the world through lust." Here by the belief and the fulfillment of certain promises, the Divine nature is to be obtained. It is not ye have become, but "that ye might be" partakers of the Divine nature.

How important, then, is the hope of the gospel! It embraces the entire future beyond the present mortal life. And how should we prize him who is "our hope" and "our life." In him we have everything, out of him we have nothing. "If we are Christ's, then are we Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise." And Christ is coming to fulfill the promises; for in him all the promises are yea and amen. Among his last words to "the beloved disciple" were these: "Behold I come quickly, and my reward is with me, to give to every man according as his work shall be."

Let us make sure that we are in Christ. Let us note well the words of the apostle in reference to this matter: "Ye are all the children of God by faith in Christ Jesus. For as many of you as have been baptized into Christ have put on Christ. There is neither Jew nor Greek, there is neither bond nor free, there is neither male nor female; for ye are all one in Christ Jesus. And if ye be Christ's, then are ye Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise." And let us "seek by a patient continuance in well-doing the glory, honor, and immortality of the coming kingdom."

NO DEMONSTRATION.

"We have no reason to suppose that any demonstration occurred to mark the translation of Enoch—the coming of Moses (though something soon followed) nor at the birth of Christ—all types of that event for which we long and pray." S. H. REEVE.

On this it is obvious to say that we are glad to hear from every one, their own light on the coming and crowning event of ages; yet as to matters of fact omissions may be supplied by any one for mutual instruction; and to form the foundation for a definite Scriptural faith on the points noted; and their bearing on the demonstration of the second coming.

1. The brief biography of Enoch may have forbid all except the essential facts; and yet not break the force of all other analogous facts which go far to make out a "demonstration" of God's presence and power, even in Enoch's translation. God's ways are equal. Please note.

2. Elijah's translation. 2 Kings ii The anointing of Elisha—the passage of Jordan to and fro the chariot and horses of fire! the whirlwind ascension! the mantle of Elijah, and the double portion of the Elijah Spirit, for Elisha—make quite a "demonstration" surely.

3. The birth and preservation of Moses (ἀστεῖος—fair to God, Acts vii.) was miraculous—his education in statesmanship, at Pharaoh's court are his heroic record; as really as his Divine commission to deliver Israel were to make up this "demonstration" of Divine intervention! It was not nature. It was of God!

4. The birth of Jesus, its antecedents, attendants and consequents—the angel announcements, and Zacharias's nine months' dumbness, the naming of John the Baptist and his father's radiant prophecy, were, with the miraculous birth, the most profound and appropriate "demonstration" of God's direction conceivable!

5. The last trump, the shout (ἐνκελευσματι), the voice of the archangel, the "voice" of Christ, that even "the dead shall hear" seem to set forth a glorious "demonstration" of God's presence and power and rights in and over our fallen world at Christ's coming! 1 Cor. xv.; 1 Thess. iv.; John v.; Rev. xi. 15-18; xv. 1-4. The song here sung discloses the moral result to be reached by all such Divine demonstrations. For "the ends of the world will remember and turn unto the Lord. For the kingdom (then) is the Lord's; and he, the Governor among the nations." Psa. xxii. 28; Isa. xxv. 6-8; Rom. xv. 8-13; Rev. xxi. 24.

To my feeble apprehension it is a vital and moral necessity, that this "demonstration" of God's supreme care over our world and right to interpose his Almighty presence to make it known, should be kept prominently in view.

"The half has not been told;" but with my best courtesies to Brother Reeve and his contribution to our paper, the above is submitted; for the truth's sake and the encouragement of mutual faith.

A PSALM OF NIGHT.

W. H. BURLEIGH.

Fades from the west the farewell light
Flung backward by the setting sun,
And silence deepens, and the night
Steals with its solemn shadows on!
Gathers the rich, refreshing dew,
On springing grass and flowret stems—
And lo! the everlasting blue
Is radiant with a thousand gems!

Not only doth the volceful day
Thy loving kindness, Lord, proclaim—
But night, with its anthems gray
Of words, doth magnify thy name!
Yea, while adorning seraphim
Before thee bend the willing knee,
From every star a choral hymn
Goes up unceasingly to thee!

Day unto day doth utter speech,
And night to night thy voice makes known;
Through all the earth where thought may reach,
Is heard the glad and solemn tone;
And worlds beyond the farthest star
Whose light hath reached the human eye,
Catch the high anthem from afar
That rolls along immensity!

Oh, holy Father! hold the calm
And stillness of this evening hour,
We, too, would lift our solemn psalm
To praise thy goodness and thy power!
For over us, as over all,
Thy tender mercies shall extend,
Nor vainly shall the contrite call
On thee, our Father and our Friend!

Kept by thy goodness through the day,
Thanksgivings to thy name we pour;
Night o'er us, with its tears—we pray
Thy love to guide us evermore!
In grief, console, in gladness, bless,
In darkness, noble, in sickness, cheer,
Till, in the Savior's righteousness,
Before thy throne we shall appear!

THE TRIMMING CHRISTIAN.

SARAH MACRUDER.

"Let no man deceive himself."—St. Paul.

Our Lord and Savior remarked, "The children of this world are wiser in their generation, than the children of light." A striking confirmation of this saying is presented in the following words of Mr. Amos Lawrence, the well-known founder of Lawrence, Mass., and the manufacturing industries there. He said: "The difference between doing just right and a little wrong, is the difference between arriving safe and sound at the end of a journey and landing in a miserable slough and bog of trouble." It would be well for "the children of light" if they would give heed to this distinction.

Nothing can be more certain than that in a matter which involves so much as the Christian religion offers us, there should be no trifling or uncertainty. Every effort should be made to arrive at the highest degree of accuracy of which the case admits.

When a great steamer is built with reference to a voyage across the ocean, the utmost skill and thought are expended in the arrangement of every piece of the machinery, lest the omission or the lack of proper strength of some part, should cause her to founder on the way.

But what is the loss of a steamer with a cargo of silver and gold, compared with the loss of our eternal life? And yet many enter the Christian church with no definite idea, of what will be required in the great work they have undertaken—the work no less than the transformation of a sinful animal man into a holy immortal being. This is an immense enterprise, and to the proper prosecution of it, a man's best judgment, thought, deliberation should be brought: and it is to a failure rightly to comprehend what they undertake that most of the terrible shipwrecks of faith may be traced.

How many there are who consider that when they get their own consent to be baptized and to fraternize with Christians, they thereby become entitled to all the rich blessings of the future age, which they regard as a gratuitous gift to those who have complied with the above conditions. Instead of being made more deliberate and thoughtful by the step they have taken, they really feel that a care they once had about their future, has been taken from them and a guarantee given them, that they shall be preserved in this world as well as in the next, without any great thought on their part—and they are often very zealous in trying to communicate to others—a knowledge of this cheap and easy way of salvation. This enthusiasm solaces them with the idea that they must be good Christians or they would not be so zealous in the Lord's cause. Now if they really fully understood what they had undertaken, they would comprehend, that whilst it is a duty to labor for the salvation of others, the great work committed to them, from which there is no exemption, is to strive for "their own salvation, with fear and trembling."

One of the first steps, at which a mistake is made is before their baptism. The message of the gospel requires faith and repentance before baptism. Now if these two requirements be fully understood in the beginning, much light will be shed on the subject. What are we to believe? becomes a question of the first importance. One thing is, that "Christ died for our sins according to the Scriptures." Then the point which concerns us most is—What is sin? Since this remedial institution has for its great design its cure, the first and most important thing is, to have a clear idea of what it is.

The very name of Jesus imports "He come to save his people from their sins"—and let us here remark it is from their sins—not in their sins. So all diligence must be given to find out what sin is.

It is because God has implanted in every human being who is not an idiot, an appreciation of excellence which responds to every exhibition of it and gives it approval, whether that approval result in any effort on the part of the hearer or otherwise, that the gospel is addressed to man. In connection with animal propensities which lead him downward to the brute, will always be found until it is blunted or entirely extinguished by low indulgences—this groaning work on which any hope of a reception of the gospel must be founded. As soon as the Holy character and loving sacrifice of the Son of God is exhibited to men they must send back, as surely as the ball will rebound from a smooth surface—this response. If they yield and gaze upon this goodness and righteousness, in the same proportion they become disgusted with their former course of life—much of which has been a blind following of the animal propensities—and if this disgust is sufficiently strong to influence them to a change of life, then they may be said to have both believed and repented. Then, and not till then, are they ready for baptism, from which "they rise to walk in newness of life"—and if they fail to do so, then baptism has been a deception—and they have perjured themselves.

These terms may seem to be hard—but look at the immense reward. Can it be expected that the transfiguration of a poor dying moth, into an immortal son of God—to be the companion of angels and archangels and as Abraham was—"the friend of God" himself, can be attained on easy terms? The thing is preposterous. Every power of the soul is needed for such a work and the consecration of the whole man, body, soul and spirit.

In view of this consideration, let us endeavor to see if any steps can be taken by which this fight between the higher and lower natures can be systematized and rendered more sure of success.

One of the first and most important is, when our judgment shows us that any course is certain to lead to evil and sin, to set our faces as steel against it. This resolution firmly formed will be of itself an immense step towards safety.

Let us take for instance the use of ardent spirits. However much any may contend that the use of them occasionally, in a medicinal way if allowable, few if any will be found who will not admit that the use of them socially is not a necessity, and is fraught with imminent risk. So a Christian should make a resolution that he will always refrain from their use in this way, and by so doing he saves himself from an immense risk both to his neighbor and himself. Let us imagine a careless trimming Christian who fancies himself much interested in converting to his theological understanding of religion his worldly neighbor, sitting down and taking repeated drinks of whisky and water over his conversation. Can not any one see at once, that it is "the blind leading the blind and they will both fall into the ditch?" A man truly alive to his situation knows too well the peril of such a step to allow himself for one moment to contemplate it.

Let us suppose another who has learned by experience that to look too long on sin—"we first abhor then pity—then embrace," and yet who, after the first examination of a business step has shown him plainly that it will be dishonest, allows himself to look again and again at the wrong thing—is it surprising that it soon ceases to look wrong?—and that he has learned "to deceive his own soul?"

It is step by step and often very little steps, that we sink to perdition—and it is step by step and often by very small steps, so that they seem extremely trivial, that the heights of Zion are gained. Of what is the universe composed? Of small particles. If God has not thought it beneath him to make his universe of minute particles—each one of which is as much under law as the united planet, shall we deem the smallest action beneath our notice? Satan would ask no better way of gaining us than "little by little." He is then sure of success—our salvation has slipped away from us and our crown is lost.

It may be said—but the Bible speaks of salvation as an easy thing. It also speaks of it as a very difficult thing. Let us see how these statements can be reconciled.

It is easy to enlist in the army of the Lord, and then one may be said to be prospectively saved—but it is hard to fight the battles and come off conqueror, when only one can be said to be really saved.

But one may say I never intended to make these mistakes. I was thoroughly in earnest in my desire to be a Christian. A long life has passed—what can I do now, or can I do any thing to remedy this evil?

In response, it may be said—"never despair—that is no part of the gospel plan. As long as there is life there is hope." Turn in with thorough earnestness to the great task and remember, the success of your undertaking will not be in proportion to the time expended but to the degree of faith exercised. Peter walked safely on the waves so long as his faith was strong, and when it failed him the merciful Savior held out his hand. Remember "we have not a High Priest who cannot be touched with the feeling of our infirmities." A full and earnest effort to do entirely right, will soon accomplish great things. An intense desire for holiness will beget an intense earnestness and watchfulness. The Corinthian Christians when convinced of their sin were so truly penitent and determined to forsake it that Paul said of them, "For behold this self-same thing, that ye sorrowed after a godly sort—what carefulness it wrought in you, yea—what clearing of yourself—yea, what indignation—yea, what fear—yea, what vehement desire—yea, what zeal—yea, what revenge."

On looking into your past unprofitable career, may you not account for the small progress which you have made, by the discovery, that the motive which lay at the bottom of your religious course, was never to escape sin, because of your newly acquired sense of its extreme hatefulness—but rather a desire to secure a great good for yourself in escaping punishment, and securing blessings—a motive which had but little reference to God but only to yourself? The very language of the true penitent is, "Against thee and thee only have I sinned and done this evil in thy sight." If you have not been fully in earnest in your efforts against sin, it is because you have not hated it. If happily you have now been aroused to its iniquity and imminent danger—a new and powerful impulse will be given to your efforts. Work, work with all your might, for the night is far spent—but work in hope—remembering that we have a High Priest who is merciful, and one who can be touched with a sense of our infirmity and having been tempted himself can and will always succor those who are tempted and will always make a way of escape that we may be able to bear it. Thus we need never despair but may always cling to the anchor of hope which is both sure and steadfast—always abounding in prayer for that strength and wisdom which comes from God in Christ, our Mediator and Advocate.

MRS. DAVIS AND HER MISSION.

Leaves from My Journal.

Jerusalem, Feb. 20. The weather is still clear and warm, but I have a fire. Spring is near and that is a comfort. I like hot weather best.

I am glad to know that the expenses of dear Bertie's funeral are all paid; and she is at rest. I love my darling just the same, and she is safe with Christ. He doeth all things well. The notice in the Herald was good; could not have been written better. She deserved it all. She has been much to me all the years she lived. My heart would have been very dark and sad only for her. She will be repaid in time to come. I pray God to bless her when she shall live again, and he will.

I am told the government will draft the Jews and Christians into the army. This news has brought grief and sorrow to these poor souls. A Jewish woman told me to-day about it, and said, "What shall we do?" I replied, "don't fear, God will help us." I love these poor Jews; they are kind people, and in trouble. May God help them and us. I shall send the Jerusalem Gazette often; it is small but very good.

The Kedron is still flowing and we shall go again to a picnic on its banks. I made a drawing the last time I was there and shall send a sketch. Yesterday, Sunday, we went about two miles, a party of seven, and sat on the rocks and ate our lunch, furnished by the old ladies. (I did not take any, as I always find a plenty.) We discovered two wells, very ancient; also ruins. I like these walks very much; and we always have a pleasant party of Arabs; they all like me and try to learn me to talk with them. My pronunciation amuses them, but they are real good, especially the old ladies.

Feb. 27. I have a bad cold, and the first since I left Boston. But the weather is warm and pleasant, and it will soon go. Thirteen Americans came to-day, but I did not see them.

Frank is now trying to buy land to build a mill. I wrote an article last night for the Jerusalem Gazette. Please give the copy which I shall mail to Mr. Mackay; also one to Leopold Moses. Tell them it needs support. It is quite an enterprise for Jerusalem, I think.

My rooms have been very damp, but all are the same. It would be death in any other country, but everything is different here. The buildings must be imported.

March 6. I have a regular New England cold. It has been strange weather for this country lately, but the sun is now very hot, still the house is cool, so we keep out of doors most of the time. I have been painting a sketch of Siloam to-day; it makes a pretty picture. I have had no letter for two weeks, but to-day received two postal cards from Boston; one dated Feb. 3, the other the 5th, from Enfield. I was glad to hear from her. There are many pilgrims in the city now and they are still coming.

I went to the church of the Holy Sepulchre and came away disgusted with the religion of Jerusalem. I think, from what I hear, that there is more corruption in religion here than anywhere else on earth. The sanctuary is vile, but it will be cleansed.

One can get almost everything here, if he has a little money. Living is very cheap; cheaper than in any other place in my knowledge. If one owned a house, it would be the cheapest, as well as the healthiest and happiest place on earth to live, even in its corruption.

The people are all kind to me, even the Mohammedans. I was out picking flowers this morning, and fell in with a company of Mohammedan ladies who immediately asked me to join them and share their lunch, which was very nice indeed. They seemed delighted to hear me speak a little Arabic. These poor souls seem to love Europeans, and are very kind to us all. We have two Mohammedan servants in the house and they are as kind to me as children. I am sure God will bless them in some way.

The ground is now covered with the most lovely and glorious flowers I ever saw. I have sitting before me a vase full of wild geranium roses, picked in the fields.

Oh how I wish a company could be raised to come and buy land and build good houses; raise wheat, corn, and make butter. I would gladly be the tenant of five or six families. If they only knew what a land this is they would come.

I think the people do not get angry here with each other as easily as they do in our country. There is a sense of ease that is nowhere else felt.

The Prussian Prince came last week. I saw him, and he looks just like one of our college boys. The Prince of Wales' sons are coming in about three weeks. All nations are anxious to secure a foothold here. The Russians have the best, however. I will go over and sketch Jericho and the Jordan next week and send. I am painting now.

I thank you for the papers; the news is all old but I am glad to read it all the same. I wish you could see the beautiful mountains round about Jerusalem. They are lovely beyond description, now robed in green as they are.

March 13. It is summer weather during the day, but the nights are chilly, and our houses damp. We have had a great trial during this rainy weather and heavy snows. The snow, however, made all the trouble. Well, there is good enough here to balance the evil, and more.

We have many Americans now in Jerusalem, and they are all highly pleased with the city. One old gentleman, quite rich, is stopping here a month, and his interest increases every day. I think if he stays a month, he will be like the rest—never want to leave. It is the same with all who come. There is a fascination somehow that cannot be resisted. Oh! how I wish God would move upon some one, who has the means, to come and establish a colony.

Last Sunday, in company with some friends, I went to the tombs of the Judges, (so called) and a lovely day we had. All the way we found something of interest. The ground was covered with flowers of every hue, and the rich green fields of grain were charming indeed. These tombs are catacombs. The entrance bears traces of great beauty. As we approached the outer entrance I thought—"How many sad weary hearts have passed here to lay away their dead." Our company brought tapers, and I was invited to enter and explore these caverns with them, but as I had been suffering with chest difficulty I was satisfied to hear an account from the rest.

As I was sitting at the entrance, I looked up and saw many names written above on the rich moulding. Suddenly I remembered a promise made to a dear friend some years ago, to write her name in Jerusalem. I seized a pencil, and after climbing to the highest accessible point, wrote boldly and carefully, in a manner that will not be easily effaced, the name of "Susan G. Perry." She is now sleeping in Lake grove, but when she comes to Jerusalem as she will sometime, she will see that I did not forget the sacred promise.

How sad to me was the news of our dear printer's death. Mr Blunt was a kind and true friend. Poor man, little thought he was going away to die in the West.

Land is increasing in value every day, and the natives who understand it, are buying all they can get hold of. Mr. Brinton's land has increased double since he bought, but he would not sell for any price. Now is the time to buy land. Berghine, a banker here, is buying whole villages.

I hope all are well in America. I sometimes dread to hear, as I fear the news will be that some one is sick. There are seventy travellers now here, and among them are many Americans.

ALICE E. DAVIS.

WILL CHRIST COME SOON?

ROBERT ROBERTS.

Take again the vision of the ram and the goat in chap. viii. The two-horned ram was declared to Daniel to stand for the two-dynastied Persian power, and the goat for the Grecian empire that came after; the horns of the goat, the four parts into which the empire was divided after Alexander's death; the horn that came out of them, for the destroyer of Jehovah's land and people—viz: the Roman power. See the interpretation in Dan. viii. 20–24. Now the question was asked how long a time this vision would prevail, how long a time the events represented would occupy? The answer is for 2300 days (verse 14), or as it ought to be according to the Septuagint and certain ancient Hebrew manuscripts, "two thousand four hundred days." Then," it is added, "shall the sanctuary be cleansed," that is, Jehovah's temple, land and people restored. Understanding years to be signified, the result must be plain to the meanest understanding. Cyrus began to reign B. C. 536. If you add 2400 years to that date, you will find we are brought down to our own generation. The period is at an end and the time arrived for the commencement of a new phase of events in connection with the power, land and people of Palestine.

There is a variety of other modes by which the same result is reached, viz: that we are now living in the end; but let these suffice to indicate to you the grounds upon which the belief is entertained, and that we are now living in the end of the times; that this is the time of that end; that is, the time when the period appointed for Gentile ascendancy has ended, and when events leading in the direction of a new epoch are to be looked for. This is the conclusion resulting from the mere chronology of the case.

We have now to ask whether the state of things in the world corresponds with this conclusion. Do actual facts harmonize with the idea? Before we are in a position to decide upon this question, we must ask and obtain an answer to another, viz: were any peculiar features to characterize the state of affairs on earth at the time of the end? and if so, what are those features? To these questions there is a plain and abundant answer in the Scriptures. They always speak of the end as a time peculiarly characterized—a time rife with events which may be recognized as a symptomatic of the approach of God's interference. Jesus, after defining certain things that would occur, says, "When ye see these things come to pass, know ye that the kingdom of God is nigh at hand." Luke xxi. 31. These words could have no other meaning. Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Daniel and John all speak of certain events appertaining to the approach of the time. Jeremiah speaks of the latter days as a time of angry vindication on the wicked world. Jer. xxx. 23, 24. He says, "Evil shall go forth from nation to nation, and a great whirlwind shall be raised up from the coasts of the earth." xxv. 32. Ezekiel speaks of the latter days as a time for military movements from the north. xxxvii, 16. Daniel marks the time of the end in the same way (xi. 40) and goes on to speak of Divine interposition and the resurrection of the dead as succeeding to these martial invasions. Rev. xi. 18 contains international anger as a prominent feature of the crisis which brings living wrath and the resurrection of the dead.

But we must be more specific. We must ascertain what are the definite characteristics of the time of the end, as prophetically delineated in order that we may be able to satisfy ourselves as to whether the conclusions of chronology are to be relied upon as indicating the present age as the time of the end. We shall find them clearly revealed and distinctly stated.

First Jesus speaks of "distress of nations with perplexity . . . men's hearts failing them from fear and looking after those things that are coming on the earth for the powers of heaven (that is, of the political heaven—the governments) shall be shaken." It is not necessary to prove that this is such a time. You all know it. There has been much national distress and perplexity for many years. It is all over the world. Bad trade, wars, diseases, poverty, bitter strife of classes in the shape of strikes and revolts, stupendous aspirations, schemes and agitations among the lower classes, diffusing perplexity and aggravating distress, combine to make you look wistfully upon the scene and ask what it all means. Most people feel there is a crisis of some sort coming. They cannot decide what it is, because the Scriptures generally are not consulted nor credited; but there is a vague, uneasy apprehension, best described by the words of Christ: "looking after those things that are coming upon the earth." This feeling is now extended to the governing classes who usually live in a serene and peaceful atmosphere. You are aware of the existence of a league for the destruction of rulers of all classes. It is not a mere scheme; it is a thing which has put itself into action. It is not confined to Russia; the attempt has been made to assassinate the crowned heads of almost every state in Europe. At the present moment, as you know, Europe is alive at dawn with consternation at the assassination of the Czar of Russia. It has struck terror into every court. As the German Emperor is said to have sadly remarked, "There is now no security for the life of any royal personage." The powers in the political heaven are shaken as they have never been shaken before.

Next, it is a foretold characteristic of the time of the end that there should be general preparation for war. This appears very plainly in Joel iii. 9. The time of the prophecy you may plainly see from verse 1, is the time of the end, viz: when the time for the restoration of Israel has drawn near: "Proclaim ye this among the Gentiles; prepare war. Wake up the mighty men; let all the men of war draw near; let them come up. Beat your ploughshares into swords, and your pruning hooks into spears: let the weak say, I am strong." There are other statements of a similar import; but twenty quotations could not make the matter plainer or stronger. We have but to ask whether the present situation of things corresponds to the time of the end in this particular. The man must be asleep indeed who is unaware that the one conspicuous characteristic of the European situation is preparedness for war. There never was a time in the world's history when the nations were armed as they now are. Never before were they in a position to call out the whole adult male population. Never before were the "work" (the literary and industrial and mercantile classes) reckoned among the strong (men of war). Such is the state of things now. Universal conscription is the law of all European countries. Every man—absolutely every man—whatever his occupation or social position—must pass through the army and pass a certain time with the colors and acquire a military training and be ready at a moment's call to join his regiment. Priests and certain other classes used to be exempted, but now all sorts of exemptions are swept away. Even Bismarck himself is colonel of a regiment.

It is not confined to one country. It is the law of France, the law of Germany the law of Austria, the law of Italy, the law of Spain, the law of Russia. The population of those countries are all soldiers on or off duty. We see little of it in England, because we are isolated from the continent by the "silver streak," but what is the state of things even here? We have a volunteer army. We did not always have that. Many here must remember the time when the only military force at the disposal of England was the militia and the regiments of the line: but now we have clerks and merchants' and professional men enrolled as volunteer soldiers to the number of at least 150,000.

Here is the fact before our eyes: the Gentile nations are armed and prepared for war as they never have been in the history of the world. There is a party in politics that would apply the law of compulsory conscription even in England. What is the meaning of this strange aspect of civilization?

You will recollect the Great Exhibition of 1851—the first of the series of international exhibitions that have since been held. You may remember that at that time there were great expectations as to the effect it would have in leading the world to abandon war and to submit the settlement of misunderstandings and disputes to courts of international arbitration. There had been no war of any consequence for about forty years, leaving out the revolutionary turmoils of 1848. The military art had grown rusty, so to speak, and there were great hopes it would get lostly fall out of use.

A society was formed to inculcate such views and bring about such results. It was called the Peace Society. About the time in question it held a great meeting in London in advocacy of its principles. There was much enthusiasm and entire agreement, with one exception. One man was against the resolution, and moved an amendment. He said that so far from entering upon a time of peace, Europe was entering upon a time of more extensive war preparation and more dreadful and numerous wars than the past had brought forth. His opposition evoked the indignation of the meeting in a stormy manner. He now sleeps in the dust, and we are hereas the living witnesses of the truth of his forecasts and the futility of the efforts of the Peace Society. The world has seen more great wars in the last thirty years than any preceding period can show in the same time; and the world is now armed to the teeth, and breathlessly awaits the outbreak of conflict.

What is the meaning of the strange spectacle? It is inexplicable on natural principles, though brought about by natural means. It is a providential preparation for the great impending event which we seek to introduce to your notice. Christ is coming to do a work of judgment—to inflict Jehovah's vengeance on the world preliminary to the establishment of his own glorious kingdom in all the earth. This vengeance is to be inflicted in war, as we have seen. These war preparations are intended to bring things into shape to allow of its being thoroughly and effectively done. The wickedness of man, is so to speak, putting itself into attitude—gathering up its strength—in the way that will furnish the occasion for an effective and staggering demolition of its power in all the earth.—Prophetic Times.

TAKE NOTICE.

By an error on the part of our pressman, we have on hand an extra lot of our four-page tracts, and persons wishing tracts to distribute should avail themselves of this opportunity at once. There are six sorts: "Can you believe," "Age to come not a heresy," "State of man in death," and "Life and death." We will send postpaid 60 copies of these tracts for 20c., or 100 copies for 30c.

We have also just printed a new edition of "A Letter to a Friend," on the covenants of promise, by Mrs. C. C. Woodruff. Single copies 10c., seven for 50c., sixteen for $1.00.

THE AGE TO COME

—EMBRACING SOME OF THE—

Things concerning the Kingdom of God and the Name of Jesus Christ,

—AS WELL AS THE—

FUTURE AND ETERNAL AGE.

—By A. Malone, M. D.—

This is a Cloth Bound book of 324 pages, neatly printed. The author's name is a sufficient guarantee to the worth of the work. Price only 30 cts. each. Send to this office for them.

The COVENANTS.

A TREATISE ON,

I. The Abrahamic covenant, its terms, its extent, its duration, its covenantees, and when possessed.

II. The Mosaic covenant, its terms, its relation to the Abrahamic covenant, where given, to whom given, the unity of the Law, its duration and its terminus, the sinai-tic and its purposes.

III. The New covenant, the covenantees—not the church, but Israel, constitutional prophecy considered, restoration from Babylon considered, future restoration of Israel as covenantees, our reference to the New covenant—as the Seed of the Abrahamic covenant, as the Mediation body, as a Royal and an Eternal Priesthood—now upon the plane of the flesh and soon through the veil upon the plane of spirit; restoration of the Aaronical order of priesthood in the house of Zadok under the Prince and subordinate to the royal priesthood; the necessity and the nature of sacrifices in the ages to come.

IV. The Davidian covenant, its terms, the kingdom divided, the kingdom removed, the seed chastised, the kingdom to be restored under Messiah, the reign eternal.

V. Twelve objections to the position, that the kingdom of Christ in organization is yet future, answered, and the law of induction into the kingdom or the birth of the water and of the spirit.

This work is now in press and will be ready for distribution in June or early in July. It will make from 300 to 320 pages, and will sell for $1 per copy. We are now receiving names for the work, to be paid when the book is delivered. We need your assistance. Give us your name for the work.

"THE RESTITUTION OF ALL THINGS WHICH GOD HATH SPOKEN BY THE MOUTH OF ALL HIS HOLY PROPHETS SINCE THE WORLD BEGAN."

VOL. XXXV. PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, MAY 24, 1882. NO. 20.

THE RESTITUTION.

TERMS--TWO DOLLARS PER YEAR, Payable in advance. Three and Six Months at the same rate.

Address all Letters and Communications to THE RESTITUTION, Plymouth, Indiana.

TO CORRESPONDENTS:

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." And upon "this rock" the establishment of the kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of Kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations. The redemption of Israel. The literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked from eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief of the Gospel as preached, and sincere love to mankind—to be exemplified in the faithful performance of duty, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

PREPARATION FOR THE GREAT DAY.

ROBERT ROBERTS.

Next, we have to look at the way in which this state of war-preparedness has been brought about. This will give another token of the characteristic of the time of the end. It was foreshown to John in the Isle of Patmos that it would be the result of a special political complication in which a certain influence, symbolized by frogs, would play a leading and formative part. You will find the evidence of this in the 16th chapter of Revelation. That it is the time just before the coming of Christ will be evident to you from verse 15, which introduces the coming of Christ thus: "Behold I come as a thief: Blessed is he that watcheth." The complication in question is exhibited as follows: "And I saw three unclean spirits like frogs come out of the mouth of the dragon, and out of the mouth of the beast, and out of the mouth of the false prophet, for they are the spirits of devils working signs, which go forth to the kings of the earth and of the whole world, to gather them to the war of the great day of God Almighty." Verses 13, 14. I will not detain you long over this piece of symbolism. We want to get at its meaning as applicable to our own time. It will be possible to do this in a very simple way. In the first place, it symbolizes a political operation. This you must allow in view of the result—war. Only political causes generate war. It is a political cause that we must find associated with a power that has represented itself by frogs. You know it is customary for political powers to represent themselves by animals. Such as England, by the lion; America by the eagle, etc. It is another fact that when powers are represented in prophetic vision, the spirit of God makes choice of the animals by which they heraldically represent themselves. Examples of this you have in the ram of Persia, the goat of Greece, the winged-lion of Babylon, the lion of Turkish (Britain), the dragon of Rome, etc. Here are three frogs. Did any nation ever represent itself by frogs? Yes, the French, as shown by their ancient coins and banners. Singularly enough, they are a nation that has much to do with frogs otherwise, in ornamental architecture, and on the table as an article of food. Here then is a prophecy that in the time of the end, the French were to be instrumental in stirring up the nations to a warlike attitude in preparation for the war of the great day of God Almighty. The only question is, has it been so? because if this is the time of the end, it must have been so. And it has been so. If you will go back to the time of which I have already spoken viz., the time of the Great Exhibition of 1851, you will find that it was the French that is due the great change that afterwards came over the temper of Europe in military matters. Louis Napoleon seized the the reins of power; by the coup d'etat, and to strengthen a questionable position, he strengthened the French army and navy. The powers perceiving his movements in this direction grew uneasy, in view of his Napoleonic connection, and his surmised intention of avenging Waterloo. They too looked to their fleets and armies and a process of reciprocal arming began, which never stopped till it reached its present appalling dimensions.

But it is in connection with the three centres of the frog-spirit activity that we find the most remarkable fulfillment of the prophecy. These are specified in the chapter (Rev. xvi. 14), as, "the mouth of the dragon and the mouth of the beast and the mouth of the false prophet." These are political symbols, the exposition of which in detail cannot be entered upon at the present time. They are treated of in various publications. Suffice it for the present occasion to say that they can be shown to mean Constantinople (mouth of the dragon); Vienna, (the mouth of the beast); and Rome, (the mouth of the false prophet). I must take that for granted for present purposes. Such an explanation would warrant the expectation that French diplomacy would operate successively at these three European political centres causing war. As a matter of fact, this expectation was announced by Dr. Thomas in 1849, long before events shaped themselves in the course expected. The evidence of this exists now, in the shape of printed expositions—expositions that were printed at the time, and are now in possession of the friends of the truth. I state this that you may know that this is not a theory invented afterwards to suit the facts. Affairs took the very course anticipated—the course shadowed forth in this symbol. Louis Napoleon's agents busy at Constantinople brought about the Crimean war. The Sultan inspired by the French Emperor declared war against Russia. Thus the frog-spirit went out of the mouth of the dragon. The war that followed was emphatically the French Emperor's war, as declared by Lord Derby during the debate in the House of Lords, at the time of the Russo-Turkish war. Its effect was to consolidate Louis Napoleon's position, and to rouse Europe from their military dormancy of the previous peaceful era. It was not long in being followed by a second war, caused by a French-caused declaration from Vienna, (the mouth of the beast). This was the Austro-Sardinian war which was caused by the ostentatious declaration of the French Emperor on the New Year's Day of 1859, at the annual reception of the ambassadorial body in Paris, that his relations with Austria were not satisfactory. A declaration of war was made from Vienna, consequent on this announcement. In the war that followed, France fought on the side of Sardinia against Austria, and while military development on the Continent was greatly stimulated, progress was being made by the same means towards the political overthrow of the Papacy whose mainstay Austria was. The war ended in the dismemberment of Austria, and the strengthening and enlargement of the Pope's enemies. In due time, the third frog-evolution took place, viz., from Rome, the mouth of the false prophet. France by agreement, evacuated Rome in 1866-67: the Revolution rose against the Pope; the Pope asked the French Emperor what he was to do. The French Emperor said, "Hold on! I will come to your help." Upon this, the Pope declared war against the Italian revolutionists, and thus the political frog-spirit emanated from the mouth of the false prophet. Thus the three great wars of the Second Empire fulfilled the Apocalyptic symbolism and contributed to the present armed state of the world. The political events of the past thirty years in this line of things, are therefore a distinct confirmation of the fact that we are now in the time of the end. We cannot be far from the great event next (parenthetically) intimated in the chapter, "Behold I come as a thief," an intimation followed by a statement of the gathering of the nations for the conflict of Armageddon.

But there is another confirmatory token. The symbolism of the frog-sign gives us to understand that while the frog-influence is active, the country possessing the river Euphrates is in a state of decadence. It is intimated thus: "And the sixth angel poured out his vial upon the great river Euphrates, and the water thereof was dried up, that the way of the kings of the east might be prepared." It is a well-known feature of political allegory to choose the river of a country to represent the power of that country. Thus the Mississippi stands for America, the Thames for Britain, the Rhine for Germany, etc. The river of Assyria is prophetically used to stand for the power of Assyria (Is. viii. 7, thus: "The Lord bringeth upon them (Israel) the waters of the river, strong and many, even the king of Assyria and all his glory; and he shall come up over all his channels and go over all his banks." Here the river is represented in an overflowing state, but in Rev. xvi. 12, it is in a drying state. Consequently, we must look for the possessor of the Euphrates being in a decaying state at the time of the end. The possessor of the Euphrates, you know, is Turkey. What has been the state of Turkey for a generation past? You know that its decline state has been the byword of European politics all that time. It could not be better represented than by a drying river—shrinking, shrinking, in its bed till the bottom of the channel begins to show itself. Once Turkey was the most formidable power in Europe. Now, she is sunk to insignificance. Her territories have been gradually diminished until there is scarcely any Turkey in Europe, and her resources are so exhausted that she cannot pay her police. A crash has been expected a long time, and seems every moment on the point of happening. It will come at last one of these days, and it will be a great sign.

The object of the drying of the Euphrates is stated to be "that the way of the kings of the east might be prepared." This becomes intelligible in view of the fact that Turkey possesses the land of promise in which the kingdom of God is to be set up, as we saw last Thursday. The kings of the new kingdom are the kings of the east, or the kings of the rising sun. Christ is the rising sun and his brethren are his fellow kings. While Turkey was a strong power, their "way" was blocked, for it was impossible in that state of things for those preparatory events to take place which had been arranged for and foretold. What they are may be learned from Ezek. xxxviii. There we find (verses 8-17) that in the latter days, just before Christ comes, there is a partial restoration of Israel to their own land. It is accomplished by natural means, and is under the protectorate of a mercantile lion power, whom there is no difficulty in identifying with England. Now this could never be accomplished unless the Turkish power was dried out of the way. She is drying away rapidly, and concurrently with this process, revival has begun for the land and people of Palestine. The general public may not know much of this, because it interests them so little that even the notice that appears in the papers receives but little attention, and suggests no particular significance. But it is different with those who are eagerly watching the signs of the times. They are well aware of a great change going on in the position of the Jews everywhere, but more particularly in the Holy Land, where they have been allowed to settle and hold land ever since the Crimean war. A variety of authorities speak of a considerable return having already taken place, and of great changes having taken place in Jerusalem, where buildings owned by Jews are springing up all round the outside of the city. The latest witness is the Austrian inspector of buildings in the Holy Land. He issued an official report a year ago. Various schemes are afloat for promoting the recovery of the Holy Land, and encouraging the resettlement of the Jews. The latest and best known is that of M. Laurence Oliphant, a British author and diplomatist, who, neither a Jew nor a Christian, advocates the colonization of the Holy Land with Jews as the best protection of English communication with India, against the encroachments of Russia.

While all these things are going on, which just ought to be, going on, we behold the Pope prostrate in the west—so powerless that he is obliged to tolerate dissenting chapels within sight of the Vatican, and to suffer the operations in Rome itself of a branch of the British and Foreign Bible Society. The Pope's power is gone because the time of the end is reached.

Then in the north, we see in an advanced stage of preparation the power that ought to be there according to the requirement of the prophetic word. There ought to be a great imperial growing formidable power there, assuming a protectorate over minor nationalities. There ought to be this because of what we read in Ezekiel and Daniel. In Ezek. xxxviii., we find a power addressed thus: "Thou shalt come from thy place in the north parts, thou and many people with thee .... Thou shalt come up against my people of Israel, as a cloud to cover the land. It shall be in the latter days." Verses 15, 16. Not only is the power so addressed, said to be "in the north parts," but localities and places are specified that direct our eyes to modern Russia. He is described as "the prince of Rosh, Meshech and Tubal." Verse 2. This fact is somewhat obscured by the translation of Rosh into the word "Chief" in the common version. This is a correct translation: Rosh means head or chief: but Rosh is also a proper name: and the question is, ought we to read it as a proper name or as it is in the English translation? This question is settled for us by the seventy Greek Jews, who translated the Old Testament into Greek for Ptolemy Philadelphus 300 years before Christ. They transfer it to the Greek as a proper name, along with Meshech and Tubal, which is doubtless correct. They were certainly better judges as long ago on a point like this than the King James' translators more than 2,000 years after the prophecy was written. Rosh, as traced by ancient historians and geographers, is the original designation of the people who have given their name to Russia (Roshia). Meshech and Tubal may be discovered in the modern terms, Moscovy and Tobolski. The name of Russia, Muscovy and Tobolski, then, was in the latter days to have an extensive protectorate over countries, as may be gathered from the following enumeration, in verses 5-7, "Persia and Ethiopia and Libya with them: all of them with shield and helmet; Gomer and all his band; the house of Togarmah of the north quarters, and all his bands and many people with thee. Be thou prepared and prepare for thyself, thou and all thy company that are assembled unto thee, and be thou a guard unto them." Nothing was more improbable at the time this prophecy was delivered than that the Russian nation should sustain such a position in the earth. But now that the time of the end has come, there she is, in her right position. It has been a gradual development of the past four or five hundred years, and still goes on before our eyes. Her political expansion is in fact the ultimate cause of what is known as "The Eastern Question." Apart from Russian designs, the condition of Turkey and her subject races would have very little interest for English politicians. What is the Eastern Question, in fact, but the development of the situation foretold, for the latter days—viz., a decaying Euphratean power, an overshadowing maritime mercantile lion-power interested in the Euphratean dominion a menacing Russian colossus in the north?

The answer to our question then is obvious. The question was: "Does the state of affairs in the world correspond with the conclusion to which chronology leads us, that the day in which we live is the time of the end—the time that is to witness the return of Christ to the earth?" The answer is that the state of affairs in question is wanting in no one particular that ought to characterize it if it is the time of the end. Everything is ripe or ripening. The world is armed; the nations are distressed and perplexed. Its military and political situation is the result of the workings of French militio-imperial diplomacy for twenty years. This diplomacy has issued in a warlike form from the three European centres in the order enumerated in the prophecy; Turkey, the Euphratean empire, is at the collapsing point. Palestine and the Jews are reviving and recovering from the down-treading of many generations; and in the north we see hovering the huge form of a military despotism in readiness to play the principal figure in the latter-day programme.

There is but one conclusion: the end of the Gentile age is upon us. There can be no question that the time is at hand—at the door—for the consummation of the prophetic programme in the appearing and kingdom of Christ. This does mean that the day and the hour of Christ's appearing can be known. It means that the time of the end has come during the currency of which he may at any time arrive in the world, in the way already described; but at what particular part of which is not revealed. This conclusion will not affect many people much. It will be treated scornfully by the vast majority to the last moment. The affairs of the present present to the public mind too much to allow of any other result. The public men of the present moment, the public agitations of the hour, the personal affairs of life fill the eye and engross the mind of the common run of men to an extent that makes them utterly insensible to so great a fact as that the Gentile times are about to close. But the fact remains nevertheless. The end is quietly stealing on to its accomplishment. Like the movements of the starry universe, while the world is inattentive or asleep. Events will take their course whether we watch the more not. These events are on a great scale, but they are all within the compass of a definite plan. Nevertheless, the universe is great; the ordinances of heaven and earth are of incomprehensible magnitude; and the purpose of God who made them all, with regard to the teeming populations upon earth on a corresponding scale of greatness. Still it has form and proportions as the earth itself has, though part of infinitude; but it will come to a direct and definite and sudden culmination at the last. The apparent chaos of history will not run on for ever. There is a purpose running through it all. There is a divinity shaping the ends of human destiny, rough hewn and fortuitous as they may seem.

The purpose has been declared. God has foreshadowed his plan. Its leading outlines are visible on the prophetic page. We not only have the prophecy: we have the prophecy largely fulfilled. We not only have the plan: we have it in great part already carried out before our eyes. We have not only been told the signs; but they are shining before our eyes if we will but open our eyes to see. The clouds that are settling in thick and threatening masses on the political horizon are part of them. They are the precursors of a storm of which the signal has long been hoisted. The signal may be disregarded, but the storm will come. A revolution is imminent in human affairs, such as men are little dreaming about. A crisis, great and solemn, such as has not entered into the calculations of the astutest politician, is drawing on. It is preparing the situation for Christ's arrival in the world as a thief, at whose presence the crisis will deepen, and the storm burst with appalling and destructive fury. The tempest will rage till every human government goes down, and every human institution is levelled with the dust. The work accomplished, his voice will command the storm to cease, and the world, under new and Divine institutions, will hush into such repose as mankind have never known since sin entered into the world. The prophetic picture of Psa. xlvi. will then be realized: "The heathen raged; the kingdoms were moved; he uttered his voice; the earth melted. Come, behold the works of the Lord, what desolations he hath made in the earth. He maketh wars to cease unto the ends of the earth: Be still and know that I am God. I will be exalted among the heathen: I will be exalted in the earth. The Lord of hosts is with us: the God of Jacob is our refuge."

Youths' Column.

1882.

Little children young and joyous,
Tell me, have you much to do,
Have you made yourselves a promise,
To be good in eighty-two?

Have you made a secret promise,
That you'll only say what's true,
That to all you will be gentle,
All the year of eighty-two?

Clouds will rise and hide the sunshine,
And the sky so soft and blue,
Still you can be kind and loving,
Till the end of eighty-two.

Always think in work or playing
I will unto others do,
As I wish them to do to me,
Through the year of eighty-two.

Let there be a page well written,
In your book of life so new.
Let it not be stained or blotted,
Till the end of eighty-two.

—Aunt Carrie, in The Youth's Revealer.

How to Keep Your Room.

A look into the chamber of a boy or girl will give one an idea what kind of a man or woman he or she will probably become. A man who keeps his clothes hung up neatly, or a girl whose room is done always, will be apt to make a successful man or woman. Order and neatness are essential to our comfort, as well as to that of others about us. A boy who throws down his cap or coat or anything, and never hangs it up, and leaves books and papers with something in its mouth, and beginning to guess what it wanted, we drew back out of sight and watched through the curtains.

Presently the bird gained courage and came near. The little youngster made a tremendous commotion, got close to the wires and opened its beak till it looked all mouth, then the mother dropped a delicate worm down its throat.

By the time this was disposed of the father was at hand with another. They fed the little one like this for some time, and grew quite tame. Then when they thought he was old enough to feed himself, they dressed the worms into the cage and kept watching up and down, tapping their beaks on the window-sill and swallowing imaginary worms, till the little one took to imitating their actions. When he could feed himself I opened the door and he flew off with his parents.

And now I want to give you a motto: "Never take away what you cannot give."

With all the toying in the world, you cannot give life to even one thing; then do not take it away. Be kind to the poor dumb animals, and plead for them who cannot plead for themselves, for remember, "The Lord God made them all."—Child's Companion.

A Nice Boy.

A boy was once tempted by his companions to pluck ripe cherries from a tree his father had forbidden him to touch.

"You need not be afraid," said one of his companions, "for if your father should find out that you had them, he is so kind that he would not hurt you."

"That is the very reason," replied the boy, "why I would not touch them. It is true, my father would not hurt me; yet my disobedience I know would hurt my father, and that would be worse to me than anything else."

A boy who grows up with such principles would be a man in the best sense of the word. It betrays a regard for rectitude that would render him trustworthy under every trial.

Please Draw My Likeness.

There is a story told by one of our great poets of a sailor who was shipwrecked on a lonely island, where the animals were too wild to be afraid of him. They had never been hunted or teased by man, and used to cluster round him much as they may have done round Adam and Eve in the garden of Eden.

No doubt there was a time when the animals walked peacefully by the side of man, and birds sang close to him; but, by and by, he came to be cruel to the poor dumb animals, and now we find that they often run away from us. Still, if we are always kind to them they seem to know it, and we can tame them easily.

Mr. Harrison Weir loves animals of all kinds, and they seem to have found it out.

One day when he was sitting in his study, a little squirrel jumped through the open window, and settling on the top of his desk, gazed up into his face, as if he would say,

"Here I am; please draw my likeness."

Mr. Weir kept very quiet for fear of frightening his little visitor, and sketched him just as he stood. When the operation was over the squirrel turned about, and ran off to his home in the trees.

I should like to have heard the account he gave of the "human" who had not caught him to put him in one of those horrible whirligig cages, or take the soft fur off his back, and had not even clapped his hands to frighten him away.

I once picked up a chaffinch with a broken leg. Tying up the tiny limb I kept the bird in a cage until it had healed. When I opened the door for him to fly away, he took a turn round the room and went back contented to his cage.

Finding that he did not want to leave me, I made a great pet of him. Half his days were spent in flying about the room, perching on my shoulder or catching flies on the window. He knew my desk as well as I did, and the moment I sat down to write he would hop out of his cage and amuse himself by pecking at the keys as they hung from the lock.

For years he was my constant companion, and when, at last, I found him lying on his back with his poor little toes turned up, I felt as if I had lost a dear friend.

When I was a little child I met some boys who had been robbing a nest. I gave them all the money I had for the young thrush and took it home. We did all we could to make the poor little thing eat, but we only choked it. The next day was Sunday, and it looked so ill and wretched that my father wanted to kill it at once. But mother thought the warm sun might do it good, so we put the cage outside the window and went to church. When we came back the baby looked decidedly better. We noticed a bird flying backwards and forwards with ### Questions For the Young.

My Dear Young Friends:

You will, as you grow older, find a great many people who doubt the existence of the wise and glorious Being who made the universe. They will tell you "that they cannot conceive what he is like and so they do not believe that he is." Now you want to learn to reason about these things while you are young, to seek "the evidences of things not seen," that your feet may be set on the sure ground-work of faith, and hope be like a strong anchor to your lives.

If a man were talking to you from the other side of a high wall, you would know he was there because you could hear his voice, and understand his words, though you might not be able to picture to yourself his features and dress, and if the man were still farther off and had sent you letters and beautiful gifts, and you had talked with his messengers face to face, had seen them perform the wonderful things he had taught them to do, and had used the knives, and horses, and watches that he had made with his own hands, you would be sure there was such a man, wouldn't you.

Well, this is the way you must reason about your Heavenly Father. He has talked from behind a wall, so high that you cannot see him, but you know he is there, because you have heard his voice. He has sent you letters and men have talked with his messengers face to face. The beautiful angels have come right down to us from God to tell us about him, and many persons who have believed and trusted in him, have been able to cure the sick, make the lame to walk, the blind to see, and the deaf to hear, that we might know what he can do in his great wisdom and power.

You have read thousands of things that he has made. You see his works all around you; your own life is a gift from him.

And as you would reason from the works of the perished Indians of the West, so do you reason from his works. You have never seen those Indians, no living person has ever seen them, no book on earth contains anything of their history. But their rocky homes, their cooking utensils, their weapons of war, tell the story of a wiser race of people than are any of the Indians now in existence on the continent.

No more finite being could create the wondrous worlds above us; the earth, the bright moon, nor the living creatures upon the earth. These things all say to you "that God is."

Then you have his book—the Bible—that wonderful letter from heaven, telling you that he not only "is" but that "he is a rewarder of all those that diligently seek him," and that by faith in his word and obedience to the requirements of his law, you can have a life that will never end, in the beautiful new earth.

I believe in God, and seek out the duty I owe
The Creator to whom all the world do owe

Plymouth, Indiana, May 24, 1882.

EDITORIAL CORRESPONDENCE.

On Monday, May 15, according to a previous determination, we took the cars at Plymouth, at 9:30 P. M., for New York. We arrived at Philadelphia at 3 A. M. Wednesday, May 17. We stopped off at Philadelphia to visit our dear friends Brother and Sister Willard at Haddonfield, N. J., six miles out of Philadelphia, on the Camden and Atlantic City R. R. We were rejoiced to find our dear Brother and Sister in the Lord both well, and both earnestly devoted to the cause of our adorable and soon coming King. Our acquaintance commenced about forty years ago, and at the very start of what is known as the Advent Movement. Although disappointed in the realization of our hopes, we find ourselves still confident that the coming of the Lord not only draweth nigh, but that it is now imminent, and notwithstanding the frosts of time have whitened the thinned locks of our once dark auburn hair, yet we think it quite possible that we may live to see the Lord's Christ coming in the clouds of heaven. We continued our stay with this kind Christian family till Friday morning, May 19, and then went over to Philadelphia and took the 11 A. M. train for New York, and arrived at Brother J. B. Cook's hospitable home in the afternoon and were most cordially received.

We have not the time at our disposal to write out so full an account of the more notable places along the line of the Pennsylvania Railway as we intend to. In order to make matters of this kind interesting we must prepare notes and throw them into form for our readers hereafter. Our journey in the daytime of May 16, was along through Eastern Ohio and Western Pennsylvania, and through some places where events transpired in days gone by that have changed not only the political destiny of these United States, but most likely the course of history in trans-Atlantic kingdoms. In our present freely written communication we shall do little more than to note incidents of travel, and remark upon some of the more interesting scenery along the route.

For a distance this day our journey was along the Ohio River the Belle River of the French and that became a classic stream in Continental times—to the confluence of the Monongahela and Alleghany whose united waters form the "Beautiful River" as the French name signifies. At the junction of these streams the great manufacturing city, Pittsburgh is located, which well merits the appellation of —The Iron City. Furnaces and forges, coal and smoke are the prominent features of the more actively busy parts of this important city. It has its beautiful and picturesque surroundings where homes of wealth and comfort find a place.

A few miles out of Pittsburgh brings us to Braddock's Station, a place memorable for the defeat of Major-General Edward Braddock, commander of a British army in an expedition against the French in 1755. He was marching against Fort Duquesne with an army of 1200 men and was drawn into an ambush and lost about one-half of his forces, receiving himself a mortal wound, July 9, of the above year. The country along for quite a distance eastward is broken, and generally uncultivated, till, at length, the abrupt barren peaks assume a more rounded oval form, and thus becomes susceptible of being farmed.

At length the traveler reaches the sublime scenery of the Alleghanies, where peaks rise o'er peaks in solemn majestic grandeur, and where, from some conspicuous outlook, grand ranges of the "Everlasting Hills" may be seen extending far, far away, till blended with and lost in the hazy distance. Some of those towering summits stand out in beautiful magnificence, covered with the dusky mantle of dark evergreen interspersed with the lighter and less somber hues of the spring-leaving shrubbery. Here the bold-faced precipice stands out in its wonderful contortions and infoldings that show what mighty forces were employed by the Great World Builder when he lifted up the perpetual hills on their rock bases of age-lasting granite.

Anon we come to where the precipitous declivities are covered with a continuity of broken rocks, as though a war-tempest had hurled ten thousand bolts of lightning dynamite against the mountain ranges, riven the proud walls of granite, and sent the stony torrent down the mountain sides.

Amid these scenes we climb and climb winding upward and still upward—the cars perched on their narrow track half way up the sloping side of the land. Egypt's king and host—the valley gorge deep down below, and the summit peak rising above—till a range stands bold in front, with no way around, and with a lofty height that no windings can surmount. The only alternative is to cut through, and our train enters the arched tunnel, and we pursue our course for nearly a mile and a quarter under the mountain above our heads. We pass the tunnel, round the Horse-Shoe curve and night lets down her sable curtains—we look and look at the rising and falling valleys, as it is projected against the distant canvas, till all fades out in one fair picture of wavy majesty on the dark canvas of the night skies.

On Friday, after leaving Brother Willard's, our route was up the Delaware on the Pennsylvania side of the river to nearly opposite Trenton in New Jersey. This is a beautiful and well cultivated country. The Delaware is crossed by a bridge into New Jersey. After leaving Trenton the train made no stop at the intervening stations to Jersey City on the Hudson opposite New York City. Some parts of New Jersey resemble very well with Pennsylvania. Brooklyn is a very desirable city to live in on account of very many advantages that might be mentioned. Yesterday, Sunday, May 21st, we preached day and evening for the Church of the Blessed Hope at their place of worship on Cumberland Street, and we met with a kind reception indeed from the devoted brethren and sisters who meet here, and who are waiting for the return of God's Son from heaven and for that glorious "restitution of all things which God hath spoken of by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." We shall stay East awhile longer to enjoy a respite from the perplexing business confinement at home, although it will be our endeavor to make our loved paper as interesting to its readers as we well can. We have not found the time yet to go over the great commercial city of the Western Continent—New York.

We make a note from the Tribune of to-day, which is to the effect that "between 700 and 800 people die in New York every week. The rest of the great city goes on with its loves and its hates, its joys and sorrows, unmindful of the fact that scores of funeral processions wend their way each day over the ferries to some of the suburban cemeteries." As we passed out of Philadelphia, and saw the broad acres where the white lettered marbles told of the countless myriads that slept below, we were led to reflect that the city of Philadelphia's dead was far more populous than the city of Philadelphia's living. In November 1682, Wm. Penn landed on the ground where Philadelphia now stands and in the 200 years that have since elapsed how many have descended into the tomb. And so of New York—the millions sleep, and it is long since death had the majority. May the age of glory be hastened when there shall be no more death, neither sorrow nor crying, but when the glory of the Lord shall fill the whole earth. Night's sober livery is darkening out the day so we close and for this time bid our readers farewell.

The Dispensations—Ages. How Have They Closed?

J. B. COOK.

Let the facts compose our answer. Each has ended in judgment on its own evil, and in an advance into an higher age and on the ascending plane of God's one all-comprehending purpose. Rom. viii. 28; Eph. i. 4.

1. The sin of Eden was not repeated but punished by expulsion and subjection to death. But in wrath, mercy was remembered. The promise opened a new age—the primal age of gospel grace. Abel stands on that basis first in the line of faith's imperial triumphs. Heb. xi. 4.

2. The example of Cain however, prevailed to fill the earth with violence and blood. By the flood their outrages ended. But it opened into the visible and more evident rainbow covenant of grace. Gen. ix. 8–17.

3. Yet this apparent proof of God's good will lost its power. The Babel builders mocked God, to climb up to heaven another way. Their tower of pride, and their presumption, was punished by the confusion of their language and dispersion.

4. Again God interposed. He called Abram, made a personal covenant with him and his seed, and sealed their separation from the world by circumcision. This period of sojourn extended through the 430 years embracing the captivity in Egypt. Ex. xii. 11, 12.

5. The chosen people [illegible]

6. The Mosaic age, the law, closed in like manner, with an advance by the advent of the son of David according to the flesh, but declared the Son of God with power, by victory over the tempter, reversing the sin of Adam in Eden, by his resurrection: and by giving his gospel power to call out from Jews and Gentiles a regenerated people, to become the royal priesthood and holy nation; and share with him all the age (world) to come. Heb. ii. 5–14; 1 Pet. i. 9; Gal. iii. 24–29; Rom. xvi. 14.

Here was not so much as a thought of a more infernal form of Judaism. At the close, to embody and exceed all the then past! No, indeed! The rejecters of Jesus at that time were left to their own way, and their foretold doom, as did many of their fathers. But the believing class escaped and were counted "the seed of God and heirs of the kingdom." John i. 11.

7. Now shall such facts be lost on us? Is it wisdom to ignore them? to deny the tempter, the devil, and the adversary antichristos of world-power, which culminates in the devil? The man of sin—the antikeimenos—who opposeth? The antichristos—manifold, and yet the unified power of darkness; the power of Satan, which was then and there recognized? Nay can any one deny that this present evil world (age) has been under the god or prince of this world, and much the same in all its forms of opposition to Jesus and his cause? 2 Cor. iv. 4; Gal. i. 4.

I answer in charity, No! except in utter mistake. Let us then admit the adversary—the antichrist as then recorded in and through our dispensation; the little horn, the harlot of Rome, (Dan. vii. Rev. xvii.) located on its seven hills.

Let us all join in waiting for Jesus from heaven; the sun of righteousness! the deliverer to put down all authority and opposing power. 1 Cor. xv. 24.

Our dispensation must end in deliverance, in the subjection and destruction of the devil and death—not in their manifold energy of evil, as a future antichrist, but the kingdom prepared (Paradise) from the foundation of the world. Matt. xxv. 34. Bless the Lord O my soul.

One fact more from nature combines and confirms this truth of the ages, the night is far spent, the day is at hand. Rom. xiii. 12. No one has ever found that the night, when far spent, has been used to renew and intensify itself and be "the night." No, the course of all nature forbids. Night gives way to the orb of day. Let us, then, who are of the light look for the day—the day of Christ and his salvation. Amen.

"PREACH THE WORD."

I charge thee therefore before God, and the Lord Jesus Christ, who shall judge the quick and the dead at his appearing and his kingdom; Preach the word; be instant in season, out of season; reprove, exhort, rebuke with all long-suffering and doctrine. For the time will come, when men will not endure sound doctrine; but after their own lusts shall they heap to themselves teachers having itching ears; And they shall turn away their ears from the truth, and shall be turned into fables. 2 Tim. iv. 1–4.

Is not this a fac simile?—a graphic description of the times?—the preaching of the present time? This prophecy, written over eighteen centuries ago, is it not being fulfilled at the present time? This solemn charge was written by the apostle Paul, to his son Timothy, (i. e. his son in the faith of the gospel) in view of the advent of Christ, and the simultaneous event of the establishment of the kingdom.

These events then, constitute what Paul styles the truth, of which fables is now, yea, we are compelled by the use of the language used by the apostle, and by what our own corporeal senses—seeing, hearing, etc., take cognisance, to say, that fables are now substituted instead of this glorious truth, the proclamation of which is the gospel the great motive power of which Paul said he was not ashamed, for it is the "power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth, to the Jew first and also to the Greek."

No one can possibly deny that the coming of Christ and the consequent establishment of the kingdom is the great central truth of revelation, especially in the New Testament; a few of the many passages which might be adduced must suffice at this time, the first is the first verse of the text, another in the words of Christ himself, "I go away, I will come again, and receive you unto myself, that where I am, there ye may be also." This text is sadly perverted by "adding to the word," viz., that Christ returns to heaven the second time and takes his saints with him. The mansions of which Christ spoke cannot be away from the earth, from the fact, that he said "the meek shall inherit it;" see Matt. v. 5, also Psa. xxxvii, in which the Psalmist in four or five verses utters the same language, slightly varied in its phraseology. Daniel also bears unequivocal testimony to the same thing. The kingdom and dominion and the greatness of the kingdom under (not in or above) the whole heaven shall be given to the saints of the Most High, whose kingdom is an everlasting (not temporary) kingdom, and all dominions shall serve and obey him. Dan. vii. 27. If we follow the analogy of Daniel's teaching, in his interpretation of Nebuchadnezzar's dream in the second chapter, we certainly could not arrive at the conclusion which most of the modern expounders from their standpoint of observation arrive at. He gives a brief but a graphic description of the rise and fall of the four kingdoms, Gentile kingdoms; and the sitting up of the kingdom of God—the restored kingdom of Israel. Nebuchadnezzar, the first in the series had dominion over the entire earth, this was subjugated by the second kingdom, viz. Medo-Persia, and this in turn by the third or Grecian, and this by the fourth or Roman kingdom in its divided state symbolized by the ten toes: these were smitten by the symbolic stone, cut out of the mountain without hands. An entire subjugation of this fourth kingdom, together with all the different elements, the different metals including the iron and clay, broken in pieces together and became like the chaff of the summer threshing floor, and the wind carried them away, and no place was found for them, and the stone which smote the image became a great mountain, (kingdom) and filled the whole earth. See Dan. ii.

To follow the analogy of the kingdom of God—of his Son—kingdom of heaven, called so, because the King will descend from heaven—and because the God of heaven sets it up, and not because the saints will go to heaven. This is another of the fables of these last days. The saints cannot inherit the earth—the land covenanted to the fathers, Abraham, Isaac and Jacob—and heaven, away from the earth at the same time, no more than it would be possible for two things to occupy the same space at one and the same time. "If ye be Christ's, then are ye Abraham's seed and heirs according to the promise." Abraham, the father of the faithful, had no promise of an inheritance in heaven. The condition of our heirship is this, viz., if ye be Christ's, then are ye Abraham's seed; he had the promise of land, which he went through and the boundaries are described in Gen. xv. 18.

Stephen says (Acts vii. 5) that he gave him (Abraham) none inheritance in the land, no not so much as to set his foot on: yet he promised that he would give it to him for a possession, and to his seed after him, when as yet he had no child. The inheritance (the kingdom) is with him and with us, his heirs, still a matter of faith and hope, but I trust is soon to be realized.

When the present Gentile governments are subjugated—when the outcasts of Israel and dispersed of Judah (the two sticks) shall become one in the prophet's hand, see Ezek. xxxvii. 15–20, and "when the Lord shall bring again Zion" he will then appear in his glory; until then, we must pray, Thy kingdom come, thy will be done, neither of which at the present time, is an accomplished fact," for what a man seeth why doth he yet hope for?" But if we hope for that which is not seen then do we with patience wait for it. We are, or should be, in the patient waiting for his Son from heaven. "Keep yourselves in the love of God and for the patient waiting for Christ."

Thus we see that the kingdom of God is the great objective point—the goal—the great central point of revelation, and the gospel is the good news—the glad tidings concerning it; for all blessings promised to men, will come to them by or through the kingdom arrangement, and through this channel only. "The kingdom set up in the heart"—the sky kingdom, etc., are myths—are fables, which are at antipodes with the truth—"the word of the kingdom"—"the word of promise and reconciliation." A departure from the faith of the gospel has, as naturally as effect follows cause, brought to the birth modern spiritualism, the worst phase of infidelity. Inherent immortality is another fable, it virtually steals the march to heaven through the agency of death, the king of terrors, which is called by them a friend, and the belief of the consciousness of the dead, (another fable) a contradiction in terms, for there can be no such thing as consciousness in death. But the most common objection, however, urged against our views (which come not altogether from the ignorant as we should naturally suppose, but very often from the highly educated) are that they pender strive, grieve the spirit, etc.

Not contending for the faith once delivered to the saints has opened the floodgates to the errors and fables of these last days.

M. I. LEWIS.

Sententions.

Great truths are often said in the fewest words.

Perseverance is the best school for manly virtue.

What sunshine is to flowers smiles are to humanity.

Great men and geniuses find their true places in times of great events.

Out in the world men show us two sides of their character; by their fireside, only one.

"Lead, kindly Light, amid the encircling gloom—
Lead thou me on.
The night is dark, and we are far from home—
Lead thou me on."

True Christianity neither takes us from the world, nor puts God at a distance from us, in close contact and perfect harmony with each other, when the one is reverently loved and the other innocently used and enjoyed.

There is no life so humble that, if it be true and genuinely human and obedient to God, it may not hope to shed some of its light. There is no life so meagre that the greatest and wisest of us can afford to despise it. We cannot know at what moment it may flash forth with the life of God.—Phillips Brooks.

Doubts and fears may cloud our reason
While we journey here below,
But in the appointed season
God has promised we shall know
All that seemed so dark and dim;
Till then—let us trust in him.
—George O. Campbell.

Christian faith is not a mere continuation or extension of natural religion, nor is it a system of religious truth which may be reached by, or is on a level with our natural religion. It is above the level of natural religion. It is revealed by the Spirit. —James M. Hoppin.

Theological essays may discuss doctrines as abstractions; sermons should discuss them as vital truths, as truths that quicken the soul into energy and impel it to action. But one of the perplexities of the young preacher is to know how to handle the great doctrines of Christianity.

BE PREPARED.

No man knows what a day may bring forth; what miseries, what good or what evil, what afflictions, what temptations, what liberty, what bonds, what good success; and, therefore, a man need every day be in the closet with God, that he may be prepared and fitted to entertain and improve all the occurrences, successes and emergencies that may attend him in the course of his life.

Remember the years at God's right hand,
Oh and broken heart!
Look forward to the better land,
Where love and death must part.
Remember the glorious years,
Enshrined by farewell tears,
When love and hope shall stand
Secure at God's right hand.

James Vick, the well-known florist and seedman, of Rochester, N. Y., died yesterday of pneumonia. He was 63 years of age, and was born at Portsmouth, Eng. He was a playmate of Charles Dickens, and came to this country in 1833, and set type with Horace Greeley on the Knickerbocker. He subsequently became editor of the Genesee Farmer and Horticulturist, and was for a long time Secretary of the American Pomological Society, and member of the Royal Horticultural Society. He went into the seed business, and was one of the most charitable of men. It is reported that his gifts averaged $100,000 yearly. During the Kansas grasshopper plague he sent $25,000 worth of seed to the sufferers, and sent $10,000 to Michigan sufferers.

OBITUARY.

DIED—At Lacrange, Wis., on Wednesday, April 12, 1882, Clarissa J. Hastings, aged 31 years, 1 month, and 12 days.

Our sister had been a great sufferer for the past year, having overdone herself during the sickness and death of their only son; her sickness terminated in hemorrhage of the lungs, and death was sudden. She united with the little church at Tunnel City about ten years ago, and has been a constant attendant while in health. We deeply feel our loss, and sympathize with our bereaved brother and the three little daughters. A large concourse of friends were present at the funeral and listened to a discourse by the writer.

JEWISH NOTES.

BISHOP RYLE ON THE JEWS.

The Bishop of Liverpool writes: "I have read the accounts of the horrible treatment which the Jews have lately received in some parts of Russia with grief and indignation. I could not have believed that in the nineteenth century such atrocities could possibly have been perpetrated in any Christian country. I have always regarded the Jewish nation with the deepest interest. I cannot forget that the world owes a debt to them which can never be repaid and of which we do not realize the value. However much we may regret that their faith is not the same as ours, I am quite certain that they are the last people on earth who ought to be persecuted by Christians. I am confident from my reading of unfulfilled prophecy in the Old Testament that there is a great future before the Jewish nation, and that a day will come when they will be a blessing to the world. In the meantime, I desire always to treat them with the utmost kindness, courtesy, and charity, and I abhor the very idea of their persecution. I cannot bring myself to believe that the Russian Government is aware of all that has happened or thoroughly grasps the feeling of abhorrence with which the recent events in some of the Czar's dominions are regarded throughout the civilized world. I trust, however, that all Christian men in England will raise a loud cry of remonstrance, and enter a moral protest against the treatment to which so many unhappy Jews have been subjected. In that protest I desire most heartily to join."

Palestine is about the size of Massachusetts, 140 miles in length and 40 in average breadth. On the very frontier of the East, it is hemmed in between the Mediterranean Sea on the one hand, and the enormous trench of the Jordan Valley on the other, by which it is effectually cut off from the mainland of Asia behind it. On the north it is shut in by the high ranges of the Lebanon and anti-Lebanon, and by the Litany which runs at their feet and forms the main drain of their southern slopes. On the south it is no less enclosed by the arid and inhospitable deserts of the upper part of the peninsula of Sinai, whose undulating wastes melt into the southern hills of Judea. A small slip of country indeed, proportioned to its moral and historical position, as the theatre of the most momentous events in the world's history! And, let me add, destined to be the great central figure on the Map and in the History of the Future!—Bostonian.

Dr. Black, of the Free High Church, Inverness, has given a number of lectures descriptive of a recent visit to the Holy Land. In his concluding lecture he said: In looking back over his travels in Palestine and Syria, he was struck with the richness of the land, but lamented its utterly neglected condition. It was waiting for a people. Since he had been there thousands of acres between Joppa and Jerusalem had been purchased, on which to found a Jewish colony, and at present there were indications that things were hastening towards a fulfillment of the promise that the chosen people should once more occupy their inheritance. The persecution of the Jews in Russia, Germany, and Austria might be followed yet by persecution in other countries; and when the day of universal flight should come, Palestine was there with outstretched hands—rich and beautiful—ready to receive them.

A deeply interesting letter appeared in the Times of the 15th inst., from Mr. Laurence Oliphant, who has for some years been occupied with the condition of the Jews, and especially with a colonization scheme on their behalf. He says, "the dominant idea of the Eastern Jew is to return to Palestine." This feeling is not, he says, confined to the poorer classes. Successful farming operations are now carried on near Lydda, and eighty industrious Jewish families have settled there. Jews write from Roumania—"It is our fixed resolve to emigrate to the land of our fathers." A letter dated from Jerusalem, Jan. 27, says: "The movement for emigration to this country appears to extend more and more in Russia."—The Christian, London.

A new Hebrew sect has just sprung up at Odessa, called New Israel. The members reject the explanations by rabbis of Babylon and Jerusalem of the Laws of Moses. They only admit as holy the Pentateuch of Moses in its literal sense. They recognize as the first working day of the week Monday, and, not wishing to oppose Christian opinion, celebrate the Sabbath on Sunday. Resting upon a verse of the Bible, in which Moses acknowledges the right of future generations to alter religious ceremonies according to the spirit of the times, the New Israel suppresses the ceremony of circumcision of children, which they consider dangerous for feeble or weak infants; instead of this, on the eighth day after the birth of the child a short prayer is read, by which the little child is received in the bosom of the New Israel. The new sect also suppresses the obligation for the Hebrew Talmudists to write the Pentateuch on parchment rolls, and they recognize as good re-printing in vellum books with the old Hebrew letters, "Jehovah, elohei Israel" (Jehovah, God of Israel). Every member of the sect has a right to kill birds and animals, and to feed on the flesh of animals killed by Christians. All the historical and Hebrew feasts are celebrated, excepting those added by the Talmudists. The half feasts are also celebrated. Every member of the New Israel acknowledges the country in which he lives, and uses it in family life. The members are forbidden to exercise the profession of money lenders and usurers. All efforts are to be made to induce the Russian Government to acknowledge the legality of the sect and to get some immunities for it. From the day of the legalization of the sect, for a whole year, the members will bind themselves to give to their new-born infants the name of Alexander or Alexandra, in honor of the Emperor. The Government will be asked to grant all the rights of citizenship to the members of the new sect, and to allow marriages between the New Israelites and Christians. The New Israelites, to show their independence from the Talmudists, will ask the permission of the Government to wear a special sign to distinguish them from the other Hebrews.

CORONATION OF THE CZAR AGAIN POSTPONED.

LONDON, May 22.—A dispatch from Tilsit states that at a council of the Russian Imperial family at the Peterhof palace it was decided, because of the receipt of alarming information touching the project of the Nihilists, to defer the coronation of the Czar for one year.

It is rough work that polishes. Look at the pebbles on the shore! Far inland, where some arm of the sea thrusts itself deep into the bosom of the land, and expanding into a salt lock, lies girdled by the mountains, sheltered from the storms that agitate the deep, the pebbles on the beach are rough, not beautiful; angular, not rounded. It is where long, white lines of breakers roar and the shingle is rolled about the strand, that its pebbles are rounded and polished. As in nature, as in art, so in grace—it is rough treatment that gives souls, as well as stones, their lustre. The more the diamond is cut, the brighter it sparkles; and in what seems hard dealing there God has no end in view but to perfect his people.—Dr. Guthrie.

Christ and the Dying Thief.

He (Christ) did influence the dying thief, though that influence was indirect. Indirect influence is often far more successful than that which is direct: and for this reason, the direct aims that we make to convert others may be contradicted by our lives, while the indirect influence of our very life, What we really are, somehow or other, will come out, in tone, in look, in act, and this falls upon those who come in daily contact with us. The law of personal influence is mysterious. The influence of the Son of God told on the one thief, not on the other; it softened and touched the hearts of two of his hearers, but it only hardened others. There is much to be learned from this, for some are disposed to write bitter things against themselves because their influence on earth has failed. Let all such remember that some are too pure to act universally on others. If our influence has failed, the Redeemer's was not universal.—Robertson, of Brighton.

Free Bible Meeting.

There will be a free Bible meeting held at the Decker School House, Millbrook, Mich., beginning June 16, and continuing over Sunday. Two sessions of Bible Class daily for questions, answers and investigation. Two sermons daily, with prayer, conference, and praise meetings. Careful and thorough papers on the following subjects will be presented: The second coming of the Lord, R. Bailey; Manner of his coming, Dr. E. B. Tucker; Objects of his coming, O. T. White; The Restitution—what does it include? O. R. L. Crozier; Israel in the next age, and the Nations in the next age, B. Woodward; Rulership, O. R. L. Crozier; Eternal Life, L. Bower; Immortality, C. A. Meade; The Church—its nature, mission, and final triumph, John Bower. The whole in the spirit of Christian candor and devout loyalty to Christ, seeking to know the truth for its own sake and for the character it makes. An address of welcome will be given by O. R. L. Crozier, pastor of Millbrook Church.

THE FIRST FLOWERS.

BY ROSANA WISE.

Up you deep wood, just over the fields and near
The rosy, eastern east, roll off my feet
With wistful eagerness have flown, when first
In spring-time again, the south wind's cheering breath
Was felt upon my cheek. There, like a child
My merry heels have plucked for green, soft sides
Of tufted grass, and gathered more than feet
Of plant there, or tufted, of rarely bottled leaves.
Fair garlands for the children made: the buds
Of beech, the tags of oak, the chaplet of tassel hues,
Of vine and maple, coming into leaf:
And wakened insects, so their happy wings
Adorn, filling the air with melodiousness of song.
And busy birds, with cheerful beaks at work,
Making for eye and ear, the artful scene
Of happiness, all the we have self enjoyed:
Then, hastening on, the cascade's banks have reached,
For there, sweet things, with eyes that beamed,
as orbs
Of heavenly brought beam, did look in gladness forth.
The lily sweet, and fair Cupid's pink racemes,
While close beside the water's edge, bright buds,
In colors of light, did shine. These I have filled
My hands with starry flowers, the adherent moss
And numerous children of the wood. These oft
My lips have pressed the lovely things, and I
Have shed glad tears for this, dear God.
—My mind, to repaired my life to look on these again!

LETTERS ON THE RESURRECTION. No. 5.

WM. C. TAYLOR.

The 15th chapter of 1 Corinthians contains the apostle Paul's full reply to the twofold question, "How are the dead raised up, and with what body do they come?" The substance of that reply, and how it was to be understood, has already been discussed at sufficient length—all therefore that remains to be done is to see how far Paul's doctrine here is consistent with his doctrine elsewhere, and in harmony with the teachings of his fellow apostles, and their common Master Jesus Christ. This will be the subject of the present letter.

Conclusive as Paul's reply seems to be, amounting as it certainly does to positive proof—something more may be added to its convincing force by showing that it does not, as is sometimes charged, occupy an isolated place on the pages of the New Testament. From all we can learn, resurrection from the dead was a subject the pagan mind could but barely contemplate with patience. We know it was mocked at by the philosophers of Athens, and that it passed current among the wise of that day as incredible, seems beyond question. This may in part account for the feeble hold which this doctrine seems to have taken upon the minds of the first converts to Christianity in the cities of Greece. It is at least worthy of note that faith in a resurrection from the dead had little root in either Corinth or Thessalonica. In the former we find positive unbelief, and in the latter a faith so feeble that it sorrowed for the dead without hope. At Corinth the unbelief was positive it not aggressive, at Thessalonica hope died in the absence of a sustaining faith. The same cause had produced a common evil with the simple difference that it took, possibly from local causes, a more aggravated form at one place than the other.

The 15th chapter of 1 Corinthians is the direct result of this condition of things in the Corinthian church. It is Paul's argument for a resurrection. How the dead are raised up, and with what body they come. Our immediate object is to test the consistency of the apostle's doctrine, and seeing an almost parallel though less pronounced state of unbelief existed at Thessalonica, we naturally inquire if the doctrine of the resurrection he taught there was the same as that set forth to the Corinthians. That the two accounts of this event may be readily compared we place them side by side.

"Behold, I shew you a mystery; We shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump: for the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed." 1 Cor. xv. 51, 52.

"The Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God: and the dead in Christ shall rise first. Then we which are alive and remain, shall be caught up together with them in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air: and so shall we ever be with the Lord." 1 Thess. iv. 16, 17.

Here we have two different accounts of the resurrection. They are so much alike that they can readily be detected as the work of one mind. The picture in each case is identical, except in the matter of details, which in view of the somewhat different position which had to be met, are varied accordingly. In no case is there the slightest contradiction, instead, one account supplements and supports the other, so that, just as we get the best view of our Lord's life from the combined histories of the four evangelists, by putting the account in Thessalonians and Corinthians together we have a more complete view of the resurrection, and its details than could be had from either separately.

The special difficulty with the Thessalonians was caused by the death of some of their brethren whom they counted as lost, and sorrowed for them as those having no hope. Paul, just as he did for the Corinthians, first cleared away the misconception by assuring them the living would gain no advantage over the dead, and then to shew clearly how this could be, he gave them the picture of the resurrection and its details which we have quoted above.

In comparing the view given to the Corinthians with that given to the Thessalonians, it will readily be seen that there is no mention of any change to immortality in the latter. Instead, we are informed, that upon the rising of the dead in Christ, they, along with the living, are caught up to meet the Lord and to ever after abide with him. This is equivalent to the statement, that the dead shall be raised incorruptible, for it is clearly impossible to show space in one case to the other for a tribunal having life and death in its hands. To be ever with the Lord necessarily implies immortality—when that will be gained is at the sound of the last trumpet, for the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we (the living) shall be changed. 1 Cor. xv. 52. Then all shall be caught up together in the clouds, "to meet the Lord in the air: and so shall we ever be with the Lord." 1 Thess. iv. 17. This is Paul's view of the resurrection, and the events immediately succeeding. A single picture of the event gathered from two different sources, and presenting a more complete unity and harmony could not be found. It shows Paul had but one idea of the resurrection, and that a very clear one. He drew upon it to meet the particular difficulties of the Corinthians and Thessalonians, and the two accounts only vary in so far as the difficulties to be met varied, and required a slightly different treatment.

Such an agreement as this makes a case of impregnable strength for the truth we are advocating, but the testimony for it does not even begin or end with the apostle to the Gentiles. Christ had already told the unbelieving Sadducees, in answer to a question about the resurrection, "The children of this world marry, and are given in marriage; but they who shall be accounted worthy to obtain that world, and the resurrection from the dead, neither marry nor are given in marriage; neither can they die any more: for they are equal unto the angels; and are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection." Luke xx. 34-36.

In this passage we find at least two clear proofs of the doctrine we have been contending for.

1. They who are accounted worthy to obtain . . . the resurrection from the dead . . . cannot die any more.

2. "For they are equal unto the angels; and are the children of God."

If they cannot die any more, then they must be immortal, and no less can be said of those who are equal unto the angels. But note also all the connection of the words. "They who are accounted worthy to obtain that world, and the resurrection from the dead cannot die any more." When will the accounting that is to find them worthy of that resurrection take place? Before or after the event? If, after, then we are trying an immortal for his life, hence the accounting must take place previous to the resurrection, for that as the text tells us depends upon being found worthy. And so we find that Christ in saying that those accounted worthy to obtain that resurrection, could not die any more, were equal unto the angels, and were the children of God being the children of the resurrection, was simply teaching the Sadducees the same truth. Paul taught the Corinthians when he said, "It is sown a natural body, it is raised a spiritual body."

But again we find Christ saying through his servant John, "Blessed and holy is he that hath part in the first resurrection: on such the second death hath no power, but they shall be priests of God and of Christ and shall reign with him a thousand years." Rev. xx. 6.

No one can be a subject of the first resurrection without having a part in it. To have part in that rising is to be "blessed" and "holy," free from the second death, made priests of God and of Christ, and have the honor and glory of reigning with him for a thousand years. Surely if those having part in this resurrection cannot feel the power of the second death, and are besides "blessed" and "holy," they must be immortal in this rising of life. No other could be called blessed and holy or reign with Christ a thousand years. Thus we find Jesus and Paul using the same language to express the same truth, and that truth the immortality of the resurrection body

THY KINGDOM COME.

Behold the morn is fast upon the night,
Along the Eastern sky;
Behold yon rosy mountain-tops,
Messiah's reign is nigh.

Ye captives from the prison of
Why stay ye in your chains?
Jerusalem, long has it sat in Shall it no longer be so?

Arise, and raise your light to meet
Thy bright and glorious morn;
The time for thy deliverance,
A long-expected day.

The greatest glory of the holy earth,
Ye sons of Israel, shall
Be seen from Zion your living head,
Upon the chosen mount.

CONSTANTINOPLE AND THE PAPACY.
No. III.

Greek Empire Feared. Professed Christianity. Practised Pagan Customs. Its Relationship with the Latin Empire. Its Intimacy with that Power. Form of Government. In its Religion, Its Peculiar Power. Greek Fire.

J. B. WEETHEE.

The Greek empire, whose foundation was laid by Constantine the Great, commenced at Byzantium, in the Thracian division of the empire of Alexander and his successors. Under Arcadius it was separated from the Latin empire. It then occupied the territory occupied during its former time, under Alexander and his successors. It continued a part of the Roman empire five hundred and fifty-eight years, to the partition of the empire by Theodosius the Great to his two sons, Arcadius and Honorius A. D. 360. From that time till the 29th of May, 1453, it was the Greek empire of their "latter time."

During this period of 1093 years it is called the empire of the East, or Greek empire; the one in Italy, and Western Europe, is named the empire of the West, or Latin empire, the Greek empire speaking the Greek language; while the Latin empire used the Latin language. Each had its distinct territories, its capital, its emperor, senate: civil officers and its distinctive national interests. They professed, however, one common religion.

The Eastern or Grecian, and Western, or Latin provinces had one government; one religion; and one political policy, for 556 years: though, having more than two centuries they were being educated for two distinct nations. Owing to the incursions of the German barbarians which overthrew the Western empire, A. D. 476, many of the nobility and men of letters fled to the New Rome, Constantinople. The Eastern empire, therefore, became the seat of learning. The arts and sciences fled to their Grecian home. These facts give us a knowledge of Grecian character in the latter time of their kingdom: also they account for the ultimate friendship existing between the Eastern and Western empires. As to their religion: the Western was the mother church, and obeyed as such.

The Greek empire had a mixed religious character. Its founder (Constantine the Great) was (by profession) a Christian, yet he was at the same time the high priest of Paganism. So were its seven first emperors, to the time of Gratian, A. D. 384. Constantine, in the Christian congregation, took his seat as a private member; but among the Pagan priests, the law still made him their sovereign Pontiff. The empire was, at heart, Pagan; though outwardly, Christian. Its power, civil and ecclesiastical, had the outward show of Christianity, yet, at heart (formed of the Pagan mass) its language was Pagan. In the nature of things, it could not be otherwise. The empire had outwardly become Christian; but, can we suppose that its early education and modes of thought had ceased?

Can the Ethiopian change his skin, or the leopard his spots? more readily than that the nation could suddenly change from the extreme paganism of one thousand years' standing to the quiet religion of Jesus of Nazareth. It was outwardly, Christian: inwardly, Pagan.

The Grecian empire exercised all the elements of power which existed in the Italia empire; differing only in degree. The civil powers were equal. They were varied in detail, simply to conform to the specialities of their Eastern and Western localities.

The churches were both, in name, Christian; both had similar officers: differing, however, in the name of their chief presiding officer: also in their powers. The presiding officer of the Eastern church was the Patriarch of Constantinople, or New Rome; while the presiding officer of the Western church was the Bishop of Old Rome: first called Pope, A. D. 128.

For many centuries they seemed to exercise nearly equal powers. For a time, in the process of episcopacy, the Christian universal establishment appeared to be under the control of two equal heads.

The dispute for the primacy continued for many years. It was finally decided in favor of the Pope of Rome, who, in a few years, became a temporal prince. Grecian emperors established this supremacy. Justinian made the Bishop of Rome the head of the church, and the rightful corrector of heretics. Phocas, Emperor of the East, instigated by Pope Boniface III., and in consequence of his dislike, personal, of the Patriarch of Constantinople still further established the Roman Bishop's supremacy over the Christian church. The Greek empire therefore erected the formation and establishment of the Papal Hierarchy. By the Eastern empire the papacy was legalized. In the pretended grant of Constantine, the elder, the Papacy of the Popes had its origin.

One antithetic power of the Greek empire requires particular description. Since it was concealed, by the people tumultuous. The wonderful phenomena of this power were to the ancients. Our first account taken from The Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire by Gibbon. As the subject is of interest, we shall transcribe his principal words.

In the twenty-first year of the reign of Constantine (as may be clearly ascertained to the month), the Persians and the real efficacy of the Greek fire. The important secret of compounding and directing this artificial flame was imparted by Callinicus, a native of Heliopolis in Syria, (A. D. 668) who deserted from the service of the caliph to that of the emperor. The skill of a chemist and engineer was equivalent to the success of fleets and armies: and this discovery or improvement of the military art was fortunately reserved for the distressful period, when the degenerate Romans of the East were incapable of contending with the warlike enthusiasm and youthful vigor of the Saracens. The historian who presumes to analyze this extraordinary composition should suspect his own ignorance and that of Byzantine guides so prone to the marvellous, so careless, and, in this instance, so jealous of the truth. From their obscure, and perhaps fallacious, hints it should seem that the principal ingredients of the Greek fire was the naphtha, or liquid bitumen, a light, tenacious, inflammable oil, which springs from the earth, and catches fire as soon as it comes in contact with the air. The naphtha was mingled, I know not by what methods, and in what proportions, with sulphur and with pitch that is extracted from evergreen firs. From this mixture, which produced a thick smoke and a loud explosion, proceeded a fierce and obstinate flame, which not only rose in perpendicular ascent, but likewise burn with equal vehemence in descent or lateral progress; instead of being extinguished it was nourished and quickened by the element of water, and sand, urine, or vinegar, were the only remedies that could damp the fury of this powerful agent, which was justly denominated by the Greeks the liquid, or the maritime fire. For the annoyance of the enemy, it was employed with equal effect, by sea and land, in battles or in sieges. It was either poured, from the ramparts in large boilers, or launched in red-hot balls of stone and iron, or darted in arrows and javelins, twisted round with flax and tow, which had deeply imbibed the inflammable oil: sometimes it was deposited in fire-ships, the victims and instrument of a more ample revenge, and was most commonly thrown through long tubes of copper which were planted on the prow of a galley, and fancifully shaped into the mouths of savage monsters, that seemed to vomit a stream of liquid and consuming fire. This important art was preserved at Constantinople, as the palladium of the state: the galleys and artillery might occasionally be lent to the allies of Rome; but the composition of the Greek fire was concealed with the most jealous scrupulo, and the terror of the enemies was increased and prolonged by their ignorance and surprise. In the treaties of the administration of the empire, the royal author suggests the answers and excuses that might best elude the indiscrete curiosity and importunate demands of the barbarians. They should be told that the mystery of the Greek fire had been revealed by an angel to the first and greatest of the Constantines, with a sacred injunction, that this gift of Heaven, this peculiar blessing of the Romans, should never be communicated to any foreign nation; that the prince and subject were alike bound to religious silence under the temporal and spiritual penalties of treason and sacrilege; and that the impious attempt would provoke the sudden and supernatural vengeance of the God of the Christians. By these precautions, the secret was confined, about four hundred years, to the Romans (Greeians) of the East; and at the eleventh century, the Pisans to whom every sea and every art were familiar, suffered the effects, without understanding the composition, of the Greek fire. It was at length either discovered or stolen by the Mahometans; and, in the holy wars of Syria and Egypt, they retorted an invention, contrived against themselves, on the heads of the Christians. A knight, who despised the swords and lances of the Saracens, relates, with heartfelt sincerity, his own fears, and those of his companions, at the sight and sound of the mischievous engine that discharged a torrent of the Greek fire, the feu Gregeois, as it is styled by the more early of the French writers. It came flying through the air, says Joinville, like a winged long-tailed dragon, about the thickness of a hogshead, with the report of thunder, and the velocity of lightning; and the darkness of night was dispelled by this deadly illumination. The use of the Greek fire continued till the middle of the fourteenth century, when powder and fire-arms took its place. For four centuries it was a Greek sign or wonder.

1. Gibbon calls the Greek fire the Palladium, or safe-guard of the Grecian empire.

2. It secured the Greek nationality for centuries longer than it would otherwise have continued: its wonders producing fear and dismay among its enemies. They considered it of Divine origin.

3. It was a great national leader or miracle worker.

4. It was, for many centuries, a symbol, or sign of supremacy.

The Greek empire gave political and ecclesiastical life to the Papal hierarchy. This is a matter of plain historic record, to be fully convinced of that fact, we are required simply to read the past histories of these powers.

One other point deserves attention: the position of the Greek empire relative to the future final struggle.

a. The Greek Empire is not in that conflict; nor is the two-horned beast there. The dragon (Pagan rulers), the beast: the seven headed and ten horned beast of Rev. xiii. and xvii. are there: also, a political power headed by hierarchy of the False Prophet. These three bodies of civil rulers. History informs us that on the 29th of May, 1453, the Greek empire (in the latter time of her Kingdom) passed under the dominion of the Mahometan empire, which is truly a, if not the, false prophet.

Let the reader compare (as we have done) John's two-horned beast with the Greek empire, and adopt that view that seems to be sustained by the prophecy itself. Let him trace the three great national systems to the final battle; and if he finds that the two-horned beast and the Greek empire are not there, let him acknowledge their substitute.

ORIENTAL SKETCHES.—No. 15.

Bashan and Its Giant Cities.

J. L. PORTER, A. M.

The keep is a huge square tower, rising high above the battlements, and overlooking the plains of Bashan and Moab. From it I saw that Bozrah was in ancient times connected by a series of great highways with the leading cities and districts in Bashan and Arabia. They diverge from the city in straight lines; and my eye followed one after another till it disappeared in the far distance. One ran westward to the town of Ghusam, and then to Edrei; another northward to Suweideh and Damascus; another northwest, up among the mountains of Bashan; another to Kerioth; and another eastward, straight as an arrow, to the castle of Salcah, which crowned a conical hill on the horizon. Towns and villages appeared in every direction, thickly dotting the vast plain; a few of those to the north are inhabited, but all those southward have been deserted for centuries. I examined them long and carefully with my telescope, and their walls and houses appeared to be in even better preservation than those I had already visited. This has since been found to be the case, for my friend Mr Cyril Graham visited them, penetrating this wild and dangerous country as far as Um el Jemal, the Beth-gamul of Scripture which I saw from Bozrah, and to which I called his special attention. Beth-gamul is unquestionably one of the most remarkable places east of the Jordan. It is as large as Bozrah. It is surrounded by high walls, and contains many massive houses built of huge blocks of basalt; their roofs and doors, and even the gates of the city, being formed of the same material. Though deserted for many centuries, the houses, streets, walls, and gates are in as perfect preservation as if the city had been inhabited until within the last few years. It is curious to note the change that has taken place in the name. What the Hebrews called "The house of the vessel," the Arabs now call "The mother of the camel."

I cannot tell how deeply I was impressed when looking out over that noble plain, rivalling in riches any but the best of England's counties, thickly studded with cities, towns, and villages, intersected with roads, having one of the finest climates in the world, and yet utterly deserted, literally "without man, without inhabitant, and without beast." Isa. xxvii. 10. I cannot tell with what mingled feelings of sorrow and of joy, of mourning and of thanksgiving, of fear and of faith, I reflected on the history of that land; and taking out my Bible compared its existing state, as seen with my own eyes, with the numerous predictions regarding it written by the Hebrew prophets. In their day it was populous and prosperous; the fields waved with corn; the hillsides were covered with flocks and herds; the highways were thronged with wayfarers; the cities resounded with the continuous din of busy occupation. And yet they wrote as if they had seen the land as I saw it from the ramparts of Bozrah. The Spirit of the omniscient God alone could have guided those holy men as they penned such predictions as these: "Then said I, Lord, how long? And he answered, Until the cities be wasted without inhabitant, and the houses without man, and the land be utterly desolate, and the Lord hath removed men far away, and there be a great forsaking in the midst of the land." Isa. vi. 11, 12. "The destroyer of the Gentiles is on his way; he is gone forth from his place to make thy land desolate; and thy cities shall be laid waste without an inhabitant." Jer. iv. 7.

In former times a garrison was maintained in the castle of Bozrah by the Pasha of Damascus, for the purpose of defending the southern sections of Bashan from the periodical incursions of the Bedawin. It has been withdrawn for many years. The "avengers of the Gentiles" can now come up unrestrained. "The spoilers" can now "come upon all high places through the wilderness;" the sword now "devours from the one end of the land even to the other end of the land" Jer. xii. 12; the cities are "without inhabitant," the houses are "without man, the land is "utterly desolate," judgment has come upon it all far and near in a war"; the whole of Bashan and Moab is one great fulfilled prophecy.

We were conducted by our intelligent guide to a large church, apparently the ancient cathedral of Bozrah. It is built in the form of a Greek cross, and on the walls of the chancel are some remains of rude frescoes, representing saints and angels. Over the door is an inscription stating that the church was founded "by Julianus, archbishop of Bostra, in the year A. M. 613, in honor of the blessed martyrs Sergius, Bacchus, and Leontius." Our guide called the building "the church of the monk Bohira;" and a very old tradition represents this monk as playing an important part in the early history of Mohammedanism. It is said he was a native of this city, and that being expelled from his convent, he joined the Arabian prophet, and aided in writing the Koran, supplying all those stories from the Bible, the Talmud, and the spurious Gospels, which make up so large a part of that remarkable book.

Not far from the church is the principal mosque, built, it is said, by the Khalif Omar. The roof was supported on colonnades, like the early basilicas; and seventeen of the columns are monoliths of white marble, of great beauty. Two of them have inscriptions showing that they formerly belonged to some church, but probably they were originally intended to ornament a Greek temple.

We extended our walk one day to the suburbs on the north and west, where there are remains of some large and splendid buildings. We then proceeded to the west gate, at the end of the main street. The ancient pavement of the street, and of the road which runs across the plain to Ghusam, is quite perfect,—not a stone out of place. The gate has a single but spacious Roman arch, ornamented with pilasters and niches. Outside is a guard-house of the same style and period. Sitting down on the inclined wall of this little building I gazed long on the ruins of the city, and on the vast deserted plain. My companions had taken shelter from a shower in a vacant niche; and now there was not a human being, there was not a sign of life, within the range of vision. The open gate revealed heaps of rubbish and piles of stones, and shattered walls. In the distance a solitary column stood here and there, and the triumphal arch which rose over all around it, appeared as if built to celebrate the triumph of desolation. The desolation of the plain without was as complete as that of the city within. Never before had I seen such a picture of utter, terrible desolation, except at Palmyra; and even there it was not so remarkable. That "city of the desert" might rise and flourish for a season, while the tide of commerce was rolling past it; and while it stood a solitary oasis on the desert highway uniting the eastern and western worlds; but on the opening up of some other channel of communication, it might naturally decline and fall. Bozrah is altogether different. It was situated in the midst of a fertile plain, in the centre of a populous province. It had abundance of resources, fountains of water, an impregnable fortress. Why should Bozrah become desolate? Who would have ventured to predict its ruin? It surely was no city to grow up in a day and fade in a night. It surely did not depend for prosperity on the changeable channel of commerce! Something above and beyond mere natural causes and influences must have operated here. We can only understand its strange history when we read it in the light of prophecy. Then we can see the impress of a mightier than human hand. We can see that the curse of an angry God for the sin of a rebellious people has fallen upon Bozrah, "and upon all the cities of the land of Moab far and near." Jer. xlviii. 24.

Two Bozrahs are mentioned in the Bible. One was in Edom, and is referred to in the well-known passage, "Who is this that cometh from Edom, with dyed garments from Bozrah?" Isa. lxiii. 1. Upon this ancient city judgments are pronounced in connection with Edom and Teman, whose inhabitants dwelt "in the clefts of the rocks," and the "heights of the hills," and made their houses "like the nests of the eagles." Jer. xlix. 7–22. When pronouncing judgment upon Moab, the same prophet says, "Judgment is come upon the plain country," and he names the cities which stood in the plain, and among them are Beth-gamul, Kerioth, and Bozrah. Jer. xlviii. 21–24. Evidently these predictions cannot refer to the same place. Another fact still more conclusively establishes this point. After committing the sentence of Moab including one Bozrah, the Spirit of God adds, "Yet will I bring again the captivity of Moab in the latter days" Jer. xlviii. 47; whereas in Edom's doom we have these terrible words, "For I have sworn by myself, saith the Lord, that Bozrah shall become a desolation, a reproach, a waste, and a curse; and all the cities thereof shall be perpetual wastes." Jer. xlix. 13.*

The plain of Moab embraced a large part of the plateau east of the Dead Sea and the Jordan. A short time before the exodus the Amorites conquered the northern part of that plain; and from them it was taken by the tribes of Reuben and Gad. It is doubtful whether the Moabites were ever completely expelled. They probably retired for a time to the desert, and when Israel's power declined, returned to their old possessions. The predictions of Jeremiah refer to cities once held by the Israelites, yet in his days belonging to Moab; he includes Bozrah in the land of Moab. Subsequently, Bozrah became the capital of a large Roman province; then the metropolitan city of Eastern Palestine, when its primate had thirty-three bishops under him; then it was captured by the Mohammedans, and gradually fell to ruin. Now we can see that the prophet's words are fulfilled, "Judgment has come upon Bozrah."

*Modern research in this, as in many other cases, has confirmed the accuracy of Biblical topography. The Bozrah of Edom has been identified with the village of Buseirah, among the mountains north of Petra; and here, in the plain, we have the the Bozrah of Moab. I was somewhat surprised recently to find that the writer of the article "Bozrah," in "Kitto's Dictionary of the Bible," charges me with holding the opinion of Kitto and others, that Bozrah of Edom, Bozrah of Moab, and modern Buseirah, are identical. I never held such an opinion. I have always affirmed, that Bozrah of Edom and Bozrah of Moab were distinct cities; and had the writer of the article published turned to my "Five Years in Damascus," vol. ii. p. 100, or to my "Handbook," or to the article "Bozrah" in the last edition of "Kitto's Cyclopedia," he would have seen this.

The Quarterly Assembly of the Church of God, will commence Friday evening before the fourth Sunday in May, which will be May 26 in a grove near Bro. John J. Spaid's, Hampshire Co., Va. All the brethren and people in general are respectfully invited to be present.

Brevities.

The new Himalayan railway in India is nearly 8,000 feet above the sea, and is fifty miles long. It presents the unusual characteristics in its construction of mounting gradients of one in twenty-one and curves of several feet radius.

The other day, on the first anniversary of the Earl of Beaconsfield's death, Queen Victoria forwarded two wreaths—one of immortelles and one of primroses, which were his favorite flowers—to be deposited on his grave at Hughenden. A most remarkable demonstration was shown by the members of the Stock Exchange, more than two thousand of whom wore primroses in their buttonholes in token of regard to the memory of the Earl of Beaconsfield. At the sitting of the House of Commons several of the Conservative members adopted the same memorial sign.

The emigration of the Jews to Palestine is now a prominent topic among statesmen as well as in religious circles. The London correspondent of the New York World says: "The whole of the Jews of southern Russia are possessed with an enthusiasm for emigration to the Holy Land. Deputations arrive every day to confer with Mr Oliphant, but as the Russian Government prohibits the emigration of many hundreds of thousands of roubles are ready, it is not safe to place them anywhere. The government also takes care that no rich Hebrew shall leave the country. Consequently great practical difficulties attend this remarkable exodus. The last news is a discouraging report. The Sultan of Turkey is opposed to any further emigration to the Holy Land. Mr. Oliphant has left Lemberg and has gone to confer with the Palestine committees at Yassy, Galatz, and Bucharest. He then will go to Constantinople to see the Sultan.

CARLISLE ON DARWINISM.

Mr. Carlyle happened to be present when a number of so-called philosophers and scientific men were airing their opinions. The theory of evolution had been asserted with much confidence, and under the supposition that he was a sympathizer, and not at all fettered by religious scruples, he was challenged to deliver his opinion as to Darwinism. Gathering himself up, and speaking in a tone that silenced laughter, Mr. Carlyle replied—"Gentlemen, you make a man a little higher than the tadpoles. I hold with the prophet David—Thou madest him a little lower than the angels.

GIBRALTAR'S CURIOUS SHAKING ROCK.

One of the main points of interest here is an eccentric freak of nature known as Shaking Rock, and never a stranger comes to Lexington and leaves without some of the people—proud always of their village and all about it—showing him this place. I cannot better describe it than by saying it is the oddest thing any one ever saw. In the rear of the home of the late Governor Gilmer is a huge bowlder standing by itself on the edge of a stream. Upon this bowlder is placed another rock, weighing about twenty tons. It rests on a pinnacle not two feet square. So evenly is it balanced that the slightest touch will cause it to rock, and yet a hundred horses could not pull it from its socket. There it had stood for ages subjected to wind and storm unmoved, a silent monument of the power of the Creator.—Crawfordsville Democrat.

THE SUMMIT OF THE EARTH.

Adolphus Schlagintweit, the immortal though unpronounceable explorer of Central Asia, calls the highland of Pamir "die Welt-Zinne"—the roof of the world. On the road from Punjaub to Yarkand four passes have to be crossed that are higher than 17,500 feet, and for a distance of 280 miles the halting ground is not below the height of Pike's Peak. On the eastern plateau of the Beloor Pagh there is a shelter-house near a cliff from whose summit the main chain of the Himalayas, with all its giant peaks and immeasurable ice-fields, is in full view of the highlands of Lassa to the sources of the Indus, while in the West the head-waters of the Oxus and Jaxartes can be traced to the borders of Cabool, where the peaks of the Hindoo-Koosh lift their crests of everlasting snow. In spring the echo of the avalanches resembles the boom of continuous thunder, and in midwinter, when the storm-wind sweeps the tableland, whirling pillars of snow scud along the ridges, and often seem to dance together like spectres in the fluttering winding sheets. Our "land of the sky" in the southern Alleghanies must be a mere piazza compared with that top-roof of the earth.—Popular Science Monthly.

TAKE NOTICE.

By an error on the part of our pressman, we have on hand an extra lot of our four-page tracts, and persons wishing tracts to distribute should avail themselves of this opportunity at once. There are ten four kinds: "Can you believe," "Age to come not a heresy," "State of dead in death," and "Life and death." We will send postpaid 50 copies of these tracts for 20c., or 100 copies for 35c.

We have also just printed a new edition of "A Letter to a Friend," on the covenants of promise, by Mrs. C. C. Woodruff. Single copies 10c., seven for 50c., sixteen for $1.00.

THE COVENANTS.

A TREATISE ON,

I. The Abrahamic covenant, its terms, its extent, its duration, its conditions, and when possessed.

II. The Mosaic covenant, its terms, its relations to the Abrahamic covenant, where given, to whom given, the purpose of the law, its duration and its relations to the Christian and its purposes.

III. The New covenant the covenantors—not the church, but Israel, conditional prophecies still to be fulfilled, restoration from Babylon considered, false restorations, future restoration, our relation to the New covenant as the Seed of the Abrahamic covenant, as the Mediation body, as a Royal and an Eternal Priesthood—now upon the plane of the flesh and soon through resurrection in the image of spirit; restoration of the Aaronical order of priesthood to the house of Judah under the Prince and subordinate to the royal priesthood, the two orders, and the nature of sacrifices in the ages to come.

IV. The Davidian covenant, its terms, the kingdom divided, the kingdom restored, the seed established, the kingdom to be restored under Messiah, the reign eternal.

V. Twelve objections to the position that the kingdom of Christ in organization is yet future, answered, and the law of induction into the kingdom or the birth of the nation and of the spirit.

The Restitution.

"THE RESTITUTION OF ALL THINGS WHICH GOD HATH SPOKEN BY THE MOUTH OF ALL HIS HOLY PROPHETS SINCE THE WORLD BEGAN."

VOL. XXXI. PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, JUNE 7, 1882. NO. 21.

THE RESTITUTION.

TERMS—TWO DOLLARS PER YEAR, Payable in advance. Three and Six Months at the same rate.

Address all letters and communications to The Restitution, Plymouth, Indiana.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

The Restitution advocates the final restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began. As a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as necessary for the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

COMING AGE—ITS PROXIMITY. No. 113.

Summary of the Agents and Events of Rev. xiii. Fourth Beast of Dan. vii. His Family. Civil and Ecclesiastical. Two Horned Beast. Civil and Ecclesiastical Powers. Image. Ecclesiastical Power. How Far Do the Events of this Chapter Extend?

BY J. H. PORTER.

Summary of Rev. xiii. This chapter has been already critically examined. Our object will now be accomplished if we clear its leading features, so that the reader may fully understand our present location on the chart of prophetic history.

The chronology of Rev. xiii. extends from A. D. 538–10 to the judgment of the ancient of days Dan. vii. 8 25. It covers the 3½ times 42 months, or 1260 days prophetic, or 1260 years. It covers the time of Papal domination, and persecutions. It is the sackcloth state of the witnesses: the period during which the saints are persecuted by the little horn of Dan vii., it is the time of his reign. It is the period during which the holy city is trodden down; the wilderness state of the sun-clad woman. It is a most remarkable period. The crowns being on the horns, points to the time of the decem. regal or seventh head. Under the first four trumpets the sixth or imperial head received its deadly wound. The crowns then passed to the ten kings, symbolized by the little horn's brotherhood of ten horns. This period also begins with a change of church relationship, from Paganism to Christianity, and then to Papacy. These changes are symbolized by the various outward garments dragonic, leopard, and scarlet. The family of the first wild beast consists of eleven members.

(a) A brotherhood of ten, and one peculiar in his make, having extra eyes and mouth. This horn exercises civil and ecclesiastical power. This horn is the persecutor and criminal of Dan. vii. His ecclesiastical hierarchy is first judged; that sentence is being executed. This judgment is the chronological key for the proper understanding of prophetic dates. This chapter carries the chronology of Daniel's fourth monarchy to the judgment of the ecclesiastical power of its Papal hierarchy. The 13th. of Rev. sketches the history of two other remarkable agents; the two horned beast, and the image. The two horned beast is older than the image, since it makes the image, or, at least, causes it to be made. The relationship of the two horned beast to the first beast is that of a younger brother. His horns denote one character, (As Isaac said to Jacob, "The voice (is) Jacob's voice, but the hands (are) the hands of Esau,") but his voice, his legislative acts quite another. Outwardly Christian; at heart Pagan. This body of civil rulers was a particular friend to the first beast that received the deadly wound. He was from his birth to his overthrow, contemporary. This is very distinctly demonstrated by all his acts.

This second beast has two descriptive attributes. 1. Its speech. 2. Its two horns. Of the first attribute we have said all that is required, to have the symbol fully understood; but the horns require more thought.

(a) A horn may be a natural attribute of animal; then the word has its literal, ordinary meaning. Such, therefore, must the word always signify, unless its position requires a departure, that departure gives it what is called, a figurative meaning, and is always explained, either in direct connection with the word or in some other part of the Scriptures. When it is said of God, "He had horns coming out of his hand," Hab. iii 4, we look for an explanation, and it follows: "And there (was) the hiding of his power." When Christ is called "A Lamb having seven horns and seven eyes, the interpretion follows Christ was slain like a Lamb; which are the seven Spirits of God sent forth into all the earth." Rev. v. 6. Perfection of power and knowledge.

Three distinct thoughts are named here, 1. that which grows on the head of a literal animal: 2. that which is on the head of symbolic animals, and is an agent; 3. where it is on the head of a symbolic animal, denoting an attribute of the animal but is not an agent.

With the first or literal thought, called here, we have nothing to say, since it is fully understood by everyone. A symbolic horn is either a living agent or simply a descriptive attribute of some being. 2. Symbolic horns are living agents of symbolic beasts, where the beasts themselves are not named. "Then I lifted up mine eyes, and saw, and behold four horns. These (are) the horns that have scattered Judah, Israel, and Jerusalem. But these (four carpenters) are come to fray them, to cast out the horns of the Gentiles, which lifted up (their) horn over the land of Judah to scatter it." Zech. i. 18, 19, 21. These denote the same Gentile powers as in Dan. vii. (see Dan. viii.) where the beasts are named, and the horns are agents. The fourth beast of Dan. vii. affords an illustration. This beast has a brotherhood of ten horns, growing out of the head of a sea-monster: ten kingdoms springing up upon the territory of a great empire. Another horn comes up, an active persecuting agent. He makes war on the saints. The same thought follows the word horn connected with the leopard beast of Rev. xiii., and Rev. xvii., the scarlet beast. These explain the second thought. The word horn has a third meaning; it symbolizes the power of a symbolic beast or agent. When it is applied to God or Christ it is simply an attribute; it denotes power. What is its meaning when applied to the two horned beast? Is it an agent? Or, is it simply an attribute? No agency is attributed to the two horns. They are only named.—"The beast had two horns like a lamb." They are not used. They are compared to lamb's horns. They are, therefore, simply ornaments of the beast, as the horns of a lamb are appendages of that animal. No description is given of the horns, only that he had two horns like a lamb, and spake as a dragon. As the horns do not act, and as they are nowhere explained it is useless to conjecture. We might as well hunt for the meaning of the arms in the metallic image. The beast is the actor, and in him we are interested.

He exercieth all the functions of the first beast. He does not worship the first beast. Worship is no attribute of beasts; he causes all to worship.

His wonders have been fully explained; this wonder-working with fire seemed to be a special attribute by which he deceived the nations. The image that he caused to be made has also been interpreted. The identity of the image with the harlot and the Papal hierarchy, cannot well be questioned. Its agency is so clear, as to leave no room for doubt. The "mark" and "number" of the beast remain to be explained. The word "mark" is the translation of χαραγμα, karagma, and is defined, mark stamp, impression, seal, sculpture, engraving, device. It is used eight times in the Apocalypse, and always refers to the same thing. Rev. xiii. 16. "To receive a mark in their right hand." vs. 17, "Save he that had the mark." xiv. 9, "And receive (his) mark in his forehead." vs. 11, "And whosoever receiveth the mark of his name." xv. 2, "And over his image, and over his mark." xvi. 2. "Upon the men which had the mark of the beast." xix. 20, "That had received the mark of the beast." xx. 4, "Neither had received (his) mark upon their foreheads, or in their hands."

The word "mark," or engraving, is coupled as follows: 1. "Mark," 2. "The mark," 3. "Mark," 4. "Mark of his name," 5. "His mark," 6. "The mark," 7. "The mark," 8. "Mark." In all places its original meaning is engraving, and is termed simply engraving, the engraving of the beast, or the engraving of his name.

The word number is used in the following connections: 1. "Number of his name," 2. "Number of the beast," 3 "His number," 4 "Mark of his name," 5, 6. "Number of his name," 7. "Mark of the beast," 8. "Number of his name," demonstrating that "mark" and "number" are identical. The mark of the beast is the sinful act. then the denunciation is against those who have the engraving of his name, or the number of his name. The terms "mark" and "number" are the data by which we find the name. In order to solve the problem, the mark and number being given, it is necessary to understand the custom of the age in which John had his visions. These heathen gods, which were deified men, such as Mars, Jupiter, Mercury and Bacchus, had each particular societies —secret associations to which no persons were admitted but those who were fitted by previous ceremonies. The devotions required in these fraternities were called the mysteries of the god. The mode of admitting them into these societies was by engraving on their foreheads, or on their hands, some hieroglyphics, or letters, understood only by the initiated. With these marks the early Christians must have been familiar; since nearly all the Pagans belonged to those fraternities, they must have solicited Christians to join them. All those who had on their foreheads the engraving of an ivy leaf were of the family of Bacchus: those having the name it bears belonged to Jupiter. Thus with all the other gods.

That the early disciples were familiar with this practice, will appear from the epistle of Barnabas: "For the Scripture says that Abraham circumcised three hundred and eighteen men of his house. But what therefore was the mystery made known unto them? Mark first the eighteen, and next, the three hundred, for the numerical letters of ten and eight are IH; and these denote Jesus. And because the cross was that by which we were to find grace, therefore he adds three hundred; the note (mark) of which is T, (the figure of the cross). Wherefore by two letters (IH) he signified Jesus, and by the third (T), his cross. He who has put the engrafted gift of his doctrine within us, knows that I never taught to any one a more certain truth." Bar. viii. 11–14. The mark or engraving, ΙΗΤ, included in it the number 318, and that number stood for the name Jesus. John gives the mark or engraving ΧΣ, which contains the number 666, and that number is the name of the beast. Out numerals are Arabian or East Indian, and did not come into use until the eleventh century. In the original of Rev. xiii. 18, last clause, it reads χξ, instead of "six hundred three score and six." John, by this mark, with the understanding that in that mark is a name, has given us all the data that is necessary to solve the problem.

It may be asked why John did not plainly declare the name of the beast, since it was so well known to himself? To this we reply, for the same reason that Paul called that power, who hindered the revelation of the man of sin, "He who now letteth," instead of saying the Roman Empire. On this passage Jerome remarks, "Paul was not willing to say openly and boldly, that Anti-Christ shall not come unless the Roman empire be first destroyed. It would have caused a severe and bloody persecution for the extermination of the church, as seditious and rebellious by the ruling powers of that empire."

ORIENTAL SKETCHES.—No. 16.

Bashan and Its Giant Cities.

BY J. H. PORTER, A. M.

DESERTED CITIES.

We had not gone more than four miles from Bozrah when an alarm was raised. The people of Bozrah had told us, and we had known ourselves, that though the country on our proposed route is thickly studded with towns and villages, yet not a single human being dwells in them. When approaching the village of Burd we saw figures moving about. At first we thought that some shepherds had taken refuge there with their flocks; but it very soon became apparent that the figures were not shepherds. Considerable numbers collected on the flat house-tops, and we could see horses led out and held beneath the walls. They evidently saw us, and were preparing for an attack. We held a council of war, and resolved unanimously to go forward, and if attacked to treat the enemy boldly. Mahmoud, after examining his gun and pistols, and loosening his sword in his scabbard galloped off to reconnoitre. A horseman came out to meet him. I confess it was rather an anxious moment, but it did not last long. A few words were spoken, and Mahmoud came back with the welcome intelligence that a little colony of Druses had migrated to the village two days previously. They were as much alarmed at us as we were at them. So it is always now in this unfortunate land, where the Ishmaelite pours free.—"His hand against every man and every man's hand against him." Every stranger is looked upon as an enemy until he is proven to be a friend. The time and events so graphically depicted by Jeremiah have come: "O inhabitant of Aroer, stand by the way and espy: ask him that fleeth and her that escapeth, and say, What is done?" Jer. xlviii. 19.

We rode on along the Roman road, stopping occasionally to examine with our glasses the deserted towns away to the right and left, and once or twice galloping to those near the road, so as to inspect their strange massive houses, standing complete but tenantless. Often and often did our eyes sweep the open plain, and scan suspicious rains, and peer into valleys, in the fear or hope of discovering roving Ishmaelites. We were almost disappointed that none appeared.

Soon after leaving Burd, we entered a rocky district; and here, among the rocks, we found some fields where a few Druses were ploughing, each man having his gun slung over his shoulders, and pistols in his belt. This is surely cultivation under difficulties. From this place until we reached Salcah, we did not see a living creature, except a flock of partridges and a herd of gazelles. The desert of Arabia is not more desolate than this rich and once populous plain of Moab.

SALCAH.

Joshua tells us that the kingdom of Og the giant included "all Bashan unto Salcah" Josh. xiii. 11, 12; and the Israelites took and occupied the whole region from Mount Hermon "unto Salcah." Salcah, the eastern frontier city of Bashan, was now before me; its great old castle perched on the top of a conical hill, overlooking a boundless plain, and the city itself spread along its sloping sides, and reaching out into the valley below. I felt glad and thankful that I was privileged to reach the utmost eastern border of Palestine. I had previously explored its northern border away on the plain of Hameth and on the heights of Lebanon, and its western border from Tripoli to Joppa; and since that time I have traversed the southern border from Gaza eastward.

Salcah is one of the most remarkable cities in Palestine. It has been long deserted; and yet, as nearly as I could estimate, five hundred of its houses are still standing, and from three to four hundred families might settle in it at any moment without laying a stone, or expending an hour's labor on repairs. The circumference of the town and castle together is about three miles. Besides the castle, a number of square towers, like the belfries of churches, and a few mosques, appear to be the only public buildings.

On approaching Salcah, we rode through an old cemetery, and then, passing the ruins of an ancient gate, entered the streets of the deserted city. The open doors, the empty houses, the rank grass and weeds, the long straggling brambles in the doorways and windows, formed a strange, impressive picture which can never leave my memory. Street after street we traversed, the tread of our horses awakening mournful echoes, and startling the foxes from their dens in the palaces of Salcah. Reaching the open paved area, in front of the principal mosque, we committed our horses to the keeping of Muhmoud, who tied them up, unstrung his gun, and sat down to act the part of a sentry, while we explored the city.

The castle occupies the summit of a steep conical hill, which rises to the height of some three hundred feet, and is the southern point of the mountain range of Bashan. Round the base of the hill is a deep moat, and another still deeper encircles the walls of the fortress. The building is a patchwork of various periods and nations. The foundations are Jewish, if not earlier; Roman rustic masonry appears above them: and over all is lighter Saracenic work, with beautifully interlaced inscriptions. The exterior walls are not much defaced, but the interior is one confused mass of ruins.

The view from the top is wide and wonderfully interesting. It embraces the whole southern slopes of the mountains, which, though rocky, are covered from bottom to top with artificial terraces, and fields divided by stone fences. From their base the plain of Bashan stretches out on the west to Hermon: the plain of Moab on the south, to the horizon: and the plain of Arabia on the east, beyond the range of vision. For more than an hour I sat gazing on that vast panorama. Wherever I turned my eyes towns and villages were to be seen. Bozrah was there or its plain, twelve miles distant. The towers of Beth-Gamul were faintly visible far away on the horizon. In the vale immediately to the south of Salcah are several deserted towns, whose names I could not ascertain. Three miles off, in the same direction, is a hill called Abel el-Maaz, with a large deserted town on its eastern side. To the south-east an ancient road runs straight across the plain as far as the eye can see. About six miles along it, on the top of a hill, is the deserted town of Maleh. On the section of the plain between south and east I counted fourteen towns, all of them, so far as I could see with my telescope, habitable like Salcah, but entirely deserted! From this one spot I saw upwards of thirty deserted towns! Well might I exclaim with the prophet, as I sat on the ruins of this great fortress, and looked over that mournful scene of utter desolation, "Moab is spoiled, and gone up out of her cities.... Moab is confounded; for it is broken down: howl and cry; tell ye it in Aaron that Moab is spoiled, and judgment is come upon the plain country.... Upon Kirjathaim, and upon Beth-gamul, and upon Beth-meon, and upon Kerioth, upon Bozrah, and upon all the cities of the land of Moab, far and near." Jer. xlviii. 15–24.

Another feature of the landscape impressed me still more deeply. Not only is the country—plain and hillside alike—chequered with fenced fields, but groves of fig-trees are here and there seen, and terraced vineyards still clothe the sides of some of the hills. These are neglected and wild, but not fruitless. Mahmoud told us that they produce great quantities of figs and grapes, which are often year after year by the Bedawin in their periodical raids. How literal and how time have the words of Jeremiah become! "O vine of Sibmah, I will weep for thee with the weeping of Jazer. ...the spoiler is fallen upon thy summer fruits, and upon thy vintage. And joy and gladness is taken from the plentiful field, and from the land of Moab, and I have caused wine to fail from the wine-presses; none shall tread with shouting." Jer. xlviii. 32, 33. Nowhere on earth is there such a melancholy example of tyranny, rapacity, and misrule as here. Fields, pastures, vineyards, houses, villages, cities—all alike deserted and waste. Even the few inhabitants that have hid themselves among the rocky fastnesses and mountain defiles drag out a miserable existence, oppressed by robbers of the desert on the one hand, and robbers of government on the other. It would seem as if the people of Moab had heard the injunction of Jeremiah: "O ye that dwell in Moab, leave the cities and dwell in the rock, and be like the dove that maketh her nest in the side of the hole's mouth." And even thus they cannot escape, for "He that fleeth shall fall into the pit; and he that getteth up out of the pit shall be taken in a snare: for I will bring upon it, even upon Moab, the year of their visitation, saith the Lord." Jer. xlviii. 28, 43.

The world never harms a Christian as long as he keeps it out of his heart. Temptation is never dangerous until it has an inside accomplice. Sin within betrays the heart to the outside assailant.

Youths' Column.

CHILDREN.

A dreary place would be this earth,
Were there no little people in it;
The very air of life would lose its mirth,
Were there no children by to play in it.

No little footsteps, like hours to grace,
And make the solitude resound:
No little hands on hearth and house,
To carry the shadows in or round:

No baby with its arms to clasp,
No little heart to gladden it;
A desolate—a lifeless world it would be,
Were there no children in it.

Home love is the best love. The love that you are born to is the sweetest you will have on earth. You, who are so anxious to escape from the home-nest, pause a moment and remember this is so. Never again, after strangers have broken the beautiful bond will there be anything so sweet as the little circle of mother, father and children, where you are cherished, protected, praised, and kept from harm. You may not know it now, but you will know it some day.

BOYS.

Get hold of the boy's heart. Your locomotive comes like a whirlwind down the track, and a regiment of armed men might seek to arrest it in vain. It would crush them, and plunge unheeding on. But there is a little lever in its mechanism that at the pressure of a man's hand will slacken its speed, and in a moment or two bring it panting and still, like a whipped spaniel, at your feet. By the same little lever, the vast steamship is guided hither and yonder, upon the sea, in spite of adverse wind or current. That sensitive and responsive spot by which a boy's life is controlled is his heart. With your grasp gentle as love or that below, you may pilot him whither you will. Never doubt that he has a heart. Bad and wilful boys very often have the tenderest hearts hid away somewhere beneath incrustations of sin or behind barricades of pride. And it is your business to get at the heart, keep hold of it by sympathy confiding in him, manifestly working only for his good by little indirect kindnesses to his mother and sister, or even his pet dog. See him at his home, or invite him into yours. Provide him some little pleasure, set him at some little service of trust for you; love him, love practically. Any way and every way rule him through his heart.—Weekly Evangelist.

A Right Sort of a Boy.

Robert dropped a fine red apple out of the front window, which rolled very near the iron railing between the grass plot and the street. Robert forgot to pick it up. Shortly after two boys came along.

"Oh, my," cried one, "see that bouncing apple! Let's hook it out!"

The other boy nudged him, with a whispered "Oh, don't; there's somebody looking." And on they went.

A little girl next passed. She spied the apple, and stopped, looking very hard at it, then put her hands through the rails, and tried to reach it. Her fingers just touched it. She looked around; a man was coming down the street. The girl withdrew her hand and went away.

A ragged little fellow came by soon after. "That boy will steal the apple," I said to myself, peering through the blinds. His bright eye at once caught sight of it, and he stopped. After looking at it for a moment he ran across the street and picked up a stick. He poked it through the rails and drew the apple near enough to pick it up. Turning it over in his grimy hands, I could not help seeing how he longed to eat it. Did he pocket it and run? No. He came up the steps and rang the bell. I went to the door to meet him.

"I found this big apple in your front garden," said the boy, "and I thought maybe you had dropped it out, and didn't know it was there; so I picked it up, and have brought it to you."

"Why did you not eat the apple?"

"Oh," said he, "it is not mine."

"It was almost in the street," said I "where it would have been hard to find its owner."

"Almost is not quite," replied the boy "which, Mr. Curtis says, makes all the difference in the world."

"Who is this Mr. Curtis of whom you speak?"

"My Sunday school teacher. He has explained the eighth commandment to me, and I know it; what is the use of knowing unless you act upon it?" Here he handed me the apple.

"Will you accept the apple?" said I. "I am glad you brought it in, for I like to know honest boys."

What Love Will Do.

"Can a mother forget her child? Yes, she may forget, yet will I not forget thee."

It was the morning of a festival. At an early hour the villagers had assembled on the green. Above them the peaks of the Alps towered in majestic grandeur. The happy children were sporting in groups, when a bold scream arrested the attention of all. A mountain eagle had escaped unperceived, and to the horror of the bystanders rose with a child struggling in its talons. In the terror and confusion it was some time before it was known who it was, and a deep groan burst from the crowd when it was found that it was a beautiful child, the sole comfort of a widow.

"My child! my darling child!" she cried, as wringing her hands in agony, with streaming eyes she watched the flight of the powerful bird, while the pastor vainly tried to comfort her. Several mountaineers instantly sprang to the cliffs, and all eyes followed them as slower and slower they ascended. At length as the eagle disappeared behind the abrupt precipice, they were seen to pause and all but two gave up the attempt. At last, as rocks towered above rocks these gave up the desperate attempt, and a groan from the beholders told that all hope was over. With her face blanched by despair, her gaze riveted upon the precipice, the mother had stood motionless until now; but when she saw the pursuers falter, with a cry of agony she sprang up the almost perpendicular ascent. Upward, still upward, she held her perilous way until she gained the point which seemed to defy further progress, and there the cliffs rose high and bold before her; but where effort failed in others, she, impelled by love, nerved every power, and pausing not at danger, her bare and tender feet caught upon the lichens, and upward she pressed to the admiration and terror of the beholders. Once, and once only, she paused to look below. When midway to the summit what a startlingly beautiful view greeted her eyes. Far down the winding valley was a dense mass of human beings. Not one was standing, not a head was covered, but sire and youth and child were kneeling in fervent supplication, while from the village the tolling bell met her ear calling on the neighboring inhabitants. At length she gained the summit, and to her speechless joy she beheld the child still alive in the nest. On rapid wing the eagle was wheeling and circling above her. To grasp the child, clasp it to her bosom, and bind it to her with her shawl was the work of a moment. Commending herself to the loving Father she turned to descend. Fearful had been the ascent, but more fearfully perilous seemed the descent. On reaching the difficult spot, with a dizzy brain and sinking heart she paused, clasping her child to her bosom with a shudder. At that moment her ear caught the faint bleat of a goat guiding its kid down another way. With unspeakable gratitude to God she crossed over to descend by that before unknown path, and she heard the distant shouts of joy from the villagers below. Soon strong arms were by her side and she was safe with her child.

Love had borne her aloft where Alpine climbers could not go, yet we are told that the love Divine goes far beyond. "As the heavens are higher than the earth, so are my thoughts than your thoughts, saith the Lord." Dear suffering one, believe it and rest on Christ your substitute for "He taketh pleasure in those that hope in His mercy.

"He is more than a mother's,
Faithful, true and strong to bind."

GREENWOOD CEMETERY.

Today we have been out to visit this renowned home of the dead. No labor nor expense has been spared by the living to take away the repulsiveness of death, or to divest the grave of its gloomy horror. The natural scenery is exceedingly beautiful, and the resources of art have been heavily taxed to ornament the gently rising and falling slopes where the silent multitudes have found their last abode. The blue sky was cloudless over head, and the sun was pouring down its floods of splendor over one of the grandest combination of scenes to be met with in this Western Continent. The great cities of New York and Brooklyn were extended in one direction beyond the limits of vision. In another direction were the well cultivated garden fields interspersed with the beautiful smaller villas, and variegated with copses of groves and the loveliest of parks. In the distance, as we stood on a tomb crowned eminence, and looked over the landscapes that stretched away to the shore, we could see the blue Atlantic losing its outline of dark azure in the bluer arch of heaven. On the wavy waters the ships could be seen coursing over the great highway of nations freighted with the wealth of the world. We looked into the cloudless skies, we looked over the great cities which together contain a population of two millions, we surveyed the retreating landscapes of farms, villas, groves, and parks, we gazed at old ocean's magnificent expanse, and then we looked down at our feet and over the lawns amid which we were standing, and grave crowded grave, and lettered marble and monumental granite told us of those who once lived and loved, who once moved amid all the active scenes of existence —and then died!

Here sleeps the infant of days—a bright springbud of being that was chilled by vernal frosts ere summer suns unfolded the closed-up flower. Here is manhood, prostrated when the heart was brave, when the arm was strong, and when the footstep was unfaltering. Here womanhood rests the head upon the pillow of clay, whose blushings of beauty were faded out by the icy hand. Here age has sunk to repose to whose withered temples time had left but the "wasted locks and gray." O, dwellers in dust, what avails it you that loving hands try to make a paradise above your cells of death-slumber? The sunny skies above pour no radiancy into the climes of darkness as darkness itself and where the light is darkness.

The dew drops may sparkle like gems upon the flowers that bloom above, but the lack-lustre eyes no longer see dazzling drops nor floral loveliness. With earth and its beauties—with earth and its friendships—with earth and its responsibilities—O, sleepers in lovely Greenwood you are forever done. You carried no wealth—no beauty—no pride of caste down to the grave. Nothing of earth cleaves to you but moral character. How many of you, O multitudinous sleepers, died in the Lord—how many sleep in Jesus? How many graves in this decorated death-land are beds of sainted ones? Will the first resurrection largely thin your population? Did you, O, did you in life prepare for the world to come?

With footstep of solemn tread we leave far-famed Greenwood. The angels will soon come for all that sleep in Jesus among your number—so Greenwood farewell.

Today, Monday, May 29, finds us at the hospitable home of Eld. J. B. Cook, with whose kind and Christian family it has been arranged that we make our stay while in this city.

Yesterday, Sunday, May 28, it was our privilege to preach for the brethren of the Church of the Blessed Hope at their house of worship. It has been our aim in preaching to this devoted band of believers, to keep up a connection in the discourses so, that the several topics should be the closely related parts of one general and comprehensive whole. Our participation in the divine nature by the bestowment of its attributes—incorruptibility, immortality, and celestial glory of person at the resurrection-birth—and the heavenly inheritance reserved for God's dear children, were first detailed with connected particulars. Then our sonship, as making us joint heirs with Christ, of God—the Father of whose divine Fatherhood or Paternity, this —our —heavenly family—is named, was presented as a kindred theme. Then our union to Christ the living and glorious Head of the Church, as living and glorified members, when raised up and made alive from the dead by the same almighty power that brought again to life our Lord Jesus Christ from the dead, was presented: and, lastly, the motive influences contained in these connected particulars of the one great salvation as powerful inducements for us to work out our individual salvation with solicitude and anxiety lest we lose our crown and forfeit our heavenly birthright, were presented by way of exhortation—thus stirring up the pure minds of our dear brethren here by way of remembrance. Though we were compelled to speak in a somewhat desultory manner, our brethren gave close and candid attention. We felt some misgivings in addressing a church which has enjoyed the ministrations of very renowned speakers, but now indulge the humble hope that some of our illustrations, though delivered in our extemporaneous style, were favorably received. The brethren here look for Israel to receive the fulfillment of all the glowing promises made by the holy prophets concerning their future restoration, as well as for the glorification of the Bridal Church, and we may say of this Church of the Blessed Hope, that it is a candle-stick or lamp-stand indeed, from which radiate the rays of divine light into the darkness of a dark world.

In the afternoon of Monday, in company with Brother Cook, we went over to Central Park. One object was to see the Egyptian Obelisk which was lately brought over from Alexandria and placed on a well-selected eminence on the east side of one of the most picturesque and beautiful pieces of pleasure grounds imaginable. The obelisk proper is a monolith composed of reddish syenite, quarried in Upper Egypt. As the whole now stands, inclusive of base, pedestal and shaft, the entire height is eighty-one feet. The shaft stands on a very heavy pedestal with four bronze crabs placed one at each corner. The rasping sands of the desert have dimmed the sculptured hieroglyphs on two of the most exposed sides, and the base edges of the monolith are some fretted by time. The date when the obelisks were formed is placed as early as the time when Joseph was in Egypt and consequently anterior to the sojourning and exodus of the children of Israel in their connection with and deliverance from the land of the Nile. It is among possibilities that Joseph himself may have looked upon this venerable shaft and more than probable that Moses, learned as he was in all the wisdom of the Egyptians, may have read the hieroglyphics, that can now only be deciphered by the learned and skilled Savants. To look upon a work of human hands that has withstood the changes of 3500 years, whose rock-surfaces were lettered with an iron pen before Moses wrote the Pentateuch, a monument—even before he floated an infant in his ark of bulrushes, on the waters of the river down which this column of old antiquity was floated to Heliopolis from the quarries of Syene to stand while empires were coming to their birth and measuring off their primal eras, then taking another journey from the City of the Sun to Alexandria to stand upon the shores of the Great Mediterranean while these empires declined and died, to see new kingdoms rise and flourish on the territories where dead dynasties had risen and fallen, and then to voyage through the Great Sea and over the ocean whose western tides laved the shores of a world of whose existence Old Egypt's wisdom never dreamed, to stand the wonder of a generation far down the ages—to look, we repeat, upon a mighty shaft sculptured by hands in an age more than half way back to Eden times could but inspire a strange feeling of wonder in our mind as we stood contemplating its age-scarred form and, to us, unintelligible pages.

On the next day, after being at the Park, Brother Briggs of this city kindly called in the morning, and invited Brother Cook and ourself to go with him to Brighton Beach on the south side of Coney Island to pass Decoration Day on the shores of the Atlantic. This is a place of resort for the inhabitants of these great cities during the warm season for sea-bathing and general enjoyment. The day was very pleasant—there being just wind enough in the forenoon to give the gentle swell of the ocean a white fringe as it broke on the white sands of the shore line. The breeze from the sea's wide expanse was exhilarating, and, as it was a day when business was to a great extent suspended in this great mart of trade, multitudes flocked to this popular resort to enjoy a day of pleasurable recreation. By a notice in the Tribune of today, May 31, we see that a concourse of 25,000 persons was supposed to have assembled at Brighton Beach on Tuesday, May 30, or yesterday. As it was the first day we ever had the privilege of spending on the very shore of the ocean, and, especially, as everything was well calculated to render the day perfectly enjoyable, we hardly need say we were delighted with the day's sight, and pure and peaceful pleasures, and also placed under obligations of gratitude to Brother Briggs for his personal attention and Christian kindness, that words of thanks cannot repay. In the afternoon the wind freshened up white caps decorated the sun-bathed ridges of the wavy sea till the sinking horizon blended wave and sky. Vessels under the pleasure of wind-filled sails, or propelled by the steam rocking engine, were everywhere visible, and we contemplated the scene with that peculiar feeling that novelty and strangeness inspire.

Two day's experience gave us the opportunity to contrast the beauties of Nature, as exhibited in New York's pleasure grounds—Central Park—and its art representations promiscuously scattered through this human Eden among evergreen and spring-leaving trees, and flowery arbors and plats—with the sublimities of the great deep whose crested waves sever the new world and its mighty activities from an older world whose histories and traditions go back to the pair in Paradise. Fruitful lands have become deserts, mighty cities have fallen and left scarce a vestige of former grandeur—empires have been revolutionized and vanished like visions—but the waves of the grand old ocean roll as majestic as when Morning Stars sang creation's anthem, and as unchanged as when their notes of "wild profound eternal bass" were mingled with the sweet melodies of the sons of God, and the world-wide beauties of a new-born earth were revealed in the cloudless spendors of heaven's bright first-dawning glory. Though the dead have gone down to its deeper beds, and though the coral insect has built the white tombs above, yet ocean's expanse is unscarred with graves and unlettered with epitaphs. "The sea is his and he made it," and when it lifts up its voice of many water it proclaims the majesty of its Mighty Maker and the imbecility of man.

In our survey of the political horizon we can see signs of the coming crisis. In the hand-writing on the wall of Oriental despotism we read the doom of Islamism and sentences of Israelitish favor and restoration. The day of Gentile supremacy is at the sunset, and the Sun of Righteousness is already about to color the dawning skies of the Restitution day with glad rose hues. But the day of God and of millennial glory be ushered in. Let the bars be broken that hold the sleeping saints in death. Let the saints in resurrection life and glory rise to meet the coming King. Let the loved Immanuel be seated on the throne of universal and eternal empire soon. Thy Bride says come; a groaning creation says come: "Even so, Come Lord Jesus."

We clip the following from the N. Y. Tribune of Sunday, May 28, 1882. As this was the observed anniversary of that day when the Holy Spirit was so wonderfully infused into the intellectual and moral human powers and capabilities of the commissioned twelve, it may be a satisfaction to our readers to see how these divine inspirations appear to the editors of a widely circulated and popular secular journal. If some of this Pentecostal Spirit were copiously diffused over and deeply infused into churches looking for the Lord it would be better than the spirit of worldliness so prevalent now. A new era will bring a more glorious exhibition of the powers of the world to come of which the Pentecostal manifestation was but an earnest.

PENTECOST.

This is the anniversary of the day nearly nineteen centuries ago when the fisherman, tax-gatherers and publicans who had followed the carpenter's son Jesus before he was crucified (an ignorant, needy, disreputable crowd in the eyes of the upper classes of Jews) were together in one place, waiting for some intimation as to what they should do in the future; and when, as we are told, a mysterious and hitherto unknown power suddenly came to them, something which no education or force of intellect ever gained for any man; a swift, positive apprehension of the Truth, the Good underlying all things, and a faith in It; and a power, too, to bring that truth home to the minds of other men.

The only possible use to us nowadays in observing such religious anniversaries as this of today is to find out how the events which are said to have happened on them concern ourselves. What, for instance, does this so-called "descent of the Holy Ghost" on those illiterate Jews mean to each of us going about our business in New York today? That the occurrence on this day of Pentecost, whatever was its nature, was an actual and supreme crisis in the life of each of these men, there can be no doubt. Before this time, so far as we can see, they were very commonplace Jews of the lower grades; self-seeking, avaricious, petty in their ideas and aims. The best one among them, he whom Jesus chose as a companion, fled from him on his arrest; the one with boldest and most marked character denied all knowledge of him with oaths, and after his death went immediately to his mates and fishing again. But after this day, without a single exception, they gave themselves up to lives of heroic sacrifice such as the world never has equalled; there was no danger which they did not dare; no disgrace, no ignominy, no torture which they did not bear, dying martyrs at the end, and avowedly doing this by the strength which came to them on that day. Neither can there be any question that the gift of this mysterious power to these twelve men was also a crisis in the world's history. The truth which they set out to teach that day has altered the development of every race to which it has come, moving it more honest, virtuous, just and merciful. It was practically the dawn of moral daylight in the world.

These are the historical facts. If any one of our readers is uncertain about them, let him trace up his own family until it ends in some Gothic or Briton wrapped in skins or receiving his prisoners on Druidical altars, and he will begin to see what Christianity without his consent has done for him. This Holy Ghost, or Truth, or Idea which the old chroniclers figured as tongues of flame, has burned out a good deal of evil already from humanity. But how about individuals—ourselves? Is it possible, now, on this present May morning, in a shop or office of New York, for that mysterious power or change of nature, call it what you please, which came to the Apostles, and out of coarse human material made them martyrs, saints and propagandists of the religion of unselfishness,—to come to one of us? Other things we know how to get. Money can be worked for, knowledge, comforts, reputation, have their price which a man can pay; experience and hard sense come from friction with the world. But there is something beyond these; an influence which sometime in every man's life approaches him; an intangible force which if he will comes into his nature and which is not imagination, nor reason, nor any other mental process. It shows itself by a high, calm faith in God and his order and right, as holding all the disorder, injustice, sickness and death which bewilder us in, just as the calm, infinite, sunlighted space holds the unquiet stormy world. It is a something for which Darwin or Huxley could find no name or definition; a strength apparently without any cause. Yet every day in the commonplace life of common people we see it make weak men smile tranquilly at pain which is killing them, and silly women resist fierce temptations which take hold of every part of their character. We see it acting against worldly prudence and against nature; influencing selfish men to work to their own disadvantage, the thief to be honest, the libertine to be virtuous, giving comfort and happiness to the mourner over the grave of her dead. It drags every man, in spite of his own will, up and above himself. Is it not a real thing?

The man who yields to it knows how real it is, just as his own thought in his brain is a more actual fact to him and enters into his life more than the dead bricks on which he walks. But unfortunately the Christian Church have used technical phrases so long to express this, as well as almost all points of Christian belief, that they have almost lost their meaning to the mass of hearers. For this reason it is not amiss for even secular journals to bring these sacred subjects before their readers and induce them to ask themselves what in plain modern English they understand by them. It does not matter so much to us how this Holy Spirit (which is to the life of humanity what the sap is to the tree or the blood to the body) came to the Hebrews; but it matters greatly that we should know how if ever it has come to us.

In response to a request for some of the most valued thoughts of his long and useful life, Peter Cooper recently wrote as follows to a social gathering of aged men in Boston: "I rejoice in the belief that mankind throughout the world improve and better their condition in proportion as they draw from the revelations of nature a more rational theology, that will present God in the character of a loving and affectionate father. Such a God will be our highest ideal of all that is just, powerful, wise, pure and good. All men should realize that what a man, a community, a state or a nation soweth, that must they also reap, somehow, somewhere, and at some time, and that by the operation of laws, designed in Infinite wisdom, so wise and so good that they will never require to be altered, amended or revoked."

THE following notice of the death of our beloved Brother Brick is taken from the South Bend (Ind.) Daily Times, of May 17:

Wm. W. Brick, one of the oldest residents of this city and county, died quite suddenly at his home, corner of Jefferson street and Franklin place, about five o'clock yesterday morning, aged 74 years.....Mr. Brick had been a resident of St. Joseph county for fifty years, and was widely known and highly respected.....The funeral will take place from the residence tomorrow afternoon. H. V. Reed of Chicago, and John Lister of Buchanan, officiating.

The Rainbow.

TO THE WATCHMEN UPON THE MOUNT EPHRAIM.

For there shall be a day that the watchmen upon the Mount Ephraim shall cry, Arise ye, and let us go up to Zion unto the Lord our God. Jer. xxxi. 6.

I have set watchmen upon your walls, which shall never hold their peace day nor night: ye that make mention of the Lord, keep not silence and give him no rest till he establish, and till he make Jerusalem a praise in the earth. Isa. lxii. 6, 7. Through the gates! prepare ye the way of the people; cast up, cast up the high way; gather out the stones; lift up a standard for the people. Isa. lxii. 10.

During several years past, earnest students of prophecy have become more and convinced that the times of the Gentiles are all but fulfilled, and that the set time to favor Zion is upon us. What then should be the attitude of the servants of God? Special light involves special responsibilities. It is clear that it is our duty and wisdom to inquire of the Lord, and the words quoted above from Isaiah could hardly have been put more forcibly. We are to "give him no rest." There are, doubtless, very many of the Lord's servants who faithfully remember Jerusalem day and night, and who shall say that their prayers may not be heard to urge the speedy fulfillment of God's promises to Israel? Our Lord has set no limit to the marvels which may be brought about by "importunity" in prayer.

But we are not only to pray for the peace of Jerusalem. We must watch as well as pray, lest we be self-deceived from temptation in matters affecting the individual spirit. We must watch as well as pray, also, for the earlier fulfillment, always in his time, of the prophecies relating to the restoration of the glory of our adorable Lord.

And who that has been watching with prayer during say only the past few decades, can have failed to identify even in movements at first sight merely of secular or political interest, partial fulfillment (as the law precedes the leaf) of the prophecies concerning the last days of this age?

Have we not seen, in 1866, the Pope formally deposed from his temporal authority exactly 1260 solar years after the exaltation of the Papal authority by the decree of Phocas, A. D. 606? What a fulfillment of the prophecy, by the hand of Daniel, that at the time of the end "many shall run to and fro, and knowledge shall be increased" have we not seen, particularly since the first International Exhibition in 1851! What persecutions of God's ancient people have followed upon that which took place at Rome in 1864! What fresh blasphemies have emanated from the Vatican! What reverses have been sustained by the armies of European nations owning the supremacy of the false Church of Rome! What a "falling away" in once Protestant Britain! What a breaking of the manacles of the slave! What an access has been vouchsafed to the glorious gospel of our God in heathen lands, as a witness to all nations! What a waning of the power of the Turk! What progress towards the completion of the final number of the ten Roman kingdoms who are to have power for one hour with the beast! What a flood of infidelity and of lawlessness has broken over the whole Eastern hemisphere! What ancient landmarks have been removed! What "perilous times" have come upon us! Are not men now, as we are told they shall be in the last days, "lovers of their own selves, covetous, boasters, proud, blasphemers, disobedient to parents, unthankful, unholy?" Are they not now "without natural affection;" are they not both nationally and individually "truce-breakers?" How many men are now "traitors"—how many "heady" and "high-minded;" and how many, alas, are not "lovers of pleasures more than lovers of God?" Even in our once Protestant and still most favored country, do we not see everywhere too much of the "form of godliness," and far too little of "the power thereof?" Is there not now, more than ever, need to teach our children in the words of the wise man of old, "My son, fear God and the king, and meddle not with them that are given to change?" Prov. xxiv. 21.

Do we not also see more cheering signs than these? Is there not a growing confidence and jubilant expectation among the elect minorities of the Lord of his speedy coming in accordance with his gracious promise? Is there not more faithful waiting and watching for the catching-up of the elect to meet the Lord in the air? Is there not just such a universal belief among all peoples that we are on the eve of some great cataclysm, as obtained prior to the first advent of our Lord? Is there not a wide-spread feeling among Israel after the flesh (excepting always those who are content with the fleshpots of Egypt), that their glorious Messiah, whom we know and recognize beforehand, by faith, to be one and the same with him who loved us from the beginning, and who gave himself for us on Calvary, is at the gate? Have we not, like Daniel, "understood by books the number of the years whereof the word of the Lord came to the prophets?" Do we not find, in every daily paper, fresh evidence that God's word is truth, and that he is working out that which he purposed long before, in all the spiritual, physical, political, moral and scientific fields of his rule?

Supposing that we are both watching and praying, then, must we stop here? "Laborare est orare" may be read backwards as well as forwards. We must also work "redeeming the time." In our triune natures there is a special function for the spirit—that of prayer; one also for the soul or intelligence—that of watching; and one also for the body—that of work. But as neither of our three constituents of spirit, soul and body can be truly said to exist without both the others, so work for God cannot be effectual without both prayer and watching; prayer cannot be real without both work and watching, nor is watching of any practical value without both prayer and work.

I am as far from wishing to judge any man (except myself) as I am from desiring to flatter. Therefore I prefer to put the matter interrogatively, to myself and to every one who professes the faith of Christ. Granting that we may be both watching and praying for the kingdom of God, are we—am I—also working to that glorious end? Let each of us consider whether we are individually obeying the Lord's call! What excuses did Moses not make when first called to active service in the cause of God's ancient people! What diffidence did Gideon exhibit at a similar call! And with what gracious assurances of guidance and strength did Jehovah answer them! Did he not also enjoin Joshua to "only be strong and very courageous?" Is his arm at all shortened since those days? Has he, as many professing Christians seem to believe, power now in heaven only, having abdicated his rule over the earth? Must we go through the same trainings as Nebuchadnezzar before we learn the same lesson; that "the Most High .... that liveth for ever.... whose dominion is an everlasting dominion .... doeth according to his will in the army of heaven, and among the inhabitants of the earth; and none can stay his hand, or say unto him, What doest thou?"

But has not God for the most part in all ages, and uniformly during this dispensation of grace, chosen to work through human instruments? And if he now be calling any of us to bear a share in the agency by which he is bringing about the fulfillment of his purposes which are of old, shall we resist his Spirit, and, through either fear or indolence, refuse to perform the work which he has so graciously mapped out for us? God forbid! "Why should I let another take my crown?" is a question we may all frequently ask ourselves with advantage.

What then is the work which the Lord has apportioned to each of us? We cannot all be apostles, nor all preachers, nor all evangelists. But God has set before each of us his own individual sphere of work; and with prayer and watchfulness we may each do daily something to hasten the coming of the kingdom.

For some years past I have felt persuaded that Christians generally are very remiss in one particular branch of God's work, attached to which there is a special and most gracious promise. I refer to the absence of any serious, collective and well-considered effort in the direction of restoring God's ancient people to the land of their fathers. Some hold the opinion that this will be effected by express and direct intervention of a purely Divine and altogether supernatural kind; but this view will hardly be held by serious students of prophecy who take the Word to mean what it says. It would be easy, probably, for any reader of the Rainbow to show from Scripture that this "Deus ex machina" theory is untenable; and the proofs that this glorious restoration will not be an exception to God's established plan of working, by and through human wills and agencies, are so numerous that this is hardly the place to attempt to collate them. I will therefore proceed to more practical considerations.

Knowing that there are very many lovers of Israel who pray and yearn for their early restoration; because the Jews are beloved for their fathers' sakes; because we Christians owe them so much; because through them we hold the oracles of God; because of them as concerning the flesh Christ came; and through and beyond all other reasons, from the conviction that the national re-establishment of the Jewish nation in their own land is an inevitable preliminary of the full and personal manifestation of the glory of our adorable Lord Jehovah Jesus; knowing this, I say, I began to ask some years ago, why those lovers of Israel should remain without mutual knowledge, help and counsel, and without the organization necessary for common and collective work? Why, indeed, but because the injunction has not been obeyed, to "lift up a standard for the people"—in other words to establish a common rallying point to which should be directed all the knowledge, all the experience, all the zeal, all the discretion, all the work, all the material and pecuniary help, of all Christians who are like-minded in this matter.

Having, therefore, assembled several friends whose discretion and sound knowledge of the Scriptures could be implicitly relied on, for the safety which lies in the multitude of counsel, a first small gathering of lovers of the ancient people was held in London, on the 17th of October last. In the chair was a well-known and highly esteemed Protestant divine of the Church of England. This meeting (as also subsequent ones) was opened by an earnest prayer for the guidance of God's Holy Spirit, by one known (in spirit at least by every reader of this magazine—none other than the revered pastor of Mabley. There were present an eminent civil engineer, two or three city merchants and brokers, a member of a well-known firm of bankers in Jerusalem, and others known for their faithful Christian work—fourteen in all. The first object of establishing a personal acquaintance between a few lovers of Israel having been accomplished, so as very interesting interchanges of views, experience and special knowledge ensued; other meetings were held at which new and most valuable coadjutors were introduced; channels for obtaining special information bearing on the subject were opened up; plans of action were arranged, and many valuable statistics and particulars were collected.

At this juncture occurred the renewal of the persecutions of the Jews in Russia, followed by the well-remembered outbursts of indignation throughout the length and breadth of Britain, and the establishment, on 1st of February last, of the Mansion House Relief Fund. Some of us thought, here was a more powerful organization than we could hope to erect by years of labor, springing like Minerva, armed, into the world; and fancied it would be supererogatory to proceed further. Others doubted whether the results would be of a permanent character, or whether indeed the committee would attempt to do more than extend temporary relief to the actual victims of the late persecutions. However, action on our part remained in abeyance whilst the policy of the Mansion House Committee was underveloped, and it was only when it transpired that the management of the Fund had lapsed into the hands practically of the so-called Orthodox Jews, with the inevitable result that Palestine was (at all events temporarily) struck off the list of countries available for adoption by Jews assisted by the Mansion House Fund, that it was felt expedient for us to resume work in our own quiet groove, feeling convinced that our objects, and those of the working Committee of the Fund were in no way identical, and at the same time in no way inimical, to each other.

In the meantime the feelings of the Turkish bureaucracy had become so embittered against everything English, in consequence of the policy of our present Government (on which no reflection is necessarily hereby meant), that we felt compelled to adopt an entire change of front and of policy. Our friends must bear with us if we refrain for the present from indicating very precisely what particular line of policy we now have adopted. Suffice it to say that we have secured the adhesion of several small societies who have for some time been working, unknown to us and each other, with similar aims; that among others the Rev. Mr. Hechler has thrown in his efforts with ours, and has very kindly lent us his name and address as a temporary rallying point, pending the incorporation of a Society, and the appointment of a Secretary with fixed offices; and that which is now required from Christian sympathizers is that they should assist us with their moral and pecuniary support to aid in the formation of a permanent Society, having for its avowed and main object the colonization of Palestine, and the adjacent countries, particularly with reference to the impending resettlement there of the main body of the Jewish nation.

Readers of the Rainbow you have had a clear month's start of the rest of the British public by the insertion in the April number of a slip inviting the forwarding of your names and addresses. The response to this has been most gratifying, as the replies received embrace the names of many of the most respected and constant writers in the magazine. We want more names, and we want also money subscriptions, to warrant us in the opening of a banking account and the appointment of trustees. The immediate object to which these funds are to be applied is to pay the expenses of obtaining from the Porte a concession for such public works as are necessary to the working out of the grand aim of the Association, which, please God, is to be—the restoration of the Jewish people to Palestine.

I have much more to say on this all-engrossing subject, but the space forbids at present. My dear fellow servants of Christ, I conclude as I began. Pray, watch and work for the restoration of God's ancient people to their land of promise as a prelude to "life from the dead." "Pray for the peace of Jerusalem: they shall prosper that love thee." ## HOPE.

REV. W. H. POWERS.

This world's no gloomy vale of tears,
Unless we make it so;
Our faith's rise higher than our fears,
Our woes transcends our woe.

For every valley of despond,
Thro' which our feet must stray,
Rise mountain heights of Hope beyond,
And courage guides the way.

O helpless soul! throw off the weight
Which Satan bids thee bear:
The cross of malice, passion, hate,
Self-worship, pride, despair.

Beneath the crosses God has given,
Our struggles may be removed,
So shall we find the joys of Heaven
Our soul's sweet habitude.

Whene'er we rise from cities of fears,
Which dims our mortal sight,
God's love, reflected thro' our tears,
Makes all our world delight.

And when the peril, here
Shall gild our grief
We'll find each burden borne in love
To be a golden cross.

Editor Restitution:

The prophet that hath a dream let him tell a dream; but he that hath my word, let him declare my word faithfully. What is the chaff to the wheat? saith the Lord. Jer. xxiii. 28, 29.

It must be painfully apparent to every thinking and earnest Christian, viz., the graveling disposition in too many of our churches to set aside the plain, direct, and pointed words of Jehovah, and give us in their stead elegantly worded general statements, or instructions: in many cases putting the people into a yawning, sleepy condition with their prosy rubbish before they reach the subject matter or central thought of the Divine message. In the same chapter a little farther on it is stated that the people who have such teachers shall not be profitted by them. The clearest utterances of men are but as chaff, compared to the hammer of God's word.

I can recollect when it was the custom in ministers of the gospel to give Scripture authority for every important statement they made at the sacred desk. It should be so now. Attorneys at law are expected to give precedents—authority—to sustain their positions. Preachers of the gospel should search the word diligently to see whether the things they affirm are sustained by the Book. It would appear now that the ministers who can talk the longest without even referring to the Holy Oracles, gives the strongest evidence of real ability. Paul no doubt could have acquitted himself in this line as well as any of our modern pulpit orators—was not ashamed to refer to the Book for endorsement to his utterances. We read that Israel could not stand Jehovah speaking to them the words of the law. They said to Moses, "Speak thou with us and we will hear, but let not God speak to us lest we die." Ah, sin makes cowards of us all. Sin is the cursed thing that makes us shrink away from the presence of God and his word. Like Adam, we are inclined to hide ourselves from the pure and holy God our Creator (Adam's shame has been transmitted).

"Sprang from the man whose guilty fall, Corrupts his race and taints us all."

What a pity that so many professing Christians appear to prefer the chaffy, prosy, dreamy talk of some D. D. to the wholesome, pure, divine word of life, which like a hammer is intended to make our crooked parts straight, and like a fire burn up the filthy rags of moral dudiment and self-righteousness, and like wheat be unto us the real bread of life.

"Thy word Almighty Lord
Where'er it enters in
Is sharper than a two-edged sword,
To slay the man of sin."

"Thy word is power and life,
It bids confusion cease,
And changes envy, hatred—strife,
To love and joy and peace."

The prophet that hath a dream, let him tell a dream; but he that hath my word, let him declare my word faithfully. Oh, that we may begin even now to search that blessed Book which contains such wonderful words of life. No other book contains such precious news for hearts that are longing for solid good, yet no other book is treated with such neglect—read so little. In that wonderful little book written by J. Bunyan, in the form of a dream, he commences in so unique yet so truthful and beautiful a manner—"I saw a man standing in a certain place clothed in rags. His face turned away from his own house. In his hand he held a book, in which he appeared to be reading; and on his back a great burden." True picture of the sinner when God's word enters into his understanding. It was the book that assisted the dreamer to see himself, as he represents in the picture—for it is himself, evidently, he has in view, as the pilgrim going from the city of destruction to the celestial city. It was the book that showed him the way to the "wicket gate," and the cross: the sight of which caused his burden to tumble from his back. Here he also had his rags taken from him, and in their place a grand suit was given him, the like of which he had never before possessed, because the fabric was of such a nature that it never wore out, or grew old. Some call it the robe of righteousness.

"Jesus thy blood and righteousness
My beauty are, my glorious dress,
'Midst flaming worlds, in these arrayed,
With joy shall I lift up my head."

It was the book that showed him his great peril in the city of destruction and at the same time the sure way of escape therefrom, and when Christians got into the slough of despond, it was not pulpit oratory, but the book by whose counsel he was enabled to see the stepping stones which the King, our gracious Heavenly Father had placed there to assist weary and benighted pilgrims through this wierd and lonely vale.

"Thy word is a lamp to my feet and a light to my path." "The entrance of thy word giveth light, it giveth understanding to the simple." Light here means knowledge of God's attributes, also our privileges, and a right understanding of our duty to God and each other.

On most of the bridges that span our rivers, as well as in corporations and towns, there are certain laws which all must observe. Ignorance of them will not be taken as an excuse for their violation. As a rule these laws are usually observed because of the paltry fine imposed for each violation. Oh, how strange so many who enter the service of the King of kings pay so little attention to the laws and regulations of his kingdom, since a mistake, wilful or otherwise, may work the forfeiture of our citizenship. If we have any misgiving about the title of our property, we take so much pains to look into the matter—spending our time and means in straightening out that which may be crooked. And so in unfavorable symptoms of disease how careful we are to know the worst, and apply the remedy. But in the matter of our title to eternal life or spiritual health, we pay so little attention.

In the matter of property title, it is not sufficient to just have the name of some attorney attached to our brief. He must be a man of pronounced skill in the detection of error. But where life everlasting is at stake, instead of going to the only book which treats on life-titles, too many go to some dreamer or religious soothsayer and take his chaffy rubbish instead of the pure wheat of God's eternal truth.

"When I behold mankind,
Dull, stupid, simple, blind,
Sheepishly rest behind, (where some dance leads),
Yet strutting all the while
In most imposing style,
My face may seem to smile, (but my heart bleeds)."

We read that after our Lord uttered —while in the agony of death—"It is finished" that the vail of the temple was rent in twain, signifying that the time had passed when the High Priest only could enter into the presence of the Most High. What pity that this truth should be so little understood. Millions of people to-day calling themselves Christians, are saying by their actions, "Let Moses speak with us and we will hear, but let not God speak to us lest we die."

Every person now, by virtue of the work and merit of Jesus, can present his petition to the Father in heaven for him or herself, and have audience, provided they come in the name of and ask for the sake of Jesus Christ the Savior and only Mediator between God and man.

"On us the Father's love,
Is for thy sake bestowed,
Thou art our advocate above,
Thou art our way to God.

Mercy and grace and peace,
Descend through thee alone,
And thou dost all our services,
Present before the throne."

Ever since man's revolt, breaking up the sweet intercourse with his Creator, and ending in his expulsion from Paradise, God has been kindly and persistently planning for his recovery. All through the ages, from the promise in the garden made to the ejected pair, down to the glad morn when a few shepherds at Bethlehem were startled by a great light and the sudden appearance of an angel who persuaded them to be not afraid, for that he came not to destroy, but rather to make the grandest announcement that was ever made to any people in any age of the world, "I bring you," said he, "tidings of great joy which shall be to all people—Gentile and Jew alike—for unto you is born this day in the city of David a Savior which is Christ the Lord. And suddenly there was with the angel a multitude of the heavenly host, praising God, and saying, Glory to God in the highest and on earth peace good will to men."

Oh, why is it that while this glad news is being told and commented upon in our churches the first day of every week, so many of our people should stay at home, reading about some big fire, horse race, or suicide, and if they do come now and then to God's house, the preacher has hard work to keep them awake—why is all this? Who is to blame? Is the preacher telling a dream—dispensing some gilded but chaffy, prosy nonsense of his own, instead of the wholesome and nutritious wheat of God's life-giving word? It is recorded that the sons of Aaron were struck dead for using strange fire in their censers—polluting thereby the sacred service. I verily believe this is one of the great sins of our day, viz., a lack of reverence in pew and pulpit in our approaches to the Almighty, before whom angels, it is said, veil their faces.

The greatly honored and eminently successful evangelist, D. L. Moody, whose labors in Baltimore will not soon be forgotten, used to hold the old Chicago Bible in his hand, while he dispensed the fire, the hammer, and the wheat of eternal truth, to the hungry, eager throngs, that crowded night and day to hear him. What was the secret of his success? Had he a university certificate? Was there music in his voice? Was there any particular grace in his pose or dramatic style in his gestures? No in all these he was short—lacking. "Rude in speech and little blest with the set phrase. Pray then what was it which drew city and country after him as few men ever drew since or before? Hear and I will tell you and you may if you will sound it abroad, publish it in the streets of Askelon. Hail it like as one did before in the ages that are past—on your church doors. He had God's word and he declared it faithfully. Omitting the "time-honored pulpit customs and phrases" such as prosy introductions, white pocket linen, a great neck cloth, "thirdlies" and "but again," facial contortions and stage attitudes, as often seen but so much out of place in him who ministers at the sacred desk—everywhere, but especially at God's altar, I loathe affectation. He was so unlike the fashionable or society preachers of the day, who just take one little verse, or rather a fragment, just a little clause, to show us—it would appear—how much they can do with the least material, or in other words, how little they need to depend upon the word of inspiration. But with all their cultured utterances and faultless composition, they have hard work to keep their admirers awake to the end of the piece. "The prophet that hath a dream, let him tell a dream; but he that hath my word, let him speak my word faithfully. What is the chaff to the wheat? saith the Lord." "Is not my word as a fire that burneth, and as a hammer that breaketh the rock in pieces?"

See how David met the great overgrown boaster of Goth. I fancy I hear him announce himself as Saul's alternate. "Yes I'm little, but I come in the name of the Lord of hosts, and all these trembling people in my rear as well as all the God defying host at your back, shall know that the Lord saveth not with sword and spear, for the battle is the Lord's." With this kind of faith no wonder he accepted that challenge that sent terror to the heart of Saul's veterans.

Sunday School teachers, did you hear what David said? "The battle is the Lord's;" think of that when you are tempted to abandon your Sunday School work. Be not discouraged because you lack skill and experience. Where was David's military experience or training? His conduct before Saul shows that he had no experience with sword and shield, he had not proved them. But he had what stood him better in the Lord's battle—unlimited and unwavering reliance upon him who had in the past delivered him in times of great peril, saving him from the teeth of the lion and the paw of the bear. He made no reckoning on defeat. He carried no army surgeon with him, at least there is no account of it. There was no burial corps waiting the result of the conflict. There were no "ifs" in his speech. God was with him and he had the assurance of victory. There are several features in this most interesting narrative, very instructive.

David ignored the "time-honored custom" of appearing in uniform; how he must have been taunted by the regulars. It must have been a capital joke in camp when the young rustic—likely barefoot and footsore—with his fists perhaps suspended on one shoulder and his shepherd bag on the other, went forth with only a boy's sling in his hand to such an unequal contest. Many an old soldier no doubt wished from their heart that the presumptuous upstart would be given for food to the dogs or birds of the air. We are taught by this narrative that human modes or usages are not always endorsed by the Divine Being. If David was here now amongst us and undertook to lead a charge against the Philistines of sin and refused to adopt the "time-honored tactics" of the church militant, he would be treated as an enemy and in all probability dismissed the regular service. Many would say, what right has he to introduce plans and methods not recognized by us? But David was successful and there is nothing like success to put an end to all murmuring and we will all be successful if our hearts and plans are in accord with David's God even if that plan takes us out of the ruts of human inventions and "time-honored customs"—nonsense. Oh that Christian men and women of the present age had just a little of this courageous independence that we see in David's ignoring all of Saul's war harness—leaning and trusting in the strong arm of Jehovah alone for success reasoning always the inspiring words of David—"The battle is the Lord's."

There are so many Christian workers constantly complaining because of repeated failures and are puzzled to account for it. The church call for a caucus of the head men or chiefs, an advance, or charge, is determined upon. The "alarum" is sounded and resounded but too often the whole affair ends in sound. Israel's hosts are compelled to return to camp, and God's enemies remain in possession of the field. What is wanted now is a few braves like David, who will dare to spurn the ponderous, stale and useless machinery of mere human plans and methods, spurning them as useless, just as David did Saul's proffered armor and "time-honored equipment," and go out relying for success alone on the strong arm of Omnipotence for the battle is the Lord's now as much as it was then. The news are getting tired of all this chaffy, windy, empty sound. Society preaching, emotional acting, away with it.

Mr. Moody when here told us in one of his discourses, that he met a man once who was inclined to be skeptical, and instead of entering into an exhaustive agreement with him on evidence, he just gave him Isa. liii. 6.

We often wonder why so many of the churches' recruits fall out of the ranks. Now and then we think and speak kindly of them, but far oftener they are regarded as mistaken souls, who never had right thoughts of holy things. Seldom do we think of attaching blame to ourselves in the premises. If like Dickens' Oliver Twist, asking for more gruel, they the recruits—appear dissatisfied with the meagre allowance, dispensed at many of our religious feasts—they are whipped, reprimanded, sat upon, I verily believe many earnest inquirers after truth coming into the church of Christ, are starved and froze to death at our candle heated stoves and raw turnip collations. Instead of dispensing like Moody the wheat, the fire, and the hammer of holy, earnest truth, such as Isa. liii. 6, or John i. 29, Matt. xi. 28, Rom. iii. and x., we give them some prosy, windy "rig-ma-role" both fireless and valueless. What is the chaff to the wheat? saith the Lord.

Oh, Christian sower, if you would do efficient work for thy Master, sow wheat—life-giving and nutritious truth and soon the song, "Nothing but leaves," will be superseded by the happy chorus—

"Bringing in the sheaves."

May the Lord wake us all up to a proper understanding of the work he will own and bless. God's messenger must always strictly adhere to his orders, and regardless of fear or favor—speak out boldly that which God shall tell him to speak. Balaam said, "If Balak were to give me his house full of silver and gold, I cannot speak only that which he shall tell me. How can I curse whom God has blessed?" said he. Christian messenger you will not very likely be asked to curse anybody, as was Baalam, but you will be expected to flatter, fellowship and fawn upon unholy persons, because of their temporal support of God's service. This is just as odious in the sight of heaven, and unchristian both in principle and result.

"Thou shalt in any wise reprove thy brother," whether they are offended or not, "yet lookest thou one thing" must be said to all whether rich or poor. One smooth stone, directed by David's God, will accomplish more than all our human modes and methods put together. Knee drills and prostrations are but as chaff compared to the fire and hammer of God's truth.

"Behold I stand at the door and knock, if any man will hear my voice and open the door of his heart, I will come in and sup with him and he with me."

This, this is what crushed hearts need. Such texts as this will do more good than long faces, angelic poses, or singing psalms all night on your knees. The very best place—when one wants to seek a special blessing—is just where Christ said—the closet. He taught this by example as well. "Tarry ye here while I go yonder to pray." Are you afraid he will not see you? He saw Jacob, when he had sent his company on before and betook himself to prayer. O, what a prayer that was! "In vain thou struggleat to be free. I never will give up my hold. Art thou the man that died for me? the secret of thy love unfold. wrestling I will not let thee go till I thy name and nature know."

Hagar was seen when she least expected it. Esther was seen, Daniel was seen, Jonah was seen. Nathaniel was seen under the fig tree, and glory be to God, I was seen! Have you been seen and heard? If so let it confirm you in your faith as it did Nathaniel.

"And when ye pray enter into your closet, and after you have shut to the door, pray to him who seeth in secret and he will reward thee openly." The result will be apparent to all.

So far I've said nothing as to what kind of man God's messenger ought to be. Here I ought perhaps to put my hand on my mouth, or like Moses take off my shoes because of the solemnity of the place. If one will thoroughly submit himself to God, he will make him suitable for the work he is to do. I might say however that God's messenger ought to have average mental and physical development. He should be grave, sincere, decent, and himself duly impressed with the gracious message he bears to others. In the proclamation of sacred truth, he should be as faithful to pronounce its penalties as its rewards. When he declares he that believeth shall be saved, he should not fail to add—he that believeth not shall be damned.

"Lord of the harvest hear
Thy needy servants cry,
Answer our faith's effectual prayer,
And all our wants supply.

On thee we humbly wait,
Our wants are in thy view:
The harvest truly Lord is great,
The laborers are few.

Convert and send forth more,
Into thy Church abroad,
And let them speak thy word of power,
As workers with their God."

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

1. A gentleman in Oregon writes, and desires an answer through THE RESTITUTION, and asks, if any one who resides at a great distance from any one of the faith, should upon a study of the word come to believe in the glad tidings of the kingdom, and become desirous of being baptized, would it be lawful and acceptable to have it administered by a minister of another order?

We answer, yes. The validity of the act to the candidate, is never made to depend upon the faith and the morals of the administrator, for then we never know when we had submitted to the institution acceptably; but it is made to rest upon the faith and the morals of the candidate. I would have as an administrator one of the faith if possible, I should say if practicable; and if not practicable, then the nearest approach as to the faith and morals, requesting that no words or formula be announced, allowing me the privilege to supply mentally according to my faith. And lastly, in the absence of all suitable ones, I would supply the deficiency myself, praying that I might not be left as destitute of assistance in the act symbolized—the resurrection from the dead—as in the symbol, but the great life giver will then be present and assist to the triumph.

2. A brother writes from Sunset post office without giving county or state and asks: "How long will mortal nations exist, when will they cease, and how long will the saints be kings and priests?"

We will reply to the first, that inspiration does not reveal the time when mortality will end, and when Israel as a mortal nation will cease to exist. The language respecting the covenant and the promises, Gen. xlii. 14, 15; xvii. 7, 8; I Chron. xvi. 15–19; Isa. lxvi. 22, 23, trace the possession of the seed according to faith, and also according to the flesh far into the ages. The time may come, yea we are inclined to believe that it will come, when all other nationalities will be absorbed by that of Israel.

To the second we will say, that the relationship as defined between Christ and his brethren as indicated by the Scripture, is such as to make the reign eternal. It is a reign over the house of Jacob—not for one age, but—for the ages, and of the kingdom there is to be no end. Luke i. 32, 33. During the restitution age Jesus is the antitype of Joshua and David as warriors in putting down all enemies and extending his dominions; and in the ages beyond when all turmoil and turbid elements have been made to pass away and perfect peace has been established, then will he become the anti-type of Solomon and reign in peace as symbolized by his position upon the crystal sea of glass. Then will the prayer be answered—"Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven."

The priesthood is after the order of Melchisedec and is eternal as to duration, and the anti-type of the Aaronical order. As the anti-type of the Aaronical order, it begins now at the consecration to service and continues upon the plane of the flesh representing the priest in the first apartment of the tabernacle, till death, then by resurrection he has passed through the vail of the flesh—Heb. x. 19—to the plane of the spirit, in which condition he represents the priest in the second apartment. If the time ever comes when Christ and the saints will lay aside the spirit nature and wear some other, then may their priesthood cease, and they cease to officiate in the anti-typical most high place; but till then must priesthood and probation continue.

We do not conclude that fleshly sacrifices will then be by the Christ body be offered. Jesus made his offering of flesh during his ministry preceding burial, and at resurrection arose on the spirit side of the vail. We are making our fleshly sacrifice now and will, if faithful, pass to the other side in due time. Then as a priesthood, the office work will on the mediation body be to administer the new covenant to Israel and through Israel to the nations, and as the covenanted seed to bless the nations, the kindreds, and the families of the earth. Yet subordinate to the Christ body will be the Prince and the Zadoc priests after the Aaronical order doing sacrifice yet upon the plane of the flesh. This must suffice upon these points.

We will say write again, and give us your post office address in full.

Free Bible Meeting.

There will be a free Bible meeting held at the Decker School House, Millbrook, Mich., beginning June 16, and continuing over Sunday. Two sessions of Bible Class daily for questions, answers and investigation. Two sermons daily, with prayer, conference, and praise meetings. Careful and thorough papers on the following subjects will be presented: The second coming of the Lord, R. Bailey; Manner of his coming, Dr. E. B. Tucker; Objects of his coming, O. T. White; The Restitution—what does it include? Wm. G. Wells; Israel in the next age, and the Nations in the next age, B. Woodward; Rulership, O. R. L. Crozier; Eternal Life, L. Bower; Immortality, C. A. Meade; The Church—its nature, mission, and final triumph, John Bower. The whole in the spirit of Christian candor and devout loyalty to Christ, seeking to know the truth for its own sake and for the character it makes. An address of welcome will be given by O. R. L. Crozier, pastor of Millbrook Church.

COMMITTEE.

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

The next Quarterly Meeting of the brethren in Northern Indiana is appointed to be held at the Antioch Meeting House, in Marshall Co., Ind., about five miles south of Plymouth, and will commence on Friday, June 16, and continue over the following Sunday. A general attendance of our brethren and sisters is desired. Let us come together praying that the Lord will bless us and make this one of the best meetings ever held at "Old Antioch."

BY ORDER OF THE COMMITTEE.

The brethren will meet in conference at Lanark, Ill., June 23, and continue over Sunday. A general invitation is extended to all, and we urge the brethren to turn out and make this one of the enjoyable seasons. Come one, come all!

J. M. GLOTFELTY.

D. T. Halstead will hold a series of meetings at Millwood, commencing Friday, June 23, and continue over Sunday, and possibly longer.

JOS. MESSIMORE.

To the brethren of Michigan and Indiana I will say, I will again take up the sword of the Spirit, and go wherever they may call me. I find the farm work is more than I can stand. I will visit the brethren in Illinois, or any other part of the country if they wish. Address me at St. Joseph, Mich.

J. S. HATCH.

The Piedmont A. C. C. will hold its fourth annual session with the church at Beaver Creek, N. C., commencing Friday, Aug. 26, and holding over Sunday. Persons traveling by rail will leave the train at Hickory, N. C., and go via Lenoir.

Persecution Under the Roman Emperor, Marcus Aurelius Antoninus.

The gentlest and most amiable of philosophers and rulers, under a solemn sense of duty, authorized the persecution of Christianity. To say stupid this is one of the most tragical facts in all history. To be a history thought, how different a thing the Christianity of the world might have been, if the Christian faith had been adopted as the religion of the empire, under the auspices of Marcus Aurelius, instead of those of Constantine. But it would be equally unjust to this, and false to truth, to deny, that no plea which can be urged for punishing Anti-Christian teaching, was wanting to Marcus Aurelius for punishing, to the full, the propagation of Christianity. No Christian more deeply believed that all creeds false, and tended to the dissolution of society, than Marcus Aurelius believed the same things of Christianity: he who of all men then living, might have been thought most capable of appreciating it. Unless any one who approves of punishment for the promulgation of opinions, flatters himself that he is a wiser and better man than Marcus Aurelius—more deeply versed in the wisdom of his time, more elevated in his intellect above it, more earnest in his search for truth, or more single minded in his devotion to it which found—let such abandon for ever the assumption of the Joint infallibility of himself and the sanhedrim, which the great Aurelius made with so unfortunate a result.—John Mercer Hill.

Christ's Love for Human Nature.

A good parent will be careful of the physical condition of a child, will tend him assiduously in sickness, collect his wants, and endeavor in every way to make him happy. But a good parent will not rest content with seeing the child comfortable and free from pain. He will consider that silver and gold are other things than physical comfort are to be provided for him, and for the sake of these greater things he will even sacrifice some of his comfort and ease with satisfaction that the child endures a certain amount of pain and wants some pleasures. The affection which pets and pampers its object is not excessive, as it is sometimes described, but a feeble affection, or at least the affection of a feeble nature.

Now the love of Christ for human nature was no such feeble affection. It was not exceedingly tender sensibility which made him feel more painfully than other men the sufferings of which the world is full. It was a powerful, calm, and contemplative love. It was a love of men for what they may be, a love of the ideal in each man, or, as Christ himself might have said, a love of the image of God in each man. Accordingly the gentleness of humanity in him did not propose to itself principally to procure gratification and ease to the senses of man, but to make the lifeless image more glorious in them and to purge it as far as possible of imperfection.—Ecce Homo.

CONSOLATION.—Psa. xiii. 1-8.

ANNA L. WARING.

Go not far from me, O my Strength,
Whom all my trust obey:
Take from me anything thou will
But go not thou away.
And let the storm that does thy work
Deal with me as it may.

While many sympathizing hearts
For my deliverance care,
Thou on thy wiser, stronger love,
Art working me to bear.
By the sweet voice of thankful song.
Almighty, comfort prayer!

O Comforter of God's redeemed
Whom the world does not see!
What hand should pluck me from the flood
That casts me out on thee?
Who would not suffer pain like mine,
To be counted like me?

When I am feeble as a child,
And flesh and heart give way,
Then on thy everlasting strength,
With power to stand I stay.
And the night should become a day.
The darkness shine like day.

Oh, blessed are the eyes that see,
Though silent angels show
The love that in their hearts of love
Unthanked may come, and go:
And blessed are the ears that hear,
Though kept awake by woe!

No suffering while it lasts is joy,
How blest soe'er it be—
Yet may the contented child be glad
His Father's face to see:
And oh, it is not hard to bear
What must be borne in me.

Deep unto deep may call, but I,
With peaceful heart will say—
Thy loving kindness hath a charge,
No waves can take away.
And let the storm, that speeds me home,
Deal with me as it may.

THE SAMARITAN PASSOVER ON GERIZIM.

Less than a hundred and fifty of the Samaritans, all told, now remain, and their number has not materially changed for many years. They live in Nablous; but on the fourteenth day of their month Nisan—at a time corresponding to our Passion Week—they leave their homes, and take themselves to the summit of Gerizim, where they pitch their tents, family by family, at a spot a little west of the temple ruins, and on somewhat lower ground, for the celebration of the passover feast. It was there that we found them as we reached the mountain top.

It was near the close of day. All was ready for the sacrificial services. Between the temple ruins and the tents two fires were burning: the first in a trench, within a low walled enclosure, at the place of sacrifice, for the heating of water in two huge caldrons or kettles for scalding the slain lambs; the other at a little distance from this, and outside the enclosure, is a great oven or pit, some seven or eight feet deep, and three or four across it, stoned up inside from the bottom, for roasting of the lambs. Within the low enclosure the congregation had gathered for worship. The high priest with a white turban, and in a pearl-colored silk surplice, knelt on a scarlet rug before a small stone bench or desk, facing the temple-site eastward. The men and children (the women remaining in their tents) were in a semi-circle back of him, also facing the temple-site. At the right of this semi-circle were seven men ready to bring the prepared lambs to slaughter. Their dress a simple white shirt or tunic, with white under drawers. They were called "the murderers," or slayers. Seven lambs appointed to slaughter were just before the high priest as he knelt.

It was about twenty minutes before sundown that the kneeling high priest began the service by an invocation implori[illegible] God's acceptance of this sacrifice according to his word. Then came a recital of the story of the exodus, and the institution of this sacrifice, in which the people joined with the high priest. The service was intoned, somewhat like the peculiar singing of Egyptians, or the notes of the wailing dervishes. At the first mention of the name of Jehovah, all prostrated themselves, as the Israelites did when they heard that God would bring them out of Egypt, Exod. [illegible] xii. 27. Then all arose and stood in silent prayer—in most impressive silence. At every subsequent mention of Jehovah's name the people put their hands to their faces, as if covering them in the presence of God. In token of emphasis as they recited, they repeatedly stretched out their hands with upturned palms, in oriental demonstrativeness. In every movement the children followed their parents, whom they watched closely as the service proceeded.

The service of worship must continue until actual sundown. As it was, no arrangements were in progress for the sacrifice. The lambs were carefully examined separately by an assistant of the high priest, to see that they were ceremonially worthy—"without blemish." The unleaven bread and bitter herbs were brought in on a straw mat, or platter, and laid before the high priest. When the sunlight on the temple-site above him showed that sunset was just at hand, the high priest stepped on to the stone bench which had been his reading-desk, and looked intently toward the west, watching the sun for its slow dipping in the blue waters of the Mediterranean beyond the Plain of Sharon. He was still reciting the story of the first passover, and the people were intoning with him more earnestly than before. The seven lambs were led by attendants to the place of sacrifice, around the caldron-fire, and held firmly there—without a single bleating cry. The flashing knives for their slaughter were tested by the attendants. The interest in the service was intensified moment by moment.

At precisely sundown—"between the two evenings"—the high priest gave the signal for the sacrifice by repeating the words of the original command to Moses, Exod. xii. 6, "And the whole assembly of the congregation of the children of Israel shall kill it in the evening." Instantly two persons at each lamb struggled for the privilege of killing the lamb. The high priest was at his desk, some thirty or forty feet from the place of sacrifice, where the other men were already gathered. Throwing off his silken surplice, he sprang to the place of slaughter, and so quick and agile was he that he killed four of the seven lambs himself. The lambs were thrown on their sides, and their throats cut with a single stroke—nearly severing the head from the body. The spurting blood was caught in basins, and the children's foreheads were marked with it—a straight line up and down between the eyes. The tents also were at once sprinkled with the fresh blood, above their entrance way. At the bloody sight of the slaughtered lambs, some of the children, who had borne a part in the services up to this point so heartily, began to sob and cry aloud, which added to the excitement of the strange scene. Then came an outburst of general rejoicing and mutual congratulations. It was "the beginning of months" to that people—a new-year's service of thanksgiving. All embraced one another most heartily, kissing on the cheek again and again, except in the case of the high priest and of the more venerable patriarchs, whose hands instead of their cheeks were kissed by all. It was a scene of unmistakeable delight in the memories and privileges and hopes of the hour. Then it was that the [illegible]-est children could say to their parents, "What mean ye by this service?" and that the glad-hearted parents could answer them, "It is the sacrifice of the Lord's passover, who passed over the houses of the children of Israel in Egypt, when he smote the Egyptians, and delivered our houses." Exod. xii. 26, 27.

And now the slaughtered lambs were made ready for the oven. Scalding water was thrown on them to loosen their fleeces. They were not skinned, but the wool was pulled from them by busy fingers, hot water being added from time to time as was needful. Then the lambs were opened, their entrails were taken out, and these together with the wool and the right foreleg of each, which belongs to the priest, were laid on the fire and burned. The prepared lambs were each run through lengthwise with a sharpened stick or spit, of from eight to ten feet long. All this about an hour and a half from the time of slaying. Meanwhile, as before, the enclosure where the services were in progress was recredly guarded from the intrusion of strangers, although outside observers were permitted to approach the low wall, or even to stand upon it, and watch the ceremonies.

At a new signal from the high priest, the seven spitted lambs were borne from the place of sacrifice to the place of roasting, and arranged around the oven, at the bottom of which the fire was burning brightly. Again brief services of prayer and recitation were intoned, and at another signal the seven lambs were lifted and simultaneously thrust into the oven bottom to hold them upright. A grating, or hurdle of green twigs was laid over the oven-mouth, fresh boughs were laid on this, and earth was heaped above all as an effectual cover. There the lambs were left to roast, for three hours and a half to four hours.

The high priest, meanwhile, retired to his spacious tent, and we were courteously welcomed there as his guests. We passed in under the blood sprinkled doorway, and were seated, two on rich rugs and two on a scarlet divan, in the family group, which included his young wife and their three children and mother, who was treated with marked consideration. The present Samaritan high priest is named Jacob Aaron. He is a man seemingly not above thirty-five years of age, with a pleasant face and a full dark beard. He freely answered every question I asked him about the ceremonies he was conducting, as I made notes for this writing. He gave us also of the "bitter herbs," leaves of a kind of dandelion, to taste; for a foreigner may share the bitterness of the passover feast, while he can have no taste of the paschal lamb. While the high priest and many others rested in their tents, there were those who watched and worshipped outside. Some did not leave the sacred enclosure, but continued there, facing the temple-site, and praying demonstratively. All who were to partake of the passover must have fasted since the day before, until they partook first of the unleaven bread and bitter herbs after the new year was fairly ushered in.

Suddenly, just before midnight, there was a cry that the lambs were now ready; and all who had rested in their tents were quickly astir. Then there was a hurrying from the tents to the place of assembling. The high-priest was now clad in a plain white robe, fastened about the waist with a coarse girdle, with slippers on his feet and a long staff in his hand. All who joined him were similarly clad. Heavy clouds had gathered. the sky was wholly overcast, and rain was falling. At the still-closed oven there was a service of worship, in the flickering light of the still-burning sacrificial fire. The earth was removed from the oven's corner, and the hurdle itself lifted off. All signs of fire were gone, and the oven's mouth was dark as the night. One by one the stakes were uplifted, and the roast meat was stripped from them into large straw mats or baskets at hand for the purpose. Portions of the meat had fallen to the oven bottom. These must be rescued, that nothing of it might be lost. One man after another was lowered by his fellows into the heated oven, to gather up as much of it as he could in the few seconds he could exist there. At length all was taken out, and was fairly in the baskets. These baskets were carried within the hallowed enclosure, and laid in a line not far from the place of sacrifice. On either side of them the people took their places for a share in the feast.

At this moment there was a lull in the storm. The clouds broke away, and the full moon shone out on that weird scene on the summit of Gerizim. There crouched the girded and shod pilgrims—not standing as in olden time, but sitting or crouching in Oriental style—the last surviving celebrants of the sacrificial feast which Moses instituted at the command of God. on that memorable night of deliverance from the angel of death in the land of Egypt, more than thirty centuries ago. The whole story of the passover seemed never so real before. The men ate in haste. Portions were taken to the women in their tents. Whatever remained of the lamb—meat or bone—was carefully gathered up and burned in the fire. "Ye shall let nothing of it remain until the morning, ye shall burn with fire."

After the feast, prayers were continued by the Samaritans until the break of day, when all retired to their tents—not to their homes in Nablous, as Dean Stanley supposed; for although the command was "Thou shalt turn in the morning, and go unto thy tents"—the day thus begun, is a day of holy convocation, the first of the seven day's feast of unleavened bread. The first day of that feast, and the day following it, are observed as a Sabbath, and during all its days the Samaritans remain at their mountain encampment.

And in the early morning, in the renewed storm of rain and hail, we found our way down the slope of Gerizim, to our tents at its western base, with a new sense of the truth that "the law having a shadow of good things to come, and not the very image of the things, can never with those sacrifices which they (have) offered year by year continually, make the comers hereunto perfect"—"a shadow of things to come; but the body is Christ."—H. Clay Trumbull, in Sunday School Time.

THE SNARE OF THE DEVIL.

"Now the passover drew nigh. And the chief priests and scribes, sought how they might kill Jesus. Then entered Satan into Judas, one of the twelve. And he went, and communed with the chief priests and captains, how he might betray Jesus unto them. And they were glad, and covenanted to give him money. And he promised, and sought opportunity to betray him." —Luke xxii. 1-6. Jesus said to his disciples, "The Son of man goeth, as it is written of him; but woe unto that man by whom the Son of man is betrayed."—Matt. xxvi. 24.....'This night I shall prove a stumbling stone to you all; for it is written, I will smite the Shepherd, and the sheep shall be scattered."—Mark xiv. 27. ....Little children, yet a little while I am with you....whither I go ye cannot come....Simon Peter said to him, Lord whither goest thou? Jesus answered, whither I go thou canst not follow me now, but thou shalt follow me afterwards. Peter said, Lord, why cannot I follow thee now? I will lay down my life for thy sake.—John xiii. 33-37. And the Lord said, Simon! Simon! behold Satan hath desired thee, that he may sift thee as wheat: but I have prayed for thee, that thy faith fail not; and when thou art restored, strengthen thy brethren. And Peter said, Lord, I am ready to go with thee both to prison and to death. And Jesus said, I tell thee Peter, the cock shall not crow this day, before thou shalt have thrice denied that thou knowest me."—Luke xxii. 31-34. The fulfillment of part of these predictions soon happened. Matthew, after describing the arrest, and cruel usage of Jesus, by means of Judas, says, "Now Peter sat without, in the high priests' palace: and one came to him, saying, Thou also wast with Jesus of Galilee! But he denied....saying, I know not what thou sayest. And when he was gone out into the porch, another saw him, and said to them that stood by, this man was with Jesus of Nazareth. Again he denied with an oath, I do not know the man. After a while, some that stood by, said to Peter, surely, thou art also of them, for thy speech bewrayeth thee. Then began he to curse and swear, I know not the man. And immediately the cock crew. And Peter remembering the word of Jesus....went out, and wept bitterly."—Matt. xxvi. 69-75....Then Judas, who had betrayed Jesus, 'when he saw that he was condemned, repented himself, 'and took back the money, saying, "I have sinned, in that I have betrayed innocent blood.... and he departed, and hanged himself." Matt. xxvii. 3-5.

In the foregoing narrative, there is much, if properly considered, that may serve to strengthen the genuine disciples of Jesus, under every form of temptation or trial, to which their principles may expose them; to comfort them under the saddening influence of conscious shortcomings; to deter them from tampering with forbidden things; and, generally to confirm their faith and hope in him who is their 'Advocate with God the Father,' and 'who ever liveth to make intercession for them.'

It appears necessary however, in the first place, to enquire as to the meaning of the word Satan, which occurs twice in the foregoing extracts. The following remarks are transcribed for the reader's information. "The word Satan is not found, as a proper name, in the Hebrew Scriptures; but signifies any opposer or enemy, whether in arms. (Num. xxii. 22, and 1 Sam. xxix. 4) or in judicial process, (Ps. cix. 6, and Zech. iii. 2-5): hence, properly, an accuser or plaintiff." Again, "Satan, though conceived of by us as a proper name, was an appellative in the language spoken by our Lord; for from the Hebrew it passed to the Syriac, and signified no more than adversary, or opponent; as in John vi. 70, 'one of you is a devil (Satan)' i.e. adversary."

Now this fact must have been well known to all the learned; and what are we to think therefore of our translators, who have given us in the common version of the Scriptures, the word Satan, more than thirty times, as a proper name, contrary to the truth; thus misleading multitudes, and obstructing a more speculation upon us, instead of the word of God? A glance at the passages referred to, will show the partial treatment the word has received. In Num. xxii. 22, the angel of God is recorded as 'standing in the way for an adversary (Satan) unto Balaam.' In 1 Sam. xxix. 4, the Philistines forbid David going out to battle with them, lest he prove an adversary (Satan) unto them. In Ps. cix. 6, it is written. "Let Satan (an adversary) stand at his right hand." And in Zech. iii. 1-2, Satan (marg. an adversary) is standing at the right hand of Joshua. And the Lord said, "The Lord rebuke thee, O Satan" (adversary). We may notice also, 1 Kings ii., the raising of adversaries (Satans) against Solomon.

As a general rule, the words devil and Satan, in the common version of the Scriptures, may always be superseded by the words, adversary, opponent, accuser, or enemy. The following cases are exceptions to this rule. The evil spirits, to which possessions are ascribed, in the common version, are frequently but improperly called devils. So also, are the imaginary deities worshipped by idolators; as in 1 Cor. x. 20. The original is not diabolos or Satan, but daimonion—demons. The two are never confounded with each other. The word devils in Rev. xvii. 14, is in the Greek, daimonion—i.e. demons. Hence the English reader may be under no difficulty.

Who then was the adversary that entered into Judas; and desired Peter? To this question we reply by asking, 'Who was the open and acknowledged enemy of Jesus, and therefore of God? who were those who said, 'This is the heir! come, let us kill him, that the inheritance may be ours'? into whose hand was Jesus to be betrayed, and by whom was his death to be procured? who constantly opposed and blasphemed his doctrines? with whom did Judas take counsel? when he knew they were conspiring to bring about the death of Jesus—and into whose desires and purposes he so heartily and completely entered, as to become one spirit with them? The only answer to these questions is this. 'The Jews'—but especially their rulers, were collectively 'the adversary.' Jesus called the Jews sons of the adversary, not that a supernatural power called the devil had begotten them, but as indicating their mind, disposition, and character; even as we say, 'sons of Mars,' 'sons of Neptune,' 'sons of strife,' etc., the meaning of which everybody knows.

With respect to Jesus and the two disciples the adversary was the Jewish people—instigated by their rulers—following out the suggestions of their envious and rebellious spirit. The chief priests and scribes sought how they might take him by craft, and put him to death.' This spirit entered into Judas. Those who sought the master's life, desired the servants' likewise. Simon! the adversary had desired thee! And so, Peter himself understood it, for he instantly replied, "Lord I am ready to go with thee to prison and to death." Peter looked no further than 'flesh and blood,' for 'Satan;' only, it was flesh and blood animated and energized by a rebellious and God-opposing spirit. And accordingly three several attempts were made to identify Peter as a follower of Jesus, and so to involve him in the same condemnation. Fear overcame the disciple, and although forewarned, he swore 'that he knew not the man.'

We have before us, then, the best and worst of the twelve apostles, in their natural characters. The record, like all others, is for our instruction. For while the Christian conflict lasts, the adversary (not, thank God, a supernatural being—or our case were hard indeed!—but an incarnation of the blind perverse God-defying spirit, of degraded humanity, and therefore on a level with ourselves) is, in one shape or another, always at hand, to ensnare the 'sons of God.' He attempted, but in vain, to seduce Jesus. In Judas he found a willing instrument with which to accomplish his designs. And Peter, in a moment of sudden terror, was caught in his snare. and but for the prayers of Jesus, would have made shipwreck of his faith.

We may at any time, should God permit, be placed in the same position as Peter, with the enemies of both truth and freedom of conscience, in the ascendant, and the promises and declared purposes of God, apparently contradicted by his providence; and when to openly confess the truth, would be to incur insult, persecution, or death. Where then can we look for support? We may think perhaps, that we would neither betray the cause nor deny the Lord! But we cannot foresee the effect that might be wrought upon us by 'seducing spirits,' or by terror. Nor is it intended that we should be strong in a prospective resolution—since 'sufficient unto each day is the evil therefore,' but in a certain solidity and firmness of character, developed in us by the faith which is in Christ; and thus, should the evil day come, we too will have an advocate with the Father, even Jesus.

We must remember that, in respect to our moral and spiritual strength, we are but on a par with what the apostles were, previous to Pentecost. The apostles were specially prepared by Jesus Christ, to become the guides, teachers, and spiritual fathers of a new family. We are only as their children, in respect of power. They are the precious foundation stones of the spiritual temple; we are but the far less costly materials which compose its walls. If they had a period of pupilage to undergo, how much more we? And so, by their experience, which is recorded for our instruction, they became fit guides and counsellors for the weak and erring. And while the fate of Judas deters us from mammon-worship, the example of Peter points out where lies both our safety and our strength.

It may be asked, 'why should Peter, who denied Christ, have found 'grace to help in time of need,' when Judas, who betrayed him, was left to eat the fruit of his own ways?' Now we think that this question is important, and that the answer to it contains the very depth of the instruction to be derived from the narrative. Indeed, the parable of the 'tower' teaches the identical truths of which Peter and Judas were the living examples. Peter had long loved the Lord, while Judas loved only himself. Peter was earnest and zealous in behalf of his ill treated master, but wanted more moral courage. Judas was sordid and selfish, coolly calculating for how much money he could sell him to his enemies. Peter was hasty but sincere, but Judas was a hypocrite! Peter was overcome in a moment of strange terror, and seeing Jesus apparently deserted by the divine power, denied him! But there was the broad and deep foundation of love for the Lord beneath all, and his faith failed not. Judas, in the plenitude of Christ's power, conspired with his enemies to betray him: but when he saw what he had accomplished,—when he saw the power of God yielding to his schemes, then he became aware of the pit yawning beneath his feet! and having neither faith nor love, despair seized him. God knoweth them that love him, and distinguishes between the natural weakness of human nature, surprised into fault in untried circumstances, and the sordid opposition of such as deliberately plot to bring about their own wicked ends. Hence, Peter found mercy, while Judas met the fate due to premeditated treachery. Prov. i. 24-31: vi. 16-19.

While then we are warned by the fate of Judas, never to parley with evil, nor to listen to the suggestions of the flesh, when truth and honor are at stake,—never to attempt to mock Jehovah, we may learn from the example of Peter, never to despair, although in a moment of weakness, overcome by a new and strange temptation, we should even deny the truth. Only let us cultivate a deep and unchangeable love for the Lord Jesus, and have it abounding in our hearts. For, as a ball thrown into the air speedily returns, drawn by the attraction of gravity, so will we—though for a moment, through the accident of temptation, we are detached from our allegiance, —instantly return to it, by the force of that love, which 'never fails.' Only let us have fervent love in our hearts. Let it be 'without dissimulation.' Let us not pretend what we do not feel, lest we not only kill ourselves, but prove stumbling blocks to our brethren.—Lest we incur the reproach, 'I would thou wert cold or hot.' And should it please our heavenly Father to test our faith and affection, by permitting the enemy to assail us, we may be sure that the intercession of Jesus will be efficacious for us, as it was for Peter, and that we also, shall be delivered out of the 'snare of the devil.'

"I say not that I will pray the Father for you, for the Father himself loveth you, because ye have loved me, and have believed that I came from God."—John xvi. 26-27.—J. W. S., in Reflector of Divine Truth.

"IT WON'T HURT ME TO READ ANYTHING!"

Are you sure of that, young man? Have you gone over the path of life to its farthest verge and seen and known all that can make or mar your destiny? Are those wonderful organs of reason and passion and force, that make up the brain, to receive no further development? Are you to make no growth in the onward march of life? Or do you only care to grovel with the beasts, with no end or aim before you?

Ah! young man, you need a chart, you need a compass, for already you have steered far out of the way, demoralizing yourself, searing your conscience, and wrecking your virtue.

Does it not "hurt you" to associate with those who are profane; who drink and lie and steal and murder? You know it does. You know that the vices of others are readily copied into your own life, that the constant companionship of evil men, will corrupt you, ruin you.

Just so it is when you make companions of bad books. It is only associating with bad men in another way. You are conversing with them, and they with you. Your brain is being influenced—the growth of the higher organs is being dwarfed—that of the lower ones accelerated. They are talking more freely to you than they could if actually in your presence; are having a worse influence, because you have no chance to reply.

Let bad books alone. They will not only "hurt" but they will RUIN you—ruin your memories, your morals, your characters—everything that is good about you.

No young man can say that "it will not hurt him to read anything," until he is already far on the road to destruction—until he has already become drunk with novels, and poisoned with the insidious drops, from the Upas tree of Infidelity. The history, the melancholy death of thousands of young men, attest the truth of what I say. There can be no high, true life, no happiness, no peace, without faith and hope. These must come from God—from the one Book that he has put into our hands to secure our salvation.

Read, and be guided by the Book. It will give you aims that are worthy, a training of which you will not be ashamed—a life that will know no change nor end.

S. ROXANA WIXOM.

INFIDELITY.

Why are so many, especially young men and young women, giving up all faith in the Bible as a divine book? Why have the writings and oral lectures of Mr. Ingersoll produced such a harvest of doubt and infidelity in all ranks of human society? Their baleful influence has invaded the churches, and the effect is but poorly disguised by professions of piety and the observance of forms and ceremonies. Has this Philistine, this Goliath of modern infidelity accomplished something more in the line of argumentation and criticism against the Bible? Not at all. His objections to the claims of this heavenly guide, and to the Christian system in particular are but a rehash of the arguments used by infidels for centuries to overthrow God's word. These he has dressed up in a style of language and rhetorical embellishment peculiar to himself, so fitting them for the rostrum, and for showing off his views to the best advantage before a popular audience, most of whom are only too willing that infidelity should seem to be proven true that they may shake off all responsibility to such a God as the Bible reveals.

His assertions well spiced with wit, humor, puthos, and what phrenologists would call human nature, readily pass current for sound logic, and veritable truth, when they are neither. The great pillars on which the divine authority of the word of God rests remain unmoved, as Gibraltars of strength, in which the Christian may feel safe against the assaults of the whole infidel army.

If Mr. Ingersoll can by fair argument and criticism destroy the credibility of the witnesses to all the leading facts in the history of Christ's earthly career, and the facts in the ministry of the apostles; meet and overthrow the argument drawn from fulfilled prophecy in reference to kingdoms and cities of ancient and modern times, and show that christianity does not subserve the highest interests of mankind, enjoining the most perfect purity of life, and inspiring the noblest hopes; when he has done this, then, and not till then, will we give up the Bible. Come, Mr. Ingersoll, try your hand at this.

TAKE NOTICE.

By an error on the part of our pressman, we have on hand an extra lot of our four-page tracts, and persons wishing tracts to distribute should avail themselves of this opportunity at once. There are four kinds: "Can you believe," "Age to come not a heresy," "State of man in death," and "Life and death." We will send postpaid 50 copies of these tracts for 20c., or 100 copies for 35c.

We have also just printed a new edition of "A Letter to a Friend," on the covenants of promise, by Mrs. C.C. Woodruff. Single copies 10c., seven for 50c., sixteen for $1.00.

The COVENANTS.

A TREATISE ON,

I. The Abrahamic covenant, its terms, its extent, its duration, its covenantees, and when powerful.

II. The Sinaitic covenant, its terms, its relation to the Abrahamic covenant, where given, to whom given, the unity of the Law, its duration and its termination, the Sabbath and its purposes.

III. The New covenant, the covenantees—not the church, but Israel: conditional prophecy considered, restoration from Babylon considered, future restoration of Israel to covenantees, our relation to the New covenant—as the Seed of the Abrahamic covenant, as the Mediation body, as a Royal and an Eternal Priesthood—now upon the plane of the flesh and soul, then through the veil upon the plane of spirit; restoration of the Aaronical order of priesthood in the house of Zadoc under the Prince and subordinate to the royal priesthood; the necessity and the nature of sacrifice in the ages to come.

IV. The Davidian covenant, its terms, the kingdom divided, the kingdom removed, the seed chastised, the kingdom to be restored under Messiah, the reign eternal.

V. Twelve objections to the position, that the kingdom of Christ in organization is yet future, answered, and the law of induction into the kingdom of the birth of the water and of the spirit.

This work is now in press and will be ready for distribution in June or early in July. It will make from 600 to 650 pages, and will sell for $1 per copy. We are now receiving names for the work, to be paid when the book is delivered. We want your assistance. Give us your name for the work.

The Restitution.

"THE RESTITUTION OF ALL THINGS WHICH GOD HATH SPOKEN BY THE MOUTH OF ALL HIS HOLY PROPHETS SINCE THE WORLD BEGAN."

VOL. XXXI. PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, JUNE 14, 1882. NO. 22.

THE RESTITUTION.

TERMS—TWO DOLLARS PER YEAR, Payable in advance. Three and Six Months at the same rate.

Address all Letters and Communications to THE RESTITUTION, Plymouth, Indiana.

TO CORRESPONDENTS:

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of Kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as pre-requisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

ORIENTAL SKETCHES.—No. 17.

Bashan and Its Giant Cities.

J. L. PORTER, A. M.

"Jurisdiction is come upon all the cities of the land of Moab, far and near."

Saleah is situated on the south-eastern corner of Bashan. Standing on the lofty battlements of its castle, Moab and Arabia lay before me—the former on the right, the latter on the left, each a boundless plain reaching from the city walls to the horizon. Behind me rose in terraced slopes the mountains of Bashan, and over their southern declivity the eye took in a wide expanse of its plain. Everywhere on that vast panorama,—on plain and mountain side, in Bashan, Moab, and Arabia, for as the eye could see and the telescope command,—were towns and villages thickly scattered; and all deserted, though not ruined. Many people might have thought, and a few still believe, that there was a large amount of Eastern exaggeration in the language of Moses when describing the conquest of this country three thousand years ago: "We took all his cities at that time, . . . . three-score cities, all the region of Argob, the kingdom of Og in Bashan. All these cities were fenced with high walls, gates, and bars; besides unwalled towns a great many." Deut. iii. 4, 5. No man who has traversed Bashan, or who has climbed the hill of Saleah, will ever again venture to bring such a charge against the sacred historian. The walled cities, with their ponderous gates of stone, are there now as they were when the Ishmaelites invaded the land. The great numbers of unwalled towns are there too, standing testimonies to the truth and accuracy of Moses, and monumental protests against the poetical interpretations of modern rationalists. There are the roads once thronged by the teeming population; there are the fields they enclosed and cultivated; there are the terraces they built up; there are the vineyards and orchards they planted; all alike desolate, not poetically or ideally, but literally "without man, and without inhabitant, and without beast."

My friend Mr. Cyril Graham, who followed so far in my track, and who was the first of European travellers to penetrate those plains beyond, which I have been trying to describe, bears his testimony to the literal fulfillment of prophecy. Some of his descriptions of what he saw are exceedingly interesting and graphic; and one is only sorry that they are so very brief. Of Bothgamul he says: "On reaching this city, I left my Arabs at one particular spot, and wandered about quite alone in the old streets of the town, entered one by one the old houses, went up stairs, visited the rooms, and, in short, made a careful examination of the whole place; but so perfect was every street, every house, every room, that I almost fancied I was in a dream, wandering alone in this city of the dead, seeing all perfect, yet not hearing a sound. I don't wish too moralize too much, but one cannot help reflecting on a people once so great and so powerful, who, living in those houses of stone within their walled cities, must have thought themselves invincible: who had their palaces and their sculptures, and who, no doubt, claimed to be the great nation, as all Eastern nations have done; and that this people should have so passed away, that for so many centuries the country they inhabited has been reckoned as a desert, until some traveller from a distant land, curious to explore these regions, finds these old towns standing alone, and telling of a race long gone by, whose history is unknown, and whose very name is a matter of dispute. Yet this very state of things is predicted by Jeremiah. Concerning this very country he says these very words,—'For the cities thereof shall be desolate, without any to dwell therein,' Jer. xlviii. 9; and the people (Moab) 'shall be destroyed from being a people,' ver. 42. Here I think there can be no ambiguity. Visit these ancient cities, and turn to that ancient Book—no further comment is necessary."

No less than eleven of the old cities which I saw from Saleah, lying between Bozrah and Beth-gamul, were visited by Mr. Graham. Their ramparts, their houses, their streets, their gates and doors, are nearly all perfect; and yet they are "desolate without man." This enterprising and daring traveller also made a long journey into the hitherto unexplored country east of the mountains of Bashan. There he found ancient cities, and roads, and vast numbers of inscriptions in unknown characters, but not a single inhabitant. The towns and villages east of the mountain range are all, without exception, deserted, the soil is uncultivated, and "the highways lie waste." In the whole of those vast plains, north and south, east and west, desolation reigns supreme. The cities, the highways, the vineyards, the fields, are all alike silent as the grave, except during the periodical migrations of the Bedawin, whose flocks, herds, and people eat, trample down, and waste all before them. The long predicted doom of Moab is now fulfilled: "The spoiler shall come upon every city, and no city shall escape: the valley also shall perish, and the plain shall be destroyed, as the Lord hath spoken. Give wings unto Moab, that it may flee and get away; for the cities thereof shall be desolate, without any to dwell therein."... But why should I transcribe more? Why should I continue to compare the predictions of the Bible with the state of the country? The harmony is complete. No traveller can possibly fail to see it; and no conscientious man can fail to acknowledge it. The best, the fullest, the most instructive commentary I ever saw on the forty-eighth chapter of Jeremiah, was that inscribed by the finger of God on the panorama spread out around me as I stood on the battlements of the castle of Saleah.

It was a sad and solemn scene,—a scene of utter and terrible desolation,—the result of sin and folly; and yet I turned away from it with much reluctance. I would gladly have seen more of these old cities, and penetrated farther into that uninhabited plain. A tempting field lay there for the ecclesiastical antiquarian and the student of sacred history; but the time was not suitable for such a journey, and other duties summoned me away.*

Remounting our horses we rode along the silent streets and passed out of the deserted gates into the desolate country. After winding down the steep hill-side amid mounds of rubbish we halted in the centre of an ancient cemetery to take a last look of Saleah. The castle rose high over us on the crest of its conical hill, while the towers, walls, and terraced houses of the city extended in a serried line down the southern declivity to the plain, where they met the old gardens and vineyards. Everything seemed so complete, so habitable, so life-like, that once and again I looked and examined as the question rose in my mind, "Can this this city be totally deserted?" Yes, it was so;—"without man, and without beast."

"Slumber is there, but not of rest:
Here her forlorn and weary nest
The famish'd hawk has found,
The wild dog howls at fall of night,
The serpent's rustling coils affright
The traveller on his round."

*Another traveller has of late traversed part of Bashan, and penetrated the desert eastward. I refer to Dr. J. C. Wetzstein, whom I had the pleasure of knowing as Russian consul in Damascus. His little work, Reisebericht über Hauran und die Trachonen, Berlin, 1860, is interesting and instructive. It contains the fullest account hitherto published of that remarkable region, the Safa.

The Anglo-Saxons Have Received the Blessings Promised to Israel.

In a former article I showed that great increase was promised to Israel. Now we know that the Anglo-Saxons have received this blessing, but it will appear that they have received it as promised to Israel as we proceed.

In Gen. xxii. 17 the Lord says to Abraham, "That in blessing I will bless thee, and in multiplying I will multiply thy seed as the stars of the heaven, and as the sand which is upon the sea shore; and thy seed shall possess the gate of his enemies."

Gen. xxiv. 60: "And they blessed Rebekah, and said unto her, Thou art our sister, be thou the mother of thousands of millions, and let thy seed possess the gate of those which hate them."

These texts are quoted to show that to Israel was promised the gate of their enemies. Are the Anglo-Saxons occupying these positions? The word "gate" is interpreted to mean a stronghold, a strategic point, in or near the enemy's country, or an important island or harbor on the great highway of nations—the ocean-waters. That it not only bears this interpretation but that it is the most reasonable is evident because it can not mean a literal gate for the reason that the literal gates of the ancients are done away, and, I believe, we have no reason to suppose that they will ever be revived. This being then, the most reasonable interpretation I will give a few examples of such places held by the British nation, which belong by right of location to their enemies' lands or dominions. I shall not be able to give much of a description of them for space will not allow it, neither is it here necessary.

Gibraltar at the southern extremity of Spain is a standing menace to that country, and if it does not control the entrance to the Mediterranean, it overlooks it and has a commanding appearance.

Perim is a small island belonging to Great Britain, and is situated in the strait of Babel-Mandeb at the entrance to the Red Sea. It owes its importance wholly to its commanding position at the entrance of this sea.

Malta is an island in British possession in the Mediterranean. "From its position, and also from the enormous strength of the fortifications, it is a possession of immense value to any commercial nation which possesses a navy strong enough to prevent it being blockaded."

Bombay is an island on the west of Hindustan and possessed by the British. "The bay towards the mainland, even its natural state, presents one of the finest havens in India, more particularly as being one of the few on the east side of the Arabian Sea which are accessible during the southwest monsoon."

The Channel Islands off the coast of France, should war in any way ensue with that country, would be of immense value as a strategic point; and the same may be said of Cyprus if war ensues in that section.

For much of the foregoing information I am indebted to the "Library of Universal Knowledge." Other points could be mentioned, but these have already occupied all the space that can be afforded. However I think we can safely set it down as a truth that the Anglo-Saxons are occupying Israel's Scriptural position in this respect. Let me here quote the words of the Lord to Israel: "I will not give my glory to another."

Gen. xxviii. 14: "And thy seed shall be as the dust of the earth, and thou shalt spread abroad to the west, and to the east, and to the north and to the south; and in thee and in thy seed shall all the families of the earth be blessed."

"Spread abroad" does not mean scattered without an abiding place, but that they should control the localities in which they would dwell. The Anglo-Saxons are occupying these positions. But the Lord said to Israel, "I will not give my glory to another." Has he proved unfaithful?

"And God said unto him, I am God Almighty: be fruitful and multiply: a nation and a company of nations shall be of thee, and kings shall come out of thee." Gen. xxxv. 11.

"And his father refused, and said, I know it, my son, I know it: he also shall be great; but truly his younger brother shall be greater than he, and his seed shall become a multitude (marg., fulness) of nations." Gen. xlviii. 19.

If we let England's colonies represent branches of the British people, which certainly they are, and let a branch represent a nation, we have in this people a company of nations; and we have in the United States the nation. A company of nations does not imply an entire separation. I will allow that, to my mind, to literally fill the bill, a confederation of geographically seperated people would be required. England is working towards this, and may not this be the case in the near future? She at least closely approximates this point and a confederation is being agitated. To me the Anglo-Saxons are fulfilling this prophecy, and will more literally. Is the Lord truthful to say to Israel, "I will not give my glory to another," and then give this blessing to another people?

In Num. xxiii. 8–10, 22–24, and xxiv. 8, 9 we read: "How shall I curse whom the Lord hath not cursed? or how shall I defy, whom the Lord hath not defied? For from the top of the rocks I see him, and from the hills I behold him: lo the people shall dwell alone, and shall not be reckoned among the nations. Who can count the dust of Jacob, and number the fourth part of Israel? Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like his!" "God brought him forth out of Egypt: he hath as it were the strength of an unicorn: he shall eat up the nations his enemies, and pierce them through with his arrows. He couched, he lay down as a lion, and as a great lion: who shall stir him up? Blessed is he that blesseth thee, and cursed is he that curseth thee."

The Anglo-Saxons have received the promises set forth in this Scripture. They dwell alone, and are not reckoned among the nations more than Israel ever was. They have risen up as a great lion and have great strength. They have drank the blood of the slain, and eaten up the nations, their enemies, unless they have yielded obedience to them. Why are they represented as a lion and unicorn if it was not that they were to be represented by these on their standards? Whatever answer we make to this it still remains true that the Anglo-Saxons have fulfilled this Scripture. And yet the Lord said to Israel, "I will not give my glory to another."

Deut. xxxiii. 17, 19: "His glory is like the firstling of his bullock, and his horns are like the horns of unicorns: with them he shall push the people together to the ends of the earth; and they are the ten thousands of Ephraim, and they the thousands of Manasseh." "They shall call the people unto the mountains: there they shall offer sacrifices of righteousness; for they shall suck of the abundance of the seas and of treasures hid in the sand."

The Anglo-Saxons have indeed sucked the abundance of the seas, and wherever they have gone they have been pushing the people to the ends of the earth unless they become submissive; and this is Israel's position because the Lord said, "The nation and kingdom that will not serve thee shall perish; yea those nations shall be utterly wasted." Isa. ix. 11. Has God proven unfaithful to Israel and given "his glory to another?"

Psa. cxlvii. 19, 20: "He sheweth his word unto Jacob, his statutes and his judgments unto Israel. He hath not dealt so with any nation; and as for his judgments, they have not known them. Praise ye the Lord."

You see the language the Lord uses, and yet the Anglo-Saxons are in possession of these blessings! Dare we accuse him of unfaithfulness to Israel?

Micah v. 8: "And the remnant of Jacob shall be among the Gentiles in the midst of many people as a lion among the beasts of the forest, as a young lion among the flocks of sheep: who, if he go through, both treadeth down, and teareth in pieces, and none can deliver."

Please bear in mind that there will be no remnant after the union, and then say where the people are that answer to this description if they be not the Anglo-Saxons! And yet, can we believe the Lord has proved so unfaithful to Israel and given this glory to another?

I have, in a former article, shown that Israel was to be multiplied in numbers in this dispensation, and as that blessing was based on obedience, they therefore must be a Christian people; and being a Christian people they would evangelize and thus begin the fulfillment of the promise to Abraham that "in thee and in thy seed shall all nations of the earth be blessed." The following texts show this:

"And he said, It is a light thing that thou shouldst be my servant to raise up the tribes of Jacob, and to restore the preserved of Israel: I will also give thee for a light to the Gentiles, that thou mayest be my salvation unto the ends of the earth." Isa. xlix. 6.

"And the remnant of Jacob shall be in the midst of many people as a dew from the Lord, as the showers upon the grass that tarrieth not for man, nor waiteth for the sons of men." Micah v. 7.

These texts tell us what Israel was to do and be, but, as with all the other promises we have quoted, the Anglo-Saxons have been in possession of these also. And here I wish to particularly emphasize the promise of the Lord to Israel: "I will not give my glory unto another."

With what is before us I think we can safely say that the Anglo-Saxons have been occupying the positions assigned or given to Israel. But what does all this amount to?

It is true I have quoted one sentence repeatedly, showing that these positions were reserved for Israel, but do the Scriptures at large support this? Is it true that the Scriptures state, or that they in any way give as truth, or even leave room for strong probability that Israel was to be supplanted by a pure Gentile nation in the promises that God made to them? The Scriptures are our only answer. What do they say?

In Isa. xlviii. 11 will be found that sentence already quoted. The 1st, 9th, 10th and 11th verses read: "Hear ye this, O house of Jacob, which are called by the name of Israel, and are come forth out the waters of Judah, which swear by the name of the Lord and make mention of the God of Israel, but not in truth, nor in righteousness." "For my name's sake will I defer mine anger, and for my praise will I refrain for thee, that I cut thee not off. Behold, I have refined thee, but not with silver: I have chosen thee in the furnace of affliction. For mine own sake, even for mine own sake, will I do it; for how should my name be polluted? and I will not give my glory unto another."

This must mean the kingdom—the ten tribes, for they are the house of Jacob which came forth from the waters, peoples, of Judah. Although they have been great transgressors the Lord will defer, put off, his anger.

Isa. xlii. 6–8: "I the Lord have called thee in righteousness, and will hold thine hand, and will keep thee, and give thee for a covenant of the people, a light of the Gentiles; to open the blind eyes, to bring out the prisoners from the prison, and them that sit in darkness out of the prison house. I am the Lord; that is my name; and my glory I will not give to another, neither my praise to graven images."

It may be said that this refers to the Savior; but what if it does? It applies also to Israel as associates. If it had applied to the Savior alone, there would have been no need of saying he would not give this praise to graven images."

In Isa. xlix. 3, 5 we read: "Thou art my servant, O Israel, in whom I will be glorified." "And now, saith the Lord that formed me from the womb to be his servant, to bring Jacob again to him, Though Israel be not gathered, yet shall I be glorious in the eyes of the Lord, and my God shall be my strength."

In this language we learn that it was in Israel the Lord was to be glorified, and when they would exhibit his glory, for it is even when they are not gathered they will be glorious in the eyes of the Lord.

But Isaiah further says, in sentences like the following: "I have created him for my glory." "They shall shew forth my praise." "O Israel thou shalt not be forgotten of me." And the promises of perpetuity in Jer. xxxi. 35, 36; xxxiii. 17, 20, 21 set forth the same truth.

We are not, however, left to the old prophetic Scriptures for evidence, for Paul, down in this dispensation, sets forth the same truth. In Rom. ix. 1–5 he says: "I say the truth in Christ, I lie not, my conscience also bearing me witness in the Holy Ghost, that I have great heaviness and continual sorrow in my heart (for I myself was wishing to be accursed from Christ—see Diaglott) for my brethren, my kinsmen according to the flesh; who are Israelites; to whom pertaineth the adoption, and the glory, and the covenants, and the giving of the law, and the service of God, and the promises; whose are the fathers, and of whom as concerning the flesh Christ came, who is over all, God blessed forever. Amen."

I am glad the apostle has spoken so plainly, for had he not we would have had the Old Testament teaching on this subject applied to the future ages, but now even in this age these things pertain to Israel. I do not, however, in the least infer, much less advance the thought, that pure Gentiles are not adopted into the family of Israel and become, in a measure, supplementary; but no nation or people will ever supplant the nation of Israel in the blessings promised to them, in this age or any other. This is shown by the apostle in this chapter, by showing that the nation of Israel was elected or predestinated without works. But lest I be accused of teaching that individuals are elected in this manner, I will say individuals are not thus elected to salvation; they have something to do to make their "calling and election sure;" but Israel was elected to occupy certain positions on account of Abraham, yet individuals of the nation will be lost.

In chapter xi. 25 the apostle says: "For I would not brethren, that ye should be ignorant of this mystery, lest ye should be wise in your own conceits; that blindness in part has happened to Israel, until the fulness of the Gentiles be come in."

Please notice that this is a Gentile fulness and it is in no sense the supplement to Israel. And who was to become a fulness of Gentiles? I trust there is no reader of THE RESTITUTION but that can give a Scriptural answer to this question. What part of Israel is here represented as being blind? Assuredly not the Gentile fulness, who are to come in, but the Jews. The reader will at once see the force of this, for the Gentile fulness being Israel of the ten tribes the Lord is not giving "his glory to another."

Verses 25–29: "And so all Israel shall be saved: as it is written, There shall come out of Zion the Deliverer, and shall turn away ungodliness from Jacob; for this is my covenant unto them, when I shall take away their sins. As concerning the gospel, they are enemies for your sakes; but as touching the election they are beloved for the fathers' sakes. For the gifts and calling of God are without repentance."

God does not repent of his calling of Israel, or his gifts to them, to the Jewish house and also the house of Joseph; and so he does not give "his glory to another." It can not be that the apostle refers principally to pure Gentiles, but to the Gentile fulness, of whom he had been speaking; for Israel, or part of Israel, was not blinded for the Gentiles' sakes, for Israel was to be the light of the Gentiles, and they could not be this and be blinded. But a flood of light rests on the Scriptures, and this portion in particular, when we understand that one house was to become the Gentile fulness and that the Jews must be blinded in order that they should hear the gospel and fulfill those promises made to them which they could not fulfill when recognized as Israel. I can not avoid the conclusion that the Gentile converts of the apostle were mostly, or largely at least, composed of Israelites but not known as such, they having lost their identity until God's time to say to them, "Ye are the sons of the living God." But suppose they were not, we are still forced to believe that many of them were such from the following:

The commission to evangelize reads as follows: "Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature." Was this confined to the apostles and their immediate successors? or did it embrace all believers, more or less, in this dispensation? Did not the commission embrace all that is in the following language: "And this gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the world for a witness unto all nations and then shall the end come." Who was to go on with the work after the apostles and their immediate successors? We have already seen that this was Israel's work, but the Anglo-Saxons have been doing it!

The Identity, as it is called, shows why the gospel traveled in a westerly direction rather than any other; because the ten tribes were traveling westward when the apostle was preaching, and not because the other apostles lacked power, for they had the same Spirit. It shows why the Anglo-Saxons are the dispensers of the Word more than other Gentile nations, and why it has remained with them. But even being Israel, why, it might be asked, did they accept it more readily than others? I answer, because, although they were idolatrous, and lost, their previous training for centuries in the wilderness and in their own land had not been lost, but they were in that condition of which the apostle speaks: "For when the Gentiles which have not the law do by nature the things contained in the law, these, having not the law, are a law unto themselves."

I close with the following: Does not the history of the Anglo-Saxons show that they were few in number when they settled in the British Islands? And during what is called the dark ages was not the same true of the Jews? It seems to me that increase or decrease can not be in any way controlled by time, but is alone controlled by obedience or disobedience. It would not be surprising to me if great decrease would yet be true of both these people before their final restitlement in the land of promise, but be this as it may it in no case effects the question at issue; which is: Are the Anglo-Saxons the descendants of exiled Israel? It does not effect the question because God made great and precious promises to Israel which he gave to no other people, and said that they were without repentance, and further, that he would not give his glory to another; therefore, as we find the Anglo-Saxons are in possession of some of the most important of these promises, I conclude they must be Israel. But should both houses decrease we may yet be assured of one fact: that no other nation will occupy their Scriptural positions; no other people will preach the Word as they, no other people will become a fulness of nations. If they forget their Sabbath, no other people will take it up in their stead. What other people has set the captives free? To what people do the oppressed look for help if not the Anglo-Saxons? And who so liberally responds to the hungry for bread? I am not advocating that they do not many things which are evil, but that no other people will ever so show forth the praises of the Lord.

Free Bible Meeting.

There will be a free Bible meeting held at the Dunker School House, Millbrook, Mich., beginning June 15, and continuing over Sunday. Two sessions of Bible Class daily for questions, answers and investigation. Two sermons daily, with prayer, conference, and praise meetings. Careful and thorough papers on the following subjects will be presented: The second coming of the Lord, R. Bailey; Manner of his coming, Dr. E. B. Tucker; Objects of his coming, O. T. White; The Restitution—what does it include? Wm. C. Wells; Israel in the next age, and the Nations in the next age, B. Woodward; Rulership, O. R. L. Crozier; Eternal Life, L. Bower; Immortality, C. A. Meade; The Church—its nature, mission, and final triumph, John Bowser. The whole in the spirit of Christian candor and devout loyalty to Christ, seeking to know the truth for its own sake and for the character it makes. An address of welcome will be given by O. R. L. Crozier, pastor of Millbrook Church.

THE RESTITUTION.

S. A. CHAPLIN, EDITOR.

Plymouth, Indiana, June 14, 1882.

WEDNESDAY, June 14.—Just arrived home from our Eastern tour this morning. Preached to the church in Philadelphia Sunday last. As the paper is nearly ready for the press we defer particulars.

EDITORIAL CORRESPONDENCE.

Thursday morning, June 8, finds us at the kind and hospitable home of Brother R. Willard, Haddonfield, N. J. once more. We bade farewell to the friends in Brooklyn yesterday, and took the cars at Jersey City for Philadelphia at 11 A. M., and arrived at the latter city at 2:20 P. M. We called on Brother Samuel Wilson and arranged to preach for the brethren in Philadelphia on Sunday, June 11.

At our last two meetings on Sunday, June 4, in Brooklyn, we spoke on the proximity of the cleansing of the sanctuary as indicated by the progress of events in the world's history through the times of the Gentiles, and as symbolized in the sections of the Great Metallic Image, and then on the relations sustained by those generations who are living at the times when the periods measuring the dispensations of God's grace are about expiring. After the restoration of the Jews from the Babylonian captivity, 490 years were given as the measure of their restored nationality before the final destruction of their commonwealth by the Romans. The generation living at the close of this period were named by the Messiah and the apostles, and called upon to accept the Son of God as King and Heir to the throne of David. They rejected him and his claims to sovereignty, and the accumulated vengeance of centuries fell upon the obdurate race. The seventy weeks ran out A. D. 70–73, and the destroyer came. The holy and beautiful house was burned, the city destroyed, and the people carried away into a long and doleful captivity.

Since then Jerusalem has been trodden under foot by the Gentiles, and abominations Pagan, Papal, and Mohammedan have held the supremacy till the present time.

Now the point has just about been reached where the remaining part of the long period of 2300 days, or years, allotted to these desecrating powers for trampling God's sanctuary places under foot, is to expire, and the Jewish fig tree is beginning to bud after the long winter of us ays, and the floods of Ottoman desolation are, at the same time, rapidly evaporating. The generation now living at the close of this period has been most solemnly admonished that the coming of the Lord for his saints is an event of the near future, and that this dispensation of the grace of God to the Gentiles is soon to close. The masses have exhibited the same hardened unbelief as their Jewish proto-types, and the world is doomed to a destruction more signal and overwhelming than marked Jerusalem's overthrow.

As we now view the relations of the generations to the prophetical periods, and the relations of some of the longest periods to each other, the 2520 years—the seven times of the duration of the kingdoms symbolized by the Great Image—measuring from the times of Nebuchadnezzar and his conquest of Jerusalem B. C. 606–597, to A. D. 1914–1923, while the 2300 years measure from the complete restoration from this conquest B. C. 420–417 to A. D. 1880–1883, leaving a period of 40 years for the work of consummation.

The three events now first due are the wresting of Palestine from the power and control of the Ottoman, the partial restoration of Judah, and the rapture of the saints. In other words the next generation period—1883–1923—seems to be the consummating generation that shall not pass till all of which Jesus spoke shall be accomplished.

These themes formed the subjects of our remarks to the brethren of the "Church of the Blessed Hope" in Brooklyn on the third and last Sunday that it was our privilege to address them. We met quite a number of the brotherhood who have a place of worship in another part of the city, found them strong in the gospel faith and hope, and enjoyed our intercourse with them very much.

All the brethren are intelligent in the things concerning the kingdom, and the gospel hope and requirements. They manifest a kind Christian spirit toward all. They are not disposed to crush the uninstructed by a haughty supercilious scornful treatment, but rather to instruct in the way of the Lord more perfectly. If those with whom they have intercourse have learned some truth they give them credit for it and kindly try to instruct them farther, and thus win them entirely over to Christ in all his relations to our poor fallen humanity as Savior, Prophet, Priest and King. The kindness manifested to ourself while with them, will be gratefully remembered while we live. It has been to us a bright sunny spot in our pilgrimage.

While we feel that all that we were able to say in our humble ministrations, seems a slight equivalent for the sacrifice made that we might have this temporary release from our continued and perplexing labors, yet we hope, and pray that all will be more than made up to our kind friends who have given us this respite from pressing cares in the enjoyment of Christian intercourse with them in worship and in every way that they thought would promote our gratification. To Bro. Driggs we are indebted for a day of pleasurable recreation on the shores of the Atlantic at Brighton Beach, to Bro. G. W. Young for conducting us to the Grand Central Telegraph Office, the Treasury Building, the Stock Exchange, the Tribune Buildings, the Wonderful Safety Vaults of the Park Bank, the Governor's Rooms in New York, the Park and Park Museums and other places of interest; to Bro. J. B. Cook and his kind family for conducting us to libraries of rare and interesting books, for procuring us on the Great Pyramid and the Egyptian Obelisk for our perusal and for attending us to the Obelisk itself; and to other brethren for many tokens of their esteem.

Perhaps in this connection we may mention that we were twice at the celebrated Old Trinity Church, and not only looked through this celebrated place of worship but also through its cemetery where are to be found the memorial stones of the dead dating all the way back for two hundred years. The oldest is placed at the head of the grave of Richard Churcher who died August 5, 1681; while side by side lies Annie Churcher, who was buried May 15, 1691, aged 17 years and three-quarters. On these old crumbling stones the epitaphs are becoming almost illegible, while on others, they have become entirely past deciphering. In another place is deposited William Bradford, who died May 3, 1752, aged 92 years. He was printer for the Government for upwards of fifty years. He was born at Leicestershire, England, 1660, and came over to America in 1682, before Philadelphia was laid out. In another part of this cemetery is the final resting place of Alexander Hamilton, who was killed in a duel by Aaron Burr, July 11, 1801. He fell lamented by the entire nation, as he was a man of eminent abilities both in a military and financial point of view. We were shown here, on a former visit a few years ago the place where Charlotte Temple rests within a grave that has no stone nor name, and which can only be pointed out as it was to us, by a sexton who knows the whole grounds. It is with feelings of melancholy that our looks at these old crumbling stones that toll of crumbled communited dust below. Here repose those who saw New York when it was a mere village, and when swamps and wilds covered the grounds now occupied by buildings that have cost millions. The city of mighty activities has replaced the hamlet, and millions of hearts have palpitated with all the emotions of joy and sorrow, hope and despair, love and hate, since death dried up the tears, and quenched the burning sorrows of the heads and the hearts that are now dust below. The millions now living here are all on the way to "dusky death," and the hearse is daily bearing away its dismal freight to the place of graves. How true:

> "'Tis the twink of an eye, 'tis the draft of a breath,
> From the blossom of health to the paleness of death;
> From the gilded saloon to the bier and the shroud.
> O why should the spirit of mortal be proud?"

In looking over New York Harbor, and up the Hudson River, we could but think of the lone ship of Henry Hudson as he sailed up this river in 1608—his being the first ship that disturbed those waters where a forest of masts may be seen lining the shores, and where the waters are always in a continual commotion from the passing craft of every name—and then think what changes thou has wrought in the commerce of the world. In 1621 the first buildings were erected in the lower part of the city which has now become one of the world's great trade centres. We will once more bid our readers an adieu till we resume our pencil for another familiar communication.

Haddonfield, N. J., June 8, 1882.

To the brethren of Michigan and Indiana I will say, I will again take up the sword of the Spirit, and go wherever they may call me. I find the farm work is more than I can stand. I will visit the brethren in Illinois, or any other part of the country if they wish. Address me at St. Joseph, Mich. A. SMITH.

WALKING BY FAITH.

While all men in some sense walk by faith, infidels not excepted, the Christian in a special sense walks by faith. All his conduct and conversation is governed and directed by the word of God. He sows and plants with the assurance that God will bless his toil with the bounties of harvest, multiplying the seed sown. The most worldling sees only the operations of the laws of nature and the change of seasons to bring about the result he anticipates, as though these laws were independent of the Great Lawmaker. On the other hand, the Christian believes that the Creator moves upon his creation, energizing its forces and giving power to its laws and principles. That he is the soul or life of all things: "that in him we live, move, and have our being" (Acts xvii. 28); that "he is not very far from every one of us." Verse 27. That he, the universal soul,

> "—Warms in the sun,
> Refreshes in the breeze,
> Glows in the stars,
> And blossoms in the trees;
> Lives through all life,
> Extends through all extent,
> Spreads undivided,
> Operates unspent."

Paul says, "The life I now live in the flesh I live by the faith of the Son of God." Gal. ii. 20. He knew full well that to live after the flesh—after the lusts of the unrenewed—would end in death. Rom. viii. 13. Mixing the things—the law or the teachings of the Spirit—was the chief concern of the apostle, and a strict adherence to these he urges upon the churches to whom he wrote. This walking by faith or obeying the law of the spirit through or the teachings of Jesus and the apostles was prompted by that mainspring of all Christian effort and labor, faith in things lying beyond the pale of the present life.

Some moralists have insisted that we should do our duty without any reference to a reward. I once saw a small hymn-book which was compiled to suit this theory. The future was left a blank! To me there was no inspiration in such hopeless songs, and the finest music could lend no charm to the poet's numbers. Such a theory is based upon a false philosophy of the mental constitution of man and is out of harmony with the word of God. Even some professed Christians think that a few in the ranks of believers live too much in the future, especially is this the case where the whole conduct, words and temper are a relics of the spiritual and heavenly, in which light the department of the worldly minded Christian appears in too painful contrast. It is true that some men may have a correct view of the future whose lives give the lie to their profession, but they are not walking by faith, they are only talking by faith. They may be in love with theory for theory's sake; or argument's sake, or some other selfish motive. They either do not love the whole truth, or lack the moral courage to live up to its requirements, or lacking charity, knowledge has puffed them up. 1 Cor. viii. 1. No Christian lives too much in the future.

That wonderful and to a large degree mysterious future, the world to come, the kingdom to come, or by whatever name designated, holds in its grand sweep of ages the rarest gifts of our Heavenly Father. The most highly favored of men have caught but a faint glimpse, and enjoyed the merest foretaste of what lies beyond the bounds of the mortal state. Shall the child of faith not walk by faith? Can he toil and suffer without intense longings for his house from heaven? Thy kingdom come! What of this prayer? Was it designed for little more than a cold form of words upon the lips? No. It is the heartfelt and earnest petition of all God's true people.

Can a starving man keep his thoughts off the table where the necessaries and luxuries of life are spread; or a man parching with thirst avoid thinking of the bubbling fountain and cooling draught? So the Christian, feeling keenly his need of the things held in reserve, longs with earnest desire for the grace and glory to be brought unto him at the revelation of Jesus Christ. He is saved by hope—hoping for that he sees not, and waiting patiently for it. Rom. viii. 24, 25. The noblest self-sacrificing men that ever lived were those in whom this hope burned the brightest. Hear Paul, whose life and teachings furnish the fittest illustration, excepting our Savior, of the point here urged. Speaking for himself and his fellow-apostles he says: "We also believe and therefore speak; what? Our faith and hope raise us up (from the dead) also by Jesus and shall present us with you. For this cause we faint not." What is the secret of their heroic fortitude, and unremitting patience under such painful surroundings, and where death in every possible shape confronted them. The ground of it all is here in one of the finest of inspired contrasts: While we look not at the things which are seen, but at the things which are not seen, for the things which are seen are temporal, but the things which are not seen are eternal. 2 Cor. iv. 17 18. This contrast of the two states is continued into the next chapter and shows throughout the importance attached by inspired apostles to the unfulfilled promises of God, as the sustaining power of the gospel, the power that creates every live, and gives to the child of God that moral victory over the world, which shall be the exhibition of the unfallen angels through ages.

WATCH AND PRAY.

A soldier in the enemy's land is never safe. He knows not at what moment or from what point he may be assailed. So he strengthens himself in the mighty power of his leader, and arming himself completely, keeps constant watch against the crafty devices of the foe, praying that his general may so lead the battle that he and his comrades may be able to stand in the evil day.

We, the little few who have been called of God to proclaim the message of a coming king, are soldiers in the enemy's land.

We strengthen ourselves in the mighty power of the Lord. We put on the complete armor of God that we may be able to stand against the potentates of darkness.

We "keep watch with all perseverance for all saints, praying at every season with all prayer and supplication in spirit" that we may with the shield of faith and the sword of the spirit, be able to quench the fiery darts of the wicked.

The evil one lures to get us away from God; he loves to lead us out of the army, and into the world where he can do with us as he pleases. He wants us to grow cold to all the great interests of truth, and alive to the present good in ourselves and friends. He wants us to believe that we will suffer or starve if we work for God, give to God, forgetting that "all things are ours" through Christ. "Watch and pray lest ye enter into trial."

HOW TISCHENDORF OBTAINED THE CODEX SINAITICUS.

The story of how Constantine Tischendorf obtained possession of the valuable manuscript which he found in the Convent of St. Katharine on Mount Sinai, is an exceedingly interesting one. He had long felt that our Bible had many errors, which might be corrected if only he could get hold of the old copies so carefully written out by hand before the days of printing presses. He took long journeys and spent much money in search of these manuscripts. Most of them were hidden away in convents, where the priests were unwilling to have people enter. Like a miner digging for gold, every choice bit he found made him eager for more. One day he reached a place in the peninsula of Sinai, where there was an old stone building surrounded by walls forty feet high, which could only be entered by being pulled up the walls with a rope. He had great difficulty in entering, but was richly rewarded for his perseverance. In the library were many valuable books and writings, from which he was allowed to copy. All at once his eye fell upon a large basket of waste paper, to be used as kindlings. He turned them over, and shouted aloud for joy when he discovered several leaves of the Testament in Greek, more ancient than any he had ever seen. He tried to buy them all; but the suspicious monks would not part with only forty-three leaves; and this treasure he carried home and presented to the king, who had them put in the library at Leipsic.

Never for a moment after this was Tischendorf easy. He tried in every way to get possession of the manuscripts; but it was of no use, the monk would not sell them at any price. Baffled, but not discouraged, he started once more for the East with the intention of copying this uncial entire. The brotherhood gave him a cordial welcome, but the manuscripts were nowhere to be found.

Tischendorf returned to Europe; but at the end of three years started off again, this time under the protection of the Russian Government, as the king of Saxony had lost his faith in these expensive journeys, and did not believe they would amount to anything. Once more he stood within the convent walls, and once more the library was thrown open to him. Day and night he pored over old volumes; but nowhere was this particular one to be found. With a heavy heart he gave orders, at the end of a week, for his servants to prepare for their return home.

The evening before he started the steward invited him into his cell to take supper, and remarked during their conversation that he, too, had been reading the Scriptures that day. Rising from the table, he went to a corner of the room and brought forward a large book wrapped in red cloth, which Tischendorf recognized as the fragments he had taken from the waste-basket fifteen years before, and much else besides. This time he tried to conceal his feelings, and carelessly asked to take the book to his room for the evening. Once there he fairly danced for joy, because he knew he held in his hands the greatest Bible-treasure in the world. He felt that it would be wicked to sleep, and sat up all night in his cold cell copying the precious manuscripts by the dim light of a candle. Of course he could not do it all, and begged permission of the steward the next morning to carry it to Cairo and have it copied in full. This favor he could not grant, and the only man who could give authority to do so was then on his way to Constantinople.

Tischendorf started off at once to find the man, overtook him at Cairo, and gained the desired permission. He then sent back a servant on a swift dromedary; and nine days later the book was again in his hands.

He was allowed eight leaves at a time; and two German friends helped him in the task of copying the one hundred and ten thousand lines, though Tischendorf corrected the whole by the original. The longer he worked over it, the stronger became his desire to possess the original itself. Finally he begged the archbishop to make a present of it to the emperor of Russia, he being the head of the Greek Church. But he could only gain permission to borrow the precious manuscript, which he gave with his own hands to Alexander II., who was assassinated last March. The immense task of copying this manuscript was now begun, and completed in 1862. The emperor generously sent copies to all the great libraries throughout the world; but the original text remains at St. Petersburg, never having been returned. The old monks at the convent felt very sore over their loss, and refused the sum which the Russian government offered to pay for the treasure.

This is the only complete uncial of the New Testament to be found in the world, and dates back to the fourth century. Fragments of others are to be found in the libraries at London, Oxford, Rome, Paris, and other cities of Europe, and they have been most helpful to the men who lately revised the New Testament.—Sunday Magazine.

NATIONAL IMMORALITY.

Canon Farrar thus concluded a sermon in Westminster Abbey on the responsibility of the nation for the immorality prevailing in England:

"If God gives us no saints even to win his cause by suffering, and for his sake to forego the sleek applause of men, and to welcome the beatitude of their malediction—then be sure that the axe is already uplifted in the air. Slow and silent, but certain, is the working of God's inexorable law. It is deaf to sophistry; it is heedless of vested interests; it is pitiless to excuse. Upon callous immorality, upon cold acquiescence in wrong, out of the darkened future it breaks at last, 'a Nemesis crowned with fire,' trampling guilty nations into indiscriminate ruin, laying waste fenced cities into ruinous heaps. Nature and Destiny are but other names for this irresistable Providence. For men and for nations it has but one law—sow and reap. Sow to the spirit, and reap eternal life. Sow to the wind and reap the hurricane. 'To burn away in inane waste'—so wrote the great moralist who has recently passed away from us—'the divine aromas and plainly celestial element from our existence, to change our holy of holies into a place of riot, to make the soul itself hard, impious, barren.' Surely a day is coming when it will be known again what virtue is in continuance of life; how high, if forgotten, is the duty laid, not on women only, but on every creature in regard to these particulars. Well, if such a day never comes again, then I perceive much else will never come. Magnanimity and depth of insight will never come; heroic purity of heart and of eye; noble pious valor to amend us, and the age of bronze and lacquer—how can they ever come? The scandalous bronze lacquer age of hungry animalisms, spiritual impotencies and mendacities, will have to run its course, till the pit swallow it. Oh, England! 'If thou hadst known, even thou, at least in this thy day, the things that belong unto thy peace!' the day may come in which they shall be hid from thine eyes."

AN "UNSURPASSED" HYMN.

In the New Englander for August, 1860 Dr. Bacon pronounces the following exquisite hymn "unsurpassed in the English or any other language," and adds that, "perhaps it is as near perfection as any uninspired language can be." It is usually ascribed to Hillhouse the poet (James A. Hillhouse); but according to Dr. Bacon it was written by his younger brother, Augustus L. Hillhouse, who died near Paris in March, 1859.

> Trembling before thine awful throne,
> O God! in dust my face I own;
> Justice and mercy for my life
> Contend: Oh smile, and heal the strife.
> The Savior smiles! Upon my soul
> New tides of hope tumultuous roll—
> His voice proclaims my pardon found;
> Seraphic transport wings the sound.
> Earth has a joy unknown in heaven—
> The new-born peace of sins forgiven;
> Tears of such pure and deep delight,
> Ye angels, never dimmed your sight.
> Ye sons of old on chosen rest
> The beauteous pillars of the throne;
> Ye know where storm exulting springs,
> And strong o'er the drooping wings.
> [illegible]
> Of the bright roll of Eternal Will,
> Ah read His errands ye fulfill,
> Or, throned in clouds of beamy day,
> Symphonious in His providence play.
> Loud in the songs the heavenly plain
> Is shaken, while the choral strains
> And lyres ethereal, floating far,
> Draw silence from each shining star.
> But I amid your choirs shall shine,
> And all your knowledge shall be mine;
> Ye to your harps your rest resign to hear
> A service chord that mine will bear.

This hymn may be in some of the hymn books, but it is suited rather for reading than for singing in public. It is worthy of a place on the fly-leaf of every Bible in the land.—N. Y. Semi-Weekly Tribune.

EGYPT—THE ALEXANDRIA RIOTS.

LONDON, June 12.—Advices from Alexandria, late last night, state that the disturbances commenced simultaneously at three different points. The object of the rioters, in a great measure, appears to have been to pillage, in which the Levantines, as well as Arabs, participated. A regiment of cavalry and a regiment of infantry have been ordered to reinforce the garrison.

SIXTY-SEVEN EUROPEANS MASSACRED.

LONDON, June 12.—A telegram published here says the official report of the riot in Alexandria gives the number of Europeans killed at sixty-seven.

LONDON, June 13.—A correspondent at Alexandria states that the Europeans are leaving there as fast as they can. The Consuls have issued a proclamation exhorting the Europeans to remain tranquil, and expressing confidence in the army being able to maintain order. One hundred persons were killed in the riot on Sunday. The position is a terrible one. Any small force the fleet could land would only suffice to excite the Arabs to a general massacre.

ANOTHER OUTBREAK FEARED.

LONDON, June 13.—The correspondent of the Times at Cairo telegraphs that, unless there is an overwhelming Turkish force at Alexandria before Sunday, there will be a worse outbreak than last Sunday. He says the prestige of Dervish Pasha has disappeared.

HUNGARY—FLOOD AND LOSS OF LIFE.

PESTH, June 12.—A disastrous flood occurred yesterday at Varsecz. A number of houses and two bridges were destroyed, and twelve children and several adults were drowned.

HAIL-STORM IN INDIAN TERRITORY.

LITTLE ROCK, Ark., June 13.—A special from Indian Territory says: "A terrible hail-storm passed over Broken Arrow and the surrounding country yesterday. The damage to crops and property is very heavy. Several lives were lost."

The loss of property at Denver, Col., by the heavy rain and flood of last Saturday night, is estimated at $100,000.

The Piedmont A. C. C. will hold its fourth annual session with the church at Beaver Creek, N. C., commencing Friday, Aug. 25, and holding over Sunday. Persons traveling by rail will leave the train at Hickory, N. C., and go via Lenoir. J. J. HARSHAW.

God in Christ.

We turn to him of Christ: "the brightness of the Father's glory and the express image of his person," to obtain a true idea of what God is, and of what our relation to God ought to be. His holy life leads us into a nobler, tenderer, more humane faith in our Heavenly Father, and challenges our reverence and admiration by the inherent power and beauty of goodness. In every department of life, but especially in the sphere of moral and religious truth, it is comparatively easy to apprehend and value, but difficult to originate and plan. In art, in science, in literature, there are thousands who can appreciate the masterpieces of genius, for one who is able to create and execute. The last is the test of the lifetime here. And so, in like manner, the purity of Christ appeals to us. We cannot find it in ourselves; but, when it is presented to us we recognize its claims to our reverent homage and obedience. It speaks to us of higher things, and shows us the possibilities in our nature of approaching God. And then the closer we draw near our Lord, the more does his character open up to our devout contemplation, and his revelation itself expand.—J. J. Ferguson, D. D.

Brevities.

An impure dolomite formation in Shenandoah mine, Snake Creek district, Wasatch county, Utah, is remarkable for its "phosphorescent" property. This mineral is of a bright orange color, and exhibits, under the microscope, a beautiful crystalline structure. Pressure by the fingers will readily reduce it to powder. When the miners struck their picks into it, flashes of light were produced so strikingly vivid as to cause superstitious alarm, and to suggest for it the ominous name of "hell-fire rock."

By desire of the Sultan a commission consisting of the Mayor of Hebron and of a few Sheikhs recently visited the sepulchre of the Patriarchs in the neighborhood of Hebron. The object of the commission was to ascertain whether the interior required repointing, and whether the silken palls which covered the respective tombs were in need of repair. On entering the sepulchre the members of the commission prostrated themselves, kissed the ground, and offered up a prayer. It was found that the walls and the roof of the building were still in excellent condition, but that on the other hand the palls over the sarcophagus of Abraham, as well as over those of Rebecca, Jacob, and Leah, were rent in several places. It was resolved to replace these by new coverings which will be sent from Constantinople. The floor was strewn with scraps of paper bearing the names of Jewish and Christian pilgrims, to whom entrance to the building is not permitted, and who, to acquaint the dead, as it were, with their visits, had thrown these scraps through an opening in the wall of the mosque.

ANCIENT TABLETS FROM SEPHARVAIM.

Nine cases representing a portion of the results of the researches just on the eve of being resumed by M. Hormuzd Rassam, who left England for Alexandretta and Babylon, on the 6th of March, have just arrived in London. The tablets which they contain are for the most part small, and, either whole or in fragmentary condition, are estimated to reach about 5,000 in number. The texts on the tablets are large beyond precedent as compared with the size of the vehicle on which they are inscribed. The new importation, so far as it has been investigated, consists chiefly of trade documents, and largely of contracts for the supply of corn and other agricultural products. They are dated in the reigns of Samas-sum-ukin and Kandalanu, the Chinladanus of the Greeks, who were cotemporary with the latter half of the reign of Assurbanipal, or Sardanapalus, of Assyria, about B. C. 646. The tablets are from Abou-habba, the site of the ancient Sippara, the Sepharvaim of the Old Testament, which is mentioned by Sennacherib in his letter to Hezekiah as a city whose king had been unable to resist the Assyrians. Sippara or Pantibiblon, as the Greeks called it, is mentioned by Berosus as having furnished five out of the ten Chaldean kings of the time before the flood and as the place where Xisuthrus, or Noah, buried the records of the antediluvian world at the time of the Deluge, and from which his posterity afterwards recovered them. The Hebrew term Sepharvaim, which is the verbal equivalent of the "two Sipparas," is applied to twin cities, one of which was situated on each side of the river. The Sippara from which the tablets just arrived in London have been procured in the Sippara of Samas, Talpar sha Shamas, or Sippara of the Sun-god, as being the place where pre-eminently the sun was a chief object of worship. The other Sippara, or Sippara of Anunit, which is supposed in ancient times to name the Sepharvaim of Scripture history, is up to the present moment unknown to modern investigation.

The fruits of Christianity are as precious as those of infidelity are vile. Where the precepts of Christ have sway war is unknown; robbery, dishonesty, intemperance, violence and lust, are forbidden, and under benign influence property is secure; life is sacred; poverty is provided for; sickness is pitied; infancy is nurtured; old age is revered; womanhood is cherished, and manhood is ennobled. Such are the fruits of true Christianity, and infidel virtues mostly spring from Christian roots. Skepticism cannot blot out a father's godly counsels nor a mother's fervent prayers. And as a result, there are often traces of principle without Christian profession; as there are many who practice infidelity while professing Christianity. Put genuine infidelity and genuine Christianity side by side, watch their fruits and take your choice.

WHO ARE THE BRAVE?

JOHN F. WILCOX.

I put the question, "Who are braves?
And worthy of a deathless name?"
A thousand tongues this answer gave,
"They are the brave, who fought and fell
Amid the storm of shot and shell
Amid the battle's smoke and flame!"

Again I ask, "Who are the brave?"
A thousand tongues again reply,
"To them who when the Nation's wave
Step forward at their country's call,
And leaving home abandon all,
And for our freedom dare to die."

Ah! they are brave, full well I know—
Confronting all the shapes of death
And ploughing on the maddened foe,
Amid the awful cannon's roar,
And the sights of human gore,
And thousands gasping for their breath.

But are no others brave? I ask,
Are worthy of the noblest hope?
And what of those whose daily task,
Is in the sphere of common deeds,
To meet the cry of unfed needs?
Are they entitled to our praise?

Ah! he is brave who dares to stand,
Nobly with the faithful few
When all the world join hand in hand
To give support to what is wrong,
Because established in error so long,
And dare not question, "Is it true?"

And he is brave—when left alone
To battle with the life of life
While childish hearts, dear as her own
Petition daily for the bread
Whose price is paid for rum instead,
—I mean the wretched drunkard's wife.

True bravery is to take the right,
Unheeding all be it duty's call,
And though the road be dark or light,
And whether men should praise or blame
Be this your constant end and aim
Though earth should shake and heaven fall.

COMING AGE—ITS PROXIMITY. No. 114.

Mark, Number, and Name, of the First Beast of Rev. xiii. Why are Symbols used? Closing remarks on Rev. xiii. Use of this Chapter to the student of Prophecy. Why should we study the Apocalypse?

J. P. WEETHEE.

The Romans considered their empire eternal. A certain national instinct seemed to possess the rulers, that theirs was an empire of the gods: and, therefore imperishable. Had John given the name of this beast, the rulers would have seen the whole drift of his revelations, and would have been induced to destroy him, his writings, and the whole Christian church. He acted wisely then, in giving these especially interested a mark, including a number, in which was the name of the beast.

We have clearly shown that the ancients were in the habit of denoting names by numbers, and that in the mark, xv, given by John, Rev. xiii. 18, is the number 666. It now remains for us to show what name is in 666; for that name is the name of the beast.

The fact above stated, namely, that the ancients denoted names by numbers, led the early Christians to apply the same method to those letters (xv) given in the Apocalypse. Some of our readers may not understand in what way the "666" was found; the latter clause of ver. 18. His (the beast's) number (is) xv. So it reads. These are three Greek letters χ = 600, ξ = 60, ϛ = 6. Hebrew, ר = 200, ן = 200, ס = 60, ן = 6, making 666. They found that the word or name "Lateinos," would answer the conditions, and also Romith in the Hebrew.

In order that the whole may be intelligible, we subjoin the following table from Irenæus, who flourished A. D. 170, within 74 years of the time that the Revelations were given. Irenæus was a disciple of Polycarp, who was the pupil of St. John. It being admitted that John knew the name of the beast, we can readily trace the idea of Irenæus to its original source—St. John himself—through Polycarp. His table is as follows:

A = 30, ε = 1, τ = 300, ε = 5, ι = 10, ν = 50, α = 70, ς = 200: thus 30 plus 1 plus 300 plus 5 plus 10 plus 50 plus 200 = 666.

His words, as translated, are these: "But the word Lateinos also contains the number 666, and that it should be the name in question is extremely probable, seeing that Latin is the appellation of the kingdom which is most recent; the Latins being those who are now in possession of sovereign authority."

Some of the names of noted expositors of the Apocalypse, who have adopted the views of this learned father, will be found in the following list:

1. John Fox, the distinguished martyrologist: "The letters xv—certain ancient fathers, who were disciples and hearers of those who heard St. John himself, as Irenæus and others, do expound—conjecturally to contain the name of the beast, and to be the name of a man, under the word Aateinos: whereas also no other name likely of the person, either in Greek or Latin, ... agree to the same, save only the aforesaid name."

2. Lord Napier: "Here then, say we, that name is Aateinos, for these reasons: first, because the name of the beast is —the name of the ten-horned Roman beast, or Latine, empyreia generali, and not of antichrist onlie, and so it must be either Romanus or Latinus. But of these two Latinus is the oldest style for king Latinus (from whom that people were called Latini, and countrie called Latium) was long before king Romulus, of whom the citie was called Rome, and the people thereof Romanes. Secondlie, it must be the number of a man's name (saieth the texte) so is Latinus the name of a man, even the name of one of their first kinges. Thirdlie, forasmuch as the Grecelans had a custome, in their mysteries and oracles, to observe the number of names, as ye shall find in divers partes of Sybilla. And as in that countrey, the name of the flood Nilus is celebrated as holie, because it containeth the number of the daies of the year, 360, as Cælius testifieth, Chron. lib. 4, where he describeth the Cottes and Hesses. Therefore, Saint John (observing the custome of them to whom hee writeth) saith, that the number of the beaste (or rather, as he termed it in the former 17 verses) beast's name is 666. Therefore, Aateinos is the verie name of the beaste, meaned by the saide number."

3. Joseph Mede, as translated from the Latin. "But passing from general remarks, let us proceed at length to inquire what may be that name of the beast, in which the number graciously made known to us by the Holy Ghost is contained? Unquestionably it is that very word which, almost as soon as the Apocalypse had proceeded from the hand of the inspired author, formed the subject of Patristic conjecture. I mean the oft-repeated and far-famed Aateinos. By this name it was that, after the division of the empire, and after its several provinces had come to be presided over by ten kings—and not before—the Roman False Prophet and the other inhabitants of the West were, for the sake of distinction, designated; and this, strictly enough, by those very seven churches of Asia to whom the book of Revelation was originally addressed. For the Greeks and others having their abode in the East, with whom, during the long series of convulsions by which the empire was torn in pieces, the name Roman had always continued, wished to have that name thence forward appropriated to themselves alone; whilst upon us Westerns, with our Sovereign Pontiff, and under him, our bishops, kings, and other authorities, they, as if by a kind of fatal instinct, conferred the appellation of Latins. It so happening, that the letters of the word Latin, when calculated according to the Greek and Hebrew fashion, produced that very number to which the Holy Spirit hath seen meet to direct our special attention."

4. Sir Isaac Newton. "His mark is xv, and his name Aateinos, and the number of his name 666."

5. Bishop Newton. "No name seems more proper and suitable than that famous one mentioned by Irenæus, who lived not long after St. John's time, and was the disciple of Polycarp the disciple of John. He saith that the name Lateinos contains the number 666; and it is very likely, because the last kingdom is so called: for they are Latins who now reign. But in this we will not glory; that is, as becomes a modest and pious man, on a point of such difficulty, he will not be confident of his explication. Lateinos, with "ei," is the true orthography, as the Greeks wrote the long "i" of the Latins, and as the Latins themselves wrote in former times. No objection, therefore, can be drawn from the spelling of the name; and the thing agrees to admiration, for after the division of the empire the Greeks and other Orientalists called the people of the western church or church of Rome, Latins; and as Dr. Henry More expresses it, they Latinize in everything."

6. Elliott's Horæ Apocalyticæ: "The total failure of every anti-Protestant solution, and of every one, moreover, of which the object has been to turn away the application from the popedom to some quite different enemy of Christ's cause and church has only served to make it the more remarkable and more convincing. Satisfied with this, although much pleased with Mr. J. E. Clarke's interpretation and adopting it so far as to regard it in the light of an alternative solution, nevertheless the principal, and that which answers to every requirement of the sacred enigma, I fully believe to be Irenæus' solution, ΛΑΤΕΙΝΟΣ."

7. George Stanley Faber B. D. "The ten-horned beast, whose name is declared to contain the number 666, is certainly the temporal (civil) Roman empire. Of this empire, the second founder was Romulus; but its first real or fictitious founder was Latinus, the ancient king Latium. Latinus, therefore, is the name of a man. It is likewise the name of the western, or divided Roman empire, and the distinguishing appellation of every individual in that empire. Here it is observable that the Gentile name of Latinus, or Latin, was, in the victorious days of the republic, and empire, almost lost in the more favorite Gentile name of Romanus, or a Roman. Preserved, however, it carefully was, though not so frequently used as the other: insomuch that although the people were styled Roman, their language was denominated Latin. But when by the arms of the northern nations, the Roman empire was divided into ten kingdoms: when, by setting up a spiritual tyrant in the church, and by lapsing into papal idolatry, it again became a beast; when Rome was governed by her bishops, under the wing of a new line of emperors (Romano—German) and when Greece, formerly her instructor in the arts and sciences, was now become her rival in imperial and ecclesiastical domination, the old Gentile name of Latin was revived, and has ever since been the peculiar distinguishing title of the Papal Roman empire, both temporal and spiritual. Such accordingly is the general appellation which the inhabitants of the West bear in the Eastern parts of the world: the particular names of Spaniards, French and Italians, are swallowed up in the common title of Latins.

Here, then, we have a name which completely answers in every respect to the Apocalyptic name of the beast. Lateinos is at once the name of a man, the title of an empire, and the distinguishing appellation of every individual in that empire, and when the sum of its numerical letters is taken in the Greek language—the language in which the Apocalypse was written, and in which therefore the calculation ought evidently to be made—it will amount precisely to 666.

On these grounds, then, I do not hesitate to assert, that Latinus, and nothing but Latinus is the name of the beast; for in no other word, descriptive of the reviled temporal beast, or the Papal Roman Empire, can such a fatal concurrence of circumstances be found."

We have now presented the testimony in full relative to the names of the three noted characters in Rev. xiii., the ten-horned, and two-horned beasts, and the image to the ten-horned beast. Let the reader substitute for these three symbolic agents the three literal agents—the Latin and the Greek Empires and the Papal Hierarchy, and read this chapter with these substitutes, and if he finds any failure in the symbolic interpretation, mark such.

Our aim is to make the Apocalypse a book that can be read by this generation, with understanding, if not with the Spirit, being fully persuaded that Rev. i. 3, "Blessed (is) he that readeth and they that hear the words of this prophecy, and keep those things," is equally true in its negative—cursed is he that doth not read, hear, and keep. How can people keep what they neither understand nor value? And how can persons understand without investigation? Christ said "Search the Scriptures;" not simply read them. Many great would-be critics do not even read the Bible. How few search it? By Scriptures, Christ meant the Old Testament, did he not? Very true, and who is the author of the Apocalypse? God, through his Son, Jesus Christ. Rev. i. 1. The same Being that inspired Daniel put John in the Spirit. The Apocalypse is a supplementary commentary on the book of Daniel.

But, says one, the Revelations are to me sealed; I do not know anything about them, and therefore, do not read them. We have taught the sciences and languages for thirty years, yet we never had a student make such a stupid apology for his ignorance. All sciences and languages are sealed to the uninstructed. To banish ignorance is the object of all our institutions of learning. Suppose that a "greenhorn" should say to his professor, I intend to abandon the sciences, they are all sealed books. I spent one week in reading Algebra, one in reading through Geometry, and one week in reading Fluxions, and I am satisfied that I cannot understand them.

One week!!! How many professors ever spent a week in reading the Apocalypse? Not one in a hundred. It is a neglected book. God's last revelation to man, and yet neglected, insulted—ridiculed!!

Mr. Jacob Mollman, colporteur of Russian birth, has been in the employment of the British and Foreign Bible society in China for seventeen years. In this time he has travelled pretty well over fifteen of the eighteen provinces of this empire, besides making a tour into Manchuria, and has sold 200,000 portions (Matthew, Mark, Luke, etc.) of the Scriptures.

WHERE WILL YOU BE FOUND?

Oh, my brother, my sister—you who are so dear to me in the bonds of the gospel, where are you going to be found when Jesus comes? Will your places be vacant then, as now in the little bands that meet to worship him? Will your armor be off, your comrades deserted, and you away with the outside world, seeking favor and advancement from the enemies of Jesus? Think of the matter in the light of that coming day. Oh, will you be at peace then? are you at peace now? Is the fight too hard, the joy set before you grown dim? Back, back to your posts and into the fight, and all will be right again.

Do not let God's poor ministers faint by the way. They have forsaken all for Christ. The wealth, the popular favor the use of other days, has all been given up for the truth's sake. Give them a word of cheer. Take hold of their hands and help them onward. Do not chill—carry, kill them by coldness and indifference.

Oh, I pray for you, for myself, for the world. Let us all renew our vows of consecration to God; forsake all that is wrong in our course of life, and crating forgiveness of the compassionate One, press forward toward the prize, that lies at the end of the race, that when Jesus comes we may be prepared, and may meet him with joy and not with grief. S. R. WILCOX.

THE SIGN OF THE SON OF MAN. WHAT IS IT?

On this subject I wish to make a few remarks in addition to those Brother J. F. Wilcox made in THE RESTITUTION of May 3, 1882. He thinks this sign is a bright star, or a noted light, that is to appear east of Jerusalem, as the first tangible sign of the Lord's coming. This view, I, as an old patron of the paper, most heartily endorse. But why this view, says one.

1. "And they shall see the son of man coming in a cloud." Luke xxi. 27. "Upon a white cloud." Rev. xiv. 14. But from what way does this cloud come. "He comes as the bright morning star." Rev. xxii. 16. This implies he comes from the east.

2. "As the lightning cometh out of the east and shineth even unto the west, so shall also the coming of the son of man be." Matt. xxiv. 27. This if nothing else, assures us that the first appearance of the bright star cloud is the sign. But says the enquirer, When may we look for this sign, and what is the cause of its coming particularly from the east? Before we can expect this sign, we should watch and see that we have a clear understanding of all those prophecies that are to be fulfilled prior to, and are inseparably connected with the coming sign. And be sure not to assume any positions that make it impossible to understand them; otherwise we are in the dark, and have no faith of value. Matt. xxiv. says: Immediately (yes immediately) after the great tribulation or persecution here mentioned, and referred to the same by Daniel (xii. 20–28; viii. 9–16, 24; ix. 27; xi. 33, 41, 45; xii. 1, 11; also 2 Thess. ii. 4.) Shall the sun be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, and the powers of heaven shall be shaken, and then shall the sign appear. This is the greatest persecution on the people of God recorded in the prophetic page, or Bible. When it begins, and its organic power in the holy city, Jerusalem, for the 42 months, 3½ literal years, then it is that the admonition of Christ comes to his people to flee at once; stop not to take anything from the house or from the field. And pray ye that your flight be not in the winter or on the Sabbath day; see Matt. xxiv. 15–21.

But if this persecution is the Papal, as many suppose, and of 1260 years, and all more than a hundred years in the past, and the signs referred to not appeared, I ask where is the utility, or necessity, or propriety of this special admonition from our Savior? But where shall they flee? mostly to the east. The women of Rev. xii. fled into the wilderness for 1260 days, the 42 months. This is the same as Isa. liv. 6; lxvi. 7, and yet future. But let us go to Micah, who on this subject says: "For now shalt thou go forth out of the city, and thou shalt dwell in the field, and thou shalt go even to Babylon, there shalt thou be delivered; there the Lord shalt redeem thee from the hand of thine enemies. In that day saith the Lord, I will assemble her that halteth, and I will gather her that is driven out, and her that I have afflicted. And I will make her that halteth a remnant, and her that was cast far off a strong nation; and the Lord shall reign over them in Mount Zion from henceforth even for ever." Hence as Isaiah says, "The Lord shall set his hand the second time to recover the remnant of his people." Here we find that not only the white cloud star is the sign, but also the cause why it comes from the east. ABEL LAMKIN.

The Child and the Flowers.

The sunset in the garden dyed,
At twilight's pensive hour;
His little daughter, by his side,
Was seeking out a flower.

"Oh, pick that bell, blossom, do!
The little prattler said;
It is the fairest one that blooms
Within that lovely bed."

The father plucked the flowers down,
And gave it to his child;
With sporting lips, and sparkling eye,
She seized the gift and smiled.

"O say, whose is the pretty flower,
This little child-like bloom
Who gave to it its fragrant smell,
And the soft hue of lovely hue?"

A change came o'er the father's face,
His eyes grew strangely wild;
Now the words within him had been stirred
By that sweet, artless child.

The truth flashed on the father's mind,
The truth in all its power;
"There is a God, a child-like," said he,
"Who made that little flower."

"Father, who made the stars which are
The beautiful blue sky
Who made the moon, so calm and bright,
That floats upon high?"

"I was blind, my child, the glorious Giver
He formed them by His power!
He made alike the brilliant sun,
And every bud and flower.

"And unseen hands His bounty supply,
And guard us every hour;
We're kept beneath His watchful eye,
And guided by His power."

Pallbut Copy.

Printers have a rule that every compositor must follow the copy in printing any book or paper.

A short time since a lad in a printing office received from his master a list of Scripture questions and answers to be set up and printed. In the progress of the work the lad turned aside, and asked the foreman if he should "follow copy;" that is set it up just as it is written.

"Certainly," said the foreman; "why not?"

"Because this copy is not like the Bible, and it professes to be the language of that book."

"How do you know it is not like the Bible?"

"Sir, I learned some of those verses at Sunday School ten years ago, and I know that two of them are not like the Bible."

"Well, then, do not 'follow copy,' but set them up as they are in the Bible."

The lad got the Bible and made it the "copy"—his guide and pattern.

"Follow copy," children, wherever you find it according to the Bible, but do not stir a step when you find it differs. Through all your life make the Bible your one copy. Look to your words, your actions, your doctrines and your practices; see that all are according to the Bible, and you will be right.—Domestic Journal.

Stop-a-While.

There is growing in Africa a thorn called "Stop-a-while." If a person once gets caught in it, it is with difficulty he escapes with his clothes on his back, for every attempt to loosen one part of his dress only hooks more firmly another part. The man who gets caught by this thorn is a pitiable sight ere he gets loose. You would not like—would you, boys?—to be caught in this thorn. And yet many, I fear, are being caught by a worse thorn than "Stop-a-while." Where do you spend your evenings? At home, I do hope, studying your lesson and attending to mother's words; for if you have formed a habit of spending them on the streets with bad boys, you are caught in a thorn far worse than "Stop-a-while." If you spend your evenings at home, do not allow any of your playmates to entice you out with them one evening only; for if you do, the desire to go again will be strong; you will have laid the foundation of a bad habit, and you will have a harder struggle to escape with your life than if in the brambles of "Stop-a-while."

Boys and girls who disobey their parents, who loiter about on the Sabbath instead of going to Sabbath School, who take the name of the Lord in vain, are caught in the worst of snares, from which it will be more difficult to extricate themselves than from the African thorn; for bad habits are strong, and constantly lure on their victims to pleasures which satisfy not.—Golden Censer.

"In Father on Deck!"

A number of years ago, Captain D. commanded a vessel sailing from Liverpool to New York, and on one voyage he had all his family with him on board the ship. One night, when all were quietly asleep, there arose a sudden squall of wind which came sweeping over the waters until it struck the vessel, and instantly threw her on her side, tumbling and crashing everything that was movable, and awakening the passengers to a consciousness that they were in imminent peril. Every one on board was alarmed and uneasy, and some sprang from their berths and began to dress, that they might be ready for the worst. Captain D. had a little daughter on board just eight years old, who, of course, awoke with the rest.

"What is the matter?" said the frightened child. They told her that a squall had struck the ship. "Is father on deck?" said she.

"Yes, father is on deck."

The little one dropped herself on her pillow again, without a fear, and in a few moments was sleeping sweetly, in spite of winds and waves.

Blessed child! "Is father on deck!" Father understands all about the vessel, the winds, the waves, the rocks, the tempests.

Tempted, troubled, distressed and frightened soul, look up. Give to the winds thy fears. Rest in God's faithfulness and love. Cast every care upon him.

Age to Come Herald,

MRS. DAVIS AND HER MISSION.

Leaves from My Journal.

Jerusalem, March 20, 1882. Jerusalem is full of strangers. It is said there was never such a rush before. What does it mean? Well, thank God! the interest increases daily. Jerusalem is the place to commence the new age. Our neighbor's houses are to be packed full next week with people who never visited the city before.

I have just heard of a piece of land that was sold at twenty dollars an acre twenty years ago, and today it cannot be bought for one thousand dollars an acre. That is more than a straw telling which way the wind blows. The day is pleasant and warm. The birds are singing a welcome to the flowers, and all nature rejoices. The great rains, snows and cold weather have prevented me from painting, as I otherwise should.

I have heard of a valley at Artos—Solomon's Gardens—which is very productive, with an abundance of water, that can now be bought for a reasonable price. I wish our people would buy that or some other good farming locality before they are all taken up. The best ones will be secured first. I think these Americans might, perhaps, join a colony of the right kind. They seem to be kind, well-disposed people. Well, God lives, and is moving in Jerusalem, if nowhere else; and I suppose he will send here whom he will.

April 5. It is now sixteen days that I have not been able to write a line. Never was I so near death's door before. I made all my arrangements to die, as I supposed I should surely fall asleep. I was able to look death squarely in the face, and found it had no terrors to me. I longed to rest from trials and sorrows, as never before.

But God, who doeth all things well, ordered otherwise. He brought relief in unexpected manner. As I have before said, my house was very damp, even for a long time after the great storm, but it was pleasant and quite hot outdoors, and I was foolish enough to keep out in the hot sun all I could. But when I went into the house I soon became chilly. I was trying to be saving of my money, as I had had so many cold rain-storms to pass through, and had met with so many misfortunes that my purse was growing light, and I thought I had better buy bread than fuel. But I was mistaken. It would have been better if I had bought wood and gone short for bread. But I had a lesson to learn, which I trust will benefit others as well as myself.

The result of the hot sun, and cold, damp room was congestion of the lungs, which ended in lung fever, and abcess in my side, with the violent cough, and other troubles brought on, I am sure would have carried me off in Boston. I was weakened by violent night sweats, and troubled by the mistaken kindness of my neighbors, who insisted upon calling the hucksters, doctor. I told them No! my child had a doctor and died, and I would have none.

At last these Americans from Illinois heard of my situation, and came to me like good angels, and brought me food, and gold, and kind loving words. They said they had a room for me, and that I must leave this house at once. It was as though God had put his hand right down and taken me up to himself. I had been so long in that cold, damp house, surrounded by people of another nationality and language, and though very kind to me, and all was very pleasant in health, yet when prostrated by sickness, I felt a necessity for the society and advice of my own people; and God had the angels in readiness, when my aching heart had been brought into the right condition, to supply my wants and save me from the grave.

They told me that God had spoken to them, and they had only obeyed his voice. I was satisfied this was in a certain sense true, and did not hesitate to accept the kind offers as from the Lord.

Through all these severe trials and sufferings I have learned a lesson; yes many lessons, whether I shall be able in the future to live up to the instructions I have received, or not. First, one is not to judge too hastily of a matter before hearing enough to get a correct understanding of it. Second, we should bear patiently with those who may not have learned as much, or what we have learned. I will not mention now several lessons of a higher nature, and still more important to me.

I learn from these good people that their company numbered one hundred and fifty in Chicago, who were all of the same faith, where they had a chapel and held meetings. They believe in obtaining eternal life by overcoming the flesh, i.e., when they overcome the flesh they will never die at all. Most of them believe in universal salvation, and they reject the doctrine of eternal torment, and claim there will be probation after death. They practise all they preach. Strange to say these fifteen (we believe Mrs. Davis said there was twenty of them at first) are all that are left of the one hundred and fifty one year ago. All those left in Chicago have either gone back into the churches or become infidels, and they write to these and tell them that they are lunatics. It was expected that the company left would soon follow these to Jerusalem, but instead, they have given up their faith. The disappointment of the little company here, of course, is great; but they believe it is all right and from the Lord.

Mr. Spofford was an educated man, and a prominent lawyer in Chicago. He has been very wealthy. His wife is a beautiful Norwegian woman, who has passed through great afflictions, and received great light from the Lord. Ten years ago she started with her four lovely children and servants to visit Europe, where she was to be joined by her husband. The vessel in which she sailed was wrecked somewhere near the coast of France, and all her children and servants were lost. She alone was saved. She believes that all the trials and sorrows that she has passed through were from God; and believing this they have already been effectual in forming a high Christian character, and made her a sweet angel of peace and mercy. I could tell you much more about her, but do not feel able to write it now. I shall have more to say of these kind people in the future, if God will.

They saw that Jerusalem was the place to accomplish the work which had been begun with them. [In this they are certainly in advance of any common-interest movement that has ever been started since the days of the Apostles.] They have made no reserve, but given up every cent they possessed, and their common-interest principles extend to me as well as among themselves. I am just as welcome to what they have as one of their own company; and I can receive from them what I should be unwilling to receive from others; because, with their attainments, they are in a position to give as others cannot give. They are wonderfully advanced in this principle, more than any people I have ever yet seen. Perhaps it is the nucleus of a great movement; who knows? I find that God's plans are very unlike ours. How much I have had to suffer to learn something of these kind people.

My work for this year is a failure, owing to Bertie's death, unprecedented storms, sickness, and several other misfortunes and hinderances, of which I will not now speak. But I see what I could have done had the circumstances been favorable and my health permitted.

My side is still very lame and painful, but my cough is better. If I had a little lobelia, which is a favorite medicine with me, it would have saved me from the fever and abscess in my side. Do send me some lobelia seed. I have not sufficient knowledge of much of the medicine of this country to use it safely. [Mrs. Davis is a botanic, or, perhaps, more properly, an eclectic physician.]

I have come in possession of another item of information in relation to the plot of land. That which could have been bought for two hundred dollars when I first came here, cannot now be bought for less than six hundred; and it will never be less.

Jerusalem is a good place to learn of Christ through suffering. In coming in contact with evil and passing through our afflictions and trials, it seems as though we can learn more here than anywhere else. It is perfectly natural that this should be so. Why should all the nations flow to Jerusalem to learn, if there is nothing in the place? and if it "is the place where men ought to worship," why should it not be the place where they can, more readily, perhaps, than in any other place, learn to worship?

BREAD UPON THE WATERS.

CLIFF. W. D. GAYER.

'Mid the losses and the gains,
'Mid the pleasures and the pains,
And the hopings and the fears,
And the ruthlessness of years,
We repeat this promise o'er
We believe it more and more:
Bread upon the waters cast
Shall be gathered at the last.

Gold and silver, like the sands,
With keen slipping through our hands:
Jewels, crumbling like a spark,
Will be hidden in the dark:
Sun and moon and stars will pale,
But these words will never fail—
Bread upon the waters cast
Shall be gathered at the last.

Soon, like dust, to you as I,
Will our earthly treasures lie:
But the loving word and deed
To an age in life unreal—
They will unforgotten be!
They will live eternally—
Bread upon the waters cast
Shall be gathered at the last.

Past the moments slip away,
Soon our mortal powers decay.
Low and lower sinks the sun,
What we do must soon be done!
Then what rapture, if we hear
Thousand voices ringing clear—
Bread upon the waters cast
Shall be gathered at the last.

The Rainbow.

THE WITHDRAWAL OF LIFE.—No. 1.

The work of Mr. Cox, which we propose to review in this and some of the following numbers of the Rainbow, has met with great success. It is now in its seventh edition. We do not wonder at its popularity. Written in a clear and elegant style, it advocates with power and earnestness a theory of the future to which a large proportion of mankind would, if possible, fondly turn. That theory is that at some time or other, in another age and life, if not in this all beings who have fallen from God, fallen angels as well as fallen men, they whose sin has been of the deepest dye, as well as they whose sin has been comparatively light, will be brought back by some means or other, by a severer or a gentler discipline, to God, and holiness, and happiness, and eternal life. To this great end, he tells us, the character of God is pledged. He would not be the God of the Bible if he failed to effect this glorious purpose. And of that which he tells us God's character is pledged to be also affirms that God's inspired word is full. Not in dark or doubtful or ambiguous language, but in language as clear as the light of day, this final purpose of God has been spoken of "by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." (Pp. 174, 182.)

Tennyson discussed this solemn question when the death of his friend brought before him vividly and strongly the future of the entire human race. The whole current of his soul's wishes ran in favor of the theory which Mr. Cox has advocated. But he could see no ground for faith, scarcely room for hope, that thus it would be. The voice of nature spoke against the creed he was fain to adopt. He seems to have seen no promise of it in the word of God. The utmost he can feel for what he calls "the larger hope" is a "faint trust." But Mr. Cox is not satisfied with a faint hope or trust of this kind. He will have us commit ourselves "wholly and fearlessly" to his theory, by showing us that we have "ample warrant for it in the Scriptures of the New Testament." (Preface vii.)

Why Mr. Cox should, in his preface, appear to say that it is in the New Testament alone or chiefly that we have "ample warrant" for his opinion, we cannot tell. When he comes to speak of the Scriptures which, in his opinion, justify his view, he presents to us numerous passages from the Old Testament which, he tells us, are just as plainly and clearly in favor of it as those he advances from the New. The Psalms and the Prophets are, according to him, just as much for it as the Gospels and the Epistles. No words of Christ, or Paul, or John, could "more emphatically declare the Divine purpose than those Isaiah has used" (179). But let this pass for the present. The hope that of the whole race of mankind not one is to be lost is the hope he would have us adopt boldly and fearlessly. The post he refers to has expressed this hope to be:

"That nothing walks with aimless feet
That not one life shall be destroyed.
Or cast as rubbish to the void
When God hath made the pile complete."

There is one point upon which certainly Mr. Cox has our fullest sympathy. Having arrived, upon mature consideration, as he supposes, at his conclusion, he does not hesitate to state it openly and fully. He also lays down the position that truth should never be hid. Whatever God has revealed to us we should proclaim it upon the housetops. We are to leave the consequences to God. (Preface ix., xi.) Upon this principle we have ourselves always acted. We have been often told in regard to this particular question, the future state of those unredeemed in this age, that even though we supposed we had ascertained the truth we should keep it to ourselves. We have been told not to give offence to others; not to add to the too numerous subjects of difference between Christian men; not to publish a doctrine which would or which might be taken hold of by some as an encouragement to sin. All such considerations we have always thought should be sternly set aside. If God has revealed a matter it is not for us to hide but to publish it. With God we leave the consequences, certain of this, that no truth will in the end be productive of any consequences but those which are desirable.

Before commencing our review of Mr. Cox's work, we must expressly state our standpoint. We argue, of course, from the ground of those who hold the view of the mortality of the wicked, and of their destruction or annihilation in the place of future doom, call it hell or Gehenna.

Mr. Cox, we are somewhat surprised to see, scarcely refers to our view throughout the entire of his book. As he has read the literature of the last half-century on this subject, and as he in two or three passages of his work distinctly though very briefly alludes to it, we cannot suppose that he has all but absolutely ignored our view from any ignorance of it. He has, for whatever reasons, throughout his book reasoned as though he had no other antagonists but those who held the doctrine of everlasting pain and sin. We will, however take the liberty to state that in doing so he has chosen the easiest ground for himself. He virtually tells his readers that if his view be rejected they have no other view to fall back upon than the Augustinian theory. If in one or two places he faintly admits that our view is another alternative, he throughout his work argues as though that of Augustine were the only one. (37, 145.) If they do not go with him, he practically leads his readers to suppose that they must adopt a view which deems the impenitent of this age to a "torture which has no end, which will do nothing to correct or amend them." Against such a treatment of this great subject we here enter our protest. Mr. Cox has not exhausted it when he rejects and holds up to our horror the terrible theory of an endless torture. We reject that view as much as he possibly can do. We put forth another view which appeals to Scripture, and which has commanded the assent and consent of sober minded, truth-loving men throughout the world. Such men as Edward White, and Samuel Minton, and Dr. Leask, and very many others, have reasoned for this view, have suffered for, and have proved it.

One of those men to whom Mr. Cox allows that he is much indebted, Mr. Dobney of Maidstone, once held this view, if he no longer holds it. To this view Mr. Cox must turn more of his attention than he has done. It is from this view that we now proceed to controvert the argument of his "Salvator Mundi."

Mr. Cox opens his work with the quotation of one of the wonderful sayings of Christ. It is indeed one of the most solemn and one of the most suggestive sayings that ever fell from the lips of him who spake as never man spake. It is a text and a theme that have often deeply stirred our own mind. If our readers will turn to a chapter of one of our works upon this subject, they will see that years ago we have thought closely on it, though we were led by it to a different, we strongly incline to think a more glorious as well as truer conclusion than Mr. Cox has come to from it.† The words of Christ, addressed to the hardened inhabitants of Chorazin, were these:—"If the mighty works, which are done in you, had been done in Tyre and Sidon, they would have repented long ago in sackcloth and ashes." Matt. xi. 20–24.

In the passage of which these words form a part our Lord brings up in contrast some of the guilty cities of his own time and some of the guilty cities of the remote past. He tells us that the guilt of the latter was less than that of the former, because they sinned against a lesser light. He brings up before us, not merely as a possibility or a probability, but as a certainty, that if the miracles which he wrought in Chorazin and Bethsaida had been wrought before their eyes they would have repented with all the signs of a true penitence. We do not suppose that our Lord meant much more by the contingent repentance of Tyre than he did when he spoke of the actual repentance of Nineveh. But we will go to the fullest length to which his words can fairly lead us, and allow that if the mighty works done in Chorazin had been wrought by Christ in the havens of Tyre and Sidon in the old days of their maritime supremacy, some of the prince-merchants who stored up the commerce of the world, some of the wary pilots who dared the dangers of the Mediterranean and the ocean with no other guide than the stars, some of the fearless rowers who strained at the oar with unblanched cheek when the storm was at its highest, would have come to Jesus, even as Nicodemus and Joseph and Peter and John came to him, and coming found in him eternal life. He did not come to them in those old days. He did not work among them in the long ago. And so they did not repent because they heard not his voice and saw not his works.

And so, on the review of God's dealings with these men, Mr. Cox asks some very solemn and weighty questions, involving considerations which stretch out far into the future. "Why," he asks, "were those mighty works not done?" "Why were they not permitted to witness them then? Can we blame them, will God condemn them to an eternal death or an eternal misery, because they did not see what they could not see, because they did not repent, when the very means which would infallibly have induced repentance were not vouchsafed them?" (1, 2.) And further on he asks a similar question of some of the greatest and best men of the heathen world, as Socrates, and Plato, and Cicero, who, he supposes, would have fallen at the feet of Christ if they had but seen him. "Are they," he says, "to be damned for not having seen him?" (21)

Now we must put this question and this whole subject fairly before us. We do not think that Mr. Cox in the above quotations has done so, and so we must endeavor to state the matter as it really lies between him and us. In the first place we deny that "eternal misery" would be a just punishment either for the sin of Tyre or for that of Chorazin, or for any imaginable amount of sin of which the most sinful being is capable. We put the Augustinian view out of the question and turn to our own. We deny, then, that "eternal death," by which phrase we understand Mr. Cox to mean our theory of destruction, or any punishment whatever, could, with justice, be inflicted on the people of Chorazin, "because they did not see what they could not see." We doubt if there is among any Christian denomination anyone who would say that it could. Certainly we could not. The true question comes to this,—would eternal death or destruction be a just punishment to Sodom for its actual sin.

Mr. Cox does not deny that Tyre was a very guilty city. He calls its people one "one of the wickedest races of heathen antiquity" (13.) Its guilt was less that of Chorazin, because its religious light was less. But it was not without sin, and for all sin Mr. Cox insists there must be retribution (150). The question, then, between him and us is this,—would it be right or just for God to inflict death on persons who sinned as Tyre sinned; i.e., sinned against all the light they had, though there was a higher light not vouchsafed to them, but which would if it had been vouchsafed, have led them, or some of them, to repentance unto life eternal? This is the real question between him and us. This is the very solemn, awful consideration that we have to discuss, for, no doubt, it is a very solemn question which relates to the life or the death of a being who might live for ever.

We will state the question thus: Is God unjust in withdrawing life for ever from any to whom all possible advantages and opportunities for salvation have not been offered? These men have been guilty, but not so guilty as others have been. They had not the advantages which some others had, and which, if possessed, would have led to salvation. Is God unjust in withdrawing life from these for the sins of which they have been guilty? This is the real question which we must discuss. It is not whether everlasting torments are a just punishment or not. It is not whether the withdrawal of life is just for not seeing "what they could not see." It is whether it is just in God to withdraw life for ever; i.e., to inflict eternal death for sins which, though great, were far more light than those of others? This is the real point which Mr. Cox must argue on. We have stated it fully, and repeated it, because of its importance, and because Mr. Cox, throughout his very able work, has never fairly faced it. We suppose that Tyre was less guilty than Chorazin. We suppose that if Christ, the light of Chorazin, had shone upon Tyre, some of the inhabitants of Tyre would have sorrowed with a godly sorrow. We suppose that with their actual amount of guilt, whatever it was, they will not be partakers of eternal life. The question is, whether this would be just conduct towards them on the part of God.

A great many considerations come up to us here. Some of these are within our grasp, others lie beyond it. Some we can answer, while others we can only conjecture. We here fully agree with Mr. Cox, when he says, "The complete answer would imply a complete apprehension of the entire scheme of Providence, a complete knowledge not only of the whole story of time, but also of the Divine motives and purposes of which that story is a vast and manifold illustration. And such knowledge is too wonderful for us, too high for us to reach, too broad for us to grasp" (2). Surely when we allow all this, and acknowledge that the whole story of time, the whole history of God's dealings with man in the ages that are passed and passing, are connected with a far vaster scheme of Providence of which we know as yet very little indeed, we may be well prepared to expect somewhat that may surprise and perplex us. There may well be reasons at which we can perhaps do little more than conjecture, for acting not only with what appears to be, but really is severity. The withdrawal of life may have that bearing upon a boundless future which, while it is an act of severity to some, may be one of incalculable blessing to myriads more.

In endeavoring, then, to answer the question whether it would be just in God to withdraw life for any amount of sin greater or lesser, and to answer this by saying that it would, we would ask this further question of those who differ from us, namely, whether God is bound to give life, long or short temporal or eternal, to any creature whatsoever? We more than doubt that he is. Geology tells us that there were vast periods of time when there was no life upon the earth. Scripture tells us of a past eternity—if such a phrase is admissible—where there was no life but the divine. Doubtless God intended to create creature life, but he would be a bold man who would say that it would be unjust in God not to produce this life.

But there is another question here. Who will say that God, having given life, happy conscious life rejoicing in its being, is bound to perpetuate it in its infinite relations. Speaking of the things reported to the Church of Christ in the Gospel, he says that "the angels desire to look into" these things. The Greek word translated "look into" is a remarkable expression. It properly signifies to stoop down or forward in order to look at a thing. Bishop Sanderson in his sermon Ad Aul, 14, speaks thus of the angels:—"They peep a little into those incomprehensible mysteries, and then cover their wings and peep again; as not being able to endure the fulness of that glorious lustre that shineth therein." Such is the aspect of the angels towards the place of redemption. There is the intense desire to comprehend it: there is at the same time the confession that its bearings upon the future are but partially within their grasp.

The Apostle Paul in his Epistle to the Ephesians speaks of human redemption as in its present operation and the ultimate results making known the manifold wisdom of God to the principalities and powers in heavenly places. There are in these words of St. Paul a wonderful amount of meaning, but a little part of which we are able to comprehend. God's "manifold wisdom" is a phrase which seems to take in all his dealings with his creation. The redemption of his church, or elect people, compounded, as in part it is, by the heavenly intelligences, and as it shall be more and more fully by them as the progress of the ages reveals more and more of the Divine wisdom has its effect upon all, with which the manifold wisdom of God is concerned. We think that there can be no doubt from those words but that human redemption will tell upon more than man. The principalities and powers of heavenly places are learning, and will learn, that it has a mighty bearing upon interests and upon beings which have not yet come into existence. For the sake of those God has dealt with man, whether in goodness or severity. The future will show to the angels how wise God has been in the past.

Reflections such as these may surely show us that there may be reasons, wise and merciful in their ultimate issue, for a severity, in some respects, which is not injustice. Connected as human redemption is with the interests of infinite space or time, there may surely be reasons, though we are not, perhaps, able to point them out with much more force than that of conjecture for that particular judgment of the withdrawal of life from some at which offence is often taken. In his severity to individuals there may be a regard for a far wider commonality. If this be, as may very reasonably be conjectured, God's way to permit freedom of will to sin higher creation while he rids it of its terrible danger, should we not think even this severity to be but the expression of love? The experience of angels and of men, has shown beyond any question the fearful risk that arises from the possession of free-will. If the dealings of God with angels and with men, whether those dealings take the aspect of judgment or of mercy, bring about a state of things in which evil shall be unknown for ever, most assuredly there would by those dealings be made known to the heavenly principalities the manifold wisdom of God. At all events, we consider that our reflections have brought us to this point. If no one is unable to maintain either that God is obliged to give equal advantages to every man, or that it would be unjust in him for human sin of a lesser or a more aggravated kind to withdraw life from some, we approach the Bible with no prejudice on our minds forcing us to put an unnatural sense upon its words, and ask, what has God there taught us upon this most solemn and important subject?

THE WAY BACK FROM THE GRAVE.

How many of us have gone to the grave and left a loved one there! Few of us, at least, have not visited the place where a loved one's ashes lie, and dropped a tear, as we recalled the happy joyous times we had spent in the society of him, or her, whose face we can look on no longer.

"Friend after friend departs,
Who has not lost a friend?"

A father—on whose strong and loving arm our most ardent confidence was stayed, or mother—nurse ever dear to our hearts—whose tender caresses still linger upon us; the husband our stay, our comfort, and our pride; or wife—dearest, and closest heart's companion of our life—in all its joys and troubles; or children, dear to our hearts, by their early and constant claims on our care, love and service; and entwined in our affections in a way known only to those who have had and lost them:—the son who was his widowed mother's only treasure left to her—all these lie buried in the grave, and along with them, oh, how much of the joy of our lives! Hear the cry of one father after his first-born, and only child:—"She bore it all, so quietly and patiently: our hearts sore looking on and able to do so little for her; our prayers going out for her that her young life might be spared, but all in vain. She died, and with her went a great deal of the light and sunshine out of our hearts, and home. With her many little ways she had entwined herself around our hearts before she got ill. Almost every day she seemed to grow more intelligent, and learned to do little things. My step quickened at dinner and tea hours to get her in my arms; and she knew my step so well; though her age was only counted by months, she brightened our home and kept us cheerful: Surely her young life is not quenched for ever! Surely death shall not for ever hold the young ones in his ruthless grasp!"

Such is the cry, not from one only, but from thousands of hearts—yearning after those who have gone to the grave. Wondering, hoping, inquiring—shall they ever return? Is there a way back from the grave?

And here the thought comes up to us, that we ourselves must one day be buried in the grave. The thought is not a pleasant one, and while ready at all times to acknowledge its truth, we are fain to believe, that, to us, the grave is yet a good way off. Still the truth that our breath is in our nostrils ever ready to depart, keeps staring us in the face. "It is appointed unto men once to die." However far off our line of life may lead us to fun, the day of our death, that day shall assuredly come, when the last services of friends shall be performed for us; and they bear us out of their sight. Then it is and truth imprints itself on our minds—and according to the vividness of the light in which we see it—so is the eagerness with which we exclaim: "If a man die shall he live again?" Is there a way back from the grave?

Our experience and observation answers: None, that we know of. "All nature dies and lives again"—spring and summer, regularly succeed autumn and winter; but we have seen no summer to our dead. The icy hand of the grave is still unbarred. Must it ever be so?

Sometimes we take heart from the analogies of nature. "The chrysalis, that lay motionless and dry, and to all appearances dead, wakes up to a higher life, and gloriously arrayed, rises into the air, nestles in the bosom of the rose, and sips the nectar of the choicest flowers." And so men sometimes fancy that they shall likewise return from the prison house of hades, to the joyousness of renewed and higher life. But, alas! the pleasing fancy disappears when brought to the light of truth and reason. The chrysalis was not really dead; the creature was only in process of development, from the condition of a crawling worm to that of a gay and painted butterfly—a worm with wings, which have reached the maturity of its being shall shortly die, and be no more.

The acorn too burst, its husky covering—becomes a sappling, and by time, a sturdy oak, which may live a thousand years; but when the oak dies, and crumbles to rottenness, it never lives again! And must our dead ones, and we ourselves, so go the way whence we shall not return? We, too, had our beginning in a tiny germ, which became a living form—a child, a boy—a man; and is our destiny to be when dead, to live no more—like a decayed old oak? We would not like it so; we shudder at the thought of being blotted out for ever, from conscious, sentient existence.

"——for who would lose
This earth & all of pain, tho' link'd to feeling?
These thoughts that wander thro' eternity."
—Milton.

And so we raise our eyes to God our Maker, and anxiously inquire of him: Is there a way back from the grave?

The cry is heard. Hark! A voice comes, clear and thrilling, from the Son of God himself, saying, "Fear not. I am the first and the last—I am he that liveth and was dead; and, behold, I am alive for evermore. Amen, and have the keys of the grave and of death!" "I am the way." "I am the resurrection and the life," etc.

There—there is the way back from the grave! and there is no other.

Thus have I tried to lead your thoughts up to the fountain of life, that you may drink thereof, and gain that life which never ends.

Will you favor me yet a little longer with your attention—and turn to that touching scene long familiar, where Jesus brought back from the grave Lazarus, the brother of Mary and Martha, after being buried four days.

John xi. 20–27. "Then Martha, as soon as she heard that Jesus was coming, went and met him: but Mary sat still in the house. Then said Martha unto Jesus, Lord, if thou hadst been here, my brother had not died. But I know, that even now, whatsoever thou wilt ask of God, God will give it thee. Jesus saith unto her, Thy brother shall rise again. Martha saith unto him, I know that he shall rise again in the resurrection at the last day. Jesus said unto her, I am the resurrection, and the life: he that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live: And whosoever liveth and believeth in me shall never die. Believest thou this? She saith unto him, Yea, Lord: I believe that thou art the Christ, the Son of God, which should come into the world."

Jesus here claims to be the cause, or source of resurrection. That in him was vested the power to effect resurrection and life to the dead. He had done so previously to this; and very strong and explicit were the words he used: "As the Father raiseth up the dead, and quickeneth them; even so the Son quickeneth whom he will. Verily, verily, I say unto you, The hour is coming, and now is, when the dead shall hear the voice of the Son of God: and they that hear shall live." John v. 21, 25.

These words were verified, when moved with compassion at the sight of a widow weeping for the loss of her only son, as she followed him to the grave, Jesus touched the bier, and the mournful procession stood still; and in obedience to the call: "Young man, I say unto thee, Arise; and he that was dead sat up and began to speak, and was restored to his mother." Luke vii. 12–15. So also in the case of Jairus' little daughter, Jesus took her by the hand, saying, "Maid, arise; and her spirit came again and she arose straightway." Luke viii. 54, 55. And again, when at the grave of Lazarus Jesus said with a loud voice, "Lazarus, come forth; and he that was dead came forth." John xi. 43, 44. Manifestly, the dead did hear the voice of the Son of God, and lived again. It was to these and such like events, that the Lord referred when he said, "The hour is coming, and now is, when the dead shall hear the voice of the Son of God, and they that hear shall live." These, however, were but the earnest of the results of his mighty power. Marvel not at this," said he, "for the hour is coming, in the which all that are in the graves shall hear his voice; and shall come forth; they that have done good, unto the resurrection of life; and they that have done evil, unto the resurrection of damnation." John v. 28, 29.

The same prerogative is claimed for the Son of God by the apostle Paul. "Since by man came death, by man came also the resurrection of the dead; for as in Adam, all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive." 1 Cor. xv. 21, 22.

The redemption brought in by the second Adam—the Lord from heaven—fully covers the ruin wrought by the first Adam. The first brought death to all: the second brings life to all men—by a resurrection from death—; the consequence of Adam's sin. Even to the last, Jesus is the way back from the grave. He died and rose, and revived "that he might be Lord both of the dead and the living." And all that are in the grave shall hear his voice, and shall come forth; they that have done good, unto the resurrection of life: and they that have done evil, to the resurrection of condemnation, to die the second death—not for the transgression of another, but for their own sin.

The resurrection of life, however, is that which the Scripture brings most into prominence. And no wonder. It is of it that Jesus spoke when he said to Martha, "I am the resurrection and the life: he that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live." Only to those who believe in him, can the resurrection be a matter of hope, and joy. "Blessed and holy is he that hath part in the first resurrection; on such, the second death hath no power." "They that are counted worthy to obtain that world, and the resurrection from amongst the dead, cannot die any more." and "are equal to the angels." "The Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and the trump of God, and the dead in Christ shall rise first, then we who are alive, and remain, shall be caught away to meet the Lord in the air; and so shall we ever be with the Lord. Wherefore comfort one another with these words."

Well they might; and well may we, if we are Christ's. Why should we sorrow, like those who have no hope for the loved ones who have fallen asleep? As surely as Jesus died and rose again, so shall they. And if we be found in Christ at this coming, we shall see them all again; and along with them, be ever with the Lord.

"A few short years of evil past
We reach the happy shore,
Where death divided friends at last
Shall meet to part no more."

And so it is that, though we grieve for the dead ones lying in the grave, we sorrow, not in despair, but in hope. And so it is that, in full consciousness of passing away the believer in Jesus departs in peace.

"Leaves this world without a tear,
Save for the friends he holds so dear."

The old disciple, full of days; the brother and sister, in the prime of life; the tender youth, like a blighted newly-blown flower—peacefully, and hopefully, breathe out their life, concerned only for the grief of those they are leaving.

Death comes alike to all; it may very soon come to you, dear reader, and to me. Union with him who is the resurrection and the life, by a living faith, is the only way back from the grave, to incorruptibility and joy. Shall we rest him, and not be ashamed?

THE RICH MAN AND LAZARUS.

The Pharisees heard Jesus talking to his disciples about the unjust steward, heard all that he said to them about being faithful in the use of the riches of this world, that the true riches might be committed to their trust in the world to come; that if they were not faithful in that which belonged to another man (or to God) they would not have given to them that which would be their own. If they were unjust in the least as God's stewards in the present time, they would be unjust, if the great wealth of the coming age should be placed in their hands. That there must be faithfulness here in the use of the unrighteous mammon, if when it failed—when they were dispossessed of all the treasures of this life—they would have the friends they had made with the deceitful wealth, "receive them into everlasting habitations," give them "an abundant entrance into the kingdom."

But these proud Pharisees loved wealth, and were exceeding covetous in seeking to acquire it. They were the unjust stewards. They were not faithful in the use of another man's (God's) wealth, but strove to justify themselves before men, for their dishonesty and wickedness. They were serving mammon, holding to him, loving him, and despising and hating God, and feeling the rebuke keenly, that came home to them, through the narration of the story, they derided Jesus for having said it.

They had no laid-up treasures, where moth and rust cannot corrupt. They were not trying to be "rich toward God" by being "rich in good works, liberal, willing to bestow. They were trusting in uncertain wealth, not in God. He had commanded them to use that wealth for him, if they would have the life that he had set before them, they used it for themselves and still trusted to be saved.

They forgot that God implants all these things richly for our enjoyment, to do good—that we may treasure up for ourselves a good foundation for the future, and so lay hold of that which is really life. That the enjoyment of riches comes from feeding the hungry, and clothing the naked.

In the house of one of the chief Pharisees, a short time before, he had described the great supper that God had prepared for his bidden ones, and had shown how, at supper time, when the servant called them to "come, all things were ready," they with one accord, made excuse and staid away, and that God, being angry at their rejection of his messenger and king, had sent into the streets and lanes of the city and into the highways and hedges of the country to have the poor, the maimed, the halt, and the blind brought into his house, in place of the men who had been bidden, who now should not taste of his supper.

They certainly must have understood that the Israelitish nation, as the first called of God, had been rejected, because of their refusal to have Christ reign over them; that nationally they had lost the kingship and priesthood of the world, as joint heir with Christ; that "the kingdom of God was to be taken from them and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof."

They who had exalted themselves were to be abased. God was now to take out of the Gentiles a people for his name.

The Jews were rich, they were clothed in fine raiment; the Gentiles were poor, and with no covering but filthy rags. All the riches of God's grace had heretofore been lavished upon the Jewish nation. To them had pertained "the adoption, the glory, and the covenants; the giving of the law, and the service of God and the promises," but now those "who were not his people were to be called the children of the living God." The beggar was to be clothed, the righteousness of faith was to come upon him. He was to be carried, adopted, into the family of Abraham by coming into Christ, "For as many of you as have been baptized into Christ have put on Christ; and if ye be Christ's then are ye Abraham's seed, and heirs, according to the promise."

The guilt of sin, the beggar's sores, being taken away by the blood of Christ—he having died to sin in baptism—is transported, as it were, into Abraham's bosom, by becoming legally related to him, and to all the household of God—a child of God and a joint heir with Christ.

The rich man died—the Jewish nation, as a nation, became extinct, and was buried among the nations of earth, scattered, persecuted, despised, a by-word and a hissing, their torment has been beyond the power of language to describe. They have seen the poor man partaking of the blessings of the gospel of Christ, joying in the promises made of God through the prophets, and have begged that a little of his comfort might be theirs. But the time of vengeance had come upon them, when they should "find no ease nor have rest for the sole of their foot." Deut. xxviii. 65.

Abraham, or Abraham speaking through his children—the adopted ones of the Gentiles—says "You have had your good things, you have had the opportunity of scenting the royal places as a nation with the Christ, in the world to come, but you have rejected him and the good things—the opportunity for this can no more be yours. Lazarus has had his evil things, he has been shut out from this privilege, he has hitherto had no opportunity for securing God's favor, but the blessing has now come upon him, and he is comforted, while you are tormented."

The gulf, too, is between you. You rest upon Moses, upon the law, and your trust in the law will not let you come over to us, nor can we pass to bring you over thence to us, because you will not come through the Christ, into Abraham's bosom—the gulf, save in a few exceptional cases, is to the Jew, literally impassable. Very few Jews have ever been converted to Christ. You pray that Lazarus be sent to your father's house, to your five brethren—the ten tribes—it is useless to send ministers from among these Gentiles to them. They have Moses and the prophets, if they will not hear these they would not be persuaded though Christ, risen from the dead, should visit them.

It cannot be doubted that the rich man was Judah and Benjamin, who had not been carried away from their own land when Christ was here upon earth. The ten tribes had been carried away, but they were not scattered among other nations, they went away in a body, and are still in existence as a body, somewhere upon the earth. so the torment and the persecution, that came upon Judah, never came upon them. For them the rich man's prayer was answered, "that they come not into this place of torment." They were the five brethren. The dogs were the Samaritans, who had given some crumbs of truth to the Gentiles.

So that instead of this parable being intended to teach the immortality of the soul and a place of torment for men between death and the resurrection, it is only meant to show the change of dispensations, the abasement and dispersion of the Jews, and the exaltation of the Gentiles.

PRAISE YE THE LORD.

Oh, that men would praise the Lord more for his goodness, and wonderful works toward the children of men. It is a good thing to give thanks unto the Lord, and to sing praises unto his holy name. This was the prayer of David, the sweet singer of Israel, and it shall be my prayer while I have my being in this world, and I hope to be able to praise him throughout the ceaseless ages. I can't keep silent any longer; I must tell of his goodness to me. He has blessed me in so many ways; his tender mercies are over us continually. And, dear friends, when I lay upon a bed of sickness, I felt his Divine presence. He is my sun and shield; the Lord will give grace and glory. No good thing will he withhold from them that walk uprightly. I could hardly wait till I got strong enough to sing the sweet songs that I sing daily when I am well, expressive of our hope; it is a blessed hope, it cheers us when in health, and in affliction, too; and, dear brethren and sisters, it reaches beyond this world of sorrow into the new earth state, where it will be fully realized. I do praise his holy name for those dear kind friends and sisters that ministered to my wants while sick, and I would wonder how I could ever pay them for the kindness shown me, but verily they will have their reward. God bless the sweet hearts and hands; may we never grow weary in well doing, for in due season we shall reap, if we faint not. I remember the sweet words of our Savior, and what he said of those who visited the sick and fed the hungry, and clothed the naked, and ministered to those in prison. "Inasmuch as ye have done it to the least of my brethren, ye have done it unto me; and the cup of cold water given in my name, they shall not lose their reward;" and I can praise his dear name for these sweet consolations, for they have come from his Divine lips; and he spoke as no man spoke. It makes me feel sad to see so much indifference to the cause of Christ.

Oh, dear readers of THE RESTITUTION, draw nearer to God, and he will draw nearer to you; ask him to dwell in your hearts by faith day by day, it will help you; I have felt blessed in this way.

O! tell me no more of this world's vain store,
The time for such trifles with me now is over;
A country I've found where true joys abound,
To dwell I'm determined on that happy ground.

Selections.

UNDER HIS WINGS.

That means today, not some other time! Under his wings, the shadowing wings of the Most High, you, poor little helpless one, are to trust today.

When the little eaglets, that have not yet a feather to fly with, are under the great wings of the parent eagle, how safe they are! Who would dare to touch them? If a bold climber put his hand into the nest then, those powerful wings would beat him in a minute from his hold, and he would fall down on the rocks and be dashed to pieces. So safe you will be "under his wings;" "nothing shall by any means hurt you" there.

When the wild snow-storms rage around the eyrie, and the mountain cold is felt that is death to an unprotected sleeper, how warm the little eaglets are kept! Not an arrow of the keen blast touches them, poor little featherless things, not a snowflake touches them. So warm shall you be kept "under his wings" when any trouble or cold day comes, or even any sudden blast of unkindness or loneliness.

"Under his wings shalt thou trust;" not, "shalt thou see." If one of the eaglets wanted to see for itself what was going on, and thought it could take care of itself for a little while, and hopped from under the shadow of the wings, it would be neither safe nor warm. The sharp wind would chill it and the cruel hand might seize it then. So you are to trust, rest quiet and peacefully "under his wings;" stay there, not by peeping out and wondering whether God is really taking care of you! You may be always safe and happy there. Safe, for "in the shadow of thy wings will I make my refuge." Happy, for "in the shadow of thy wings will I rejoice."

Remember, too, that it is a command as well as a promise; it is what you are to do today, all day long: "Under his wings shalt thou trust."—F. R. Havergal.

THE COMING ONE.

The most devout and diligent students of God's word, of all Christian denominations, are coming to be of "one heart and of one mind," "that the remoter signs and antecedents of the second advent" are beginning to appear. And if so, it behooves all who thus give attention to this solemn and interesting theme to have a clear outline of this truth in their minds. And as the silvery morning, with its dewy freshness and inspiring breezes, calls us to arouse from our slumbers and prepare to meet the rising sun, so the present prophetic daybreak is calling up the sleeping virgins to arise and shine, for, "Behold, the bridegroom cometh." And while the world is busy in its unbelieving course, let us be "as men who wait for the Lord."

The true and proper attitude of the "faithful in Christ Jesus" is to be that of "virgins" who are waiting for the "Bridegroom." They should be characterized by self-abnegation and unworldliness—"denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, and living godly, righteously and soberly in this present world."

This habit will, of course, make them appear somewhat singular, and "men wondered at." Still it will secure to those who thus walk a restfulness of spirit, a cheerfulness of heart and quietness of conscience to which those who follow the "fashions of this world" will be comparative strangers. Jesus will give them his fellowship, and they will realize the "peace of God that passeth all understanding," and "the joy of the Lord will be their strength."

Jesus is coming. Acts i. 2. The signs that are antecedent to that great crisis are beginning to appear. One sign is the prevalence of "a form of godliness" without the power. This is painfully patent to all who are waiting for the Lord. At no period in the past history of the world has there ever been so much profession of religion. But may we not say, without any breach of charity, that if the test our Lord gave is to be applied, "by their fruits (i. e. principles and practice) ye shall know them," how small a remnant would be left! Compare, or rather contrast, the lives of thousands "who profess and call themselves Christians" with the life required by the divine standard: and how painful and saddening the discrepancy!

The Lord requires a rigid non-conformity to the world, in its maxims, and fashions, and expediences, while too many, alas! are as indulgent in the pomps and vanities of this present evil world as if there were no other life, and the course of our being terminated under the "shadow of death." The Scriptures say, "Be not conformed to this world;" "if any man love the world, the love of the Father is not in him." And its author makes no mistakes! Yet this is the feature of this age to too great an extent.

We live under the shadow of the coming apostasy. The clouds of the impending storm are gathering, and the mountains of human guilt are drawing those clouds to a center, till there shall be a time of trouble indescribable! Mark xiii. 19. This is a remote prognostication that "he who is to come will come." Heb. x. 37. Blessed are they who are ready. Meanwhile what is our office? If his people, it is clear and plain. It is no way difficult to ascertain what should be our position. "Let your loins be girded about with truth, and your lamps burning, and ye yourselves like unto men who wait for the Lord."—Christian Herald.

SELF-SACRIFICE.

Self-sacrifice is at the root of all the blossoms of goodness that have survived the wreck of Paradise. There never was a heart but had gleams of it. Shining at times in some royal natures, diffusive as the light of day without clouds, there is yet no life so dark and clouded but it sends a golden shaft through some opening rift. To be great-hearted for the love we bear to our Master and in imitation of him, is the ideal of Christianity, for it is the religion of him whose life and death were self-sacrifice. If we are to follow, we must, like him, bear a cross. It has been so from the beginning. Call the dead roll of the world's worthies—its prophets, apostles, martyrs and saints, the great teachers of mankind, the architects of our liberties, the heroes of civilization, the ministering angels who have blessed the poor, the sick, the dying, and the helpless. Has not the measure of goodness been that of self-denial? They have suffered that others might suffer less; they have died for the truth that others might live; they have defended human rights by enduring unspeakable wrongs—the tears and blood. Love, like the fabled bird, pierces his own bosom to feed his loved ones. Is not heaven itself to be reached through death? The blessed One entered not into his glory until he had been crucified. The leaders of mankind had to tread a blackened and scorched path of suffering, and we enter into their labors with their sorrows. White robes of earthly saintship, like those of heaven, are only gained through much tribulation. Everything good costs self-denial.

EVIL COMPANY.

If we are to walk with God, we must go nowhere that Christ will not go. Oh, how many venture beyond the territory in which they ought to walk, and then wonder why they have not the enjoyments of religion! They go where Jesus will not go. "Blessed is the man that walketh not in the counsel of the ungodly." Christ is not there. "Nor standeth in the way of sinners." Christ is not there. "Nor sitteth in the seat of the scornful." Christ is not there. If you walk with Christ, keep out of all evil company, of all evil associations; keep from all evil places—from every place where you cannot go with the spirit of Christ, and that, if upon earth, you might not expect to meet him there. If you go out of the territory where he would not go, you need not expect to find him.—Bishop Simpson.

THE RESTITUTION.

S. A. CHAPLIN, EDITOR.

Plymouth, Indiana, June 21, 1882.

AFFAIRS in Egypt are ominous of war. It is our own opinion that this country is destined to fill quite a prominent place in the time of the end.

OUR Conference at Antioch was one of unusual interest. The Social meeting on Sunday morning called to mind the like precious seasons of years gone by, when the glory to be revealed cast all the things of time into the shade, and when the things eternal were estimated at their worth, as compared with the things temporal.

OUR time, since arriving at home last week, has been so taken up in attending the conference at Antioch, and other matters, that we cannot write much for the present number. An account of our visit with the brethren at Philadelphia, book notices, and some additional notes of travel, must be deferred till our next.

THE telegrams to the Daily Journals report damaging wind and rain storms all over the country from the Atlantic coast to the Mississippi river. Kansas, Missouri and Iowa have been visited with destructive tornados, demolishing many buildings, and destroying many lives. The loss of property in Iowa is estimated at more than a million of dollars, and the loss of life at more than one hundred persons. Perhaps there may be something in the perihelion prognostications after all that has been said to the contrary.

Editor Restitution:

I send you enclosed a translation (from the Septuagint) of Jacob's prophetic blessing. The variations in meaning as compared with the King James or the Douay versions are so marked, that students of prophesy will certainly be interested, those who have not had the time or opportunity to consult the original.

It would be very strange if the Jewish translators from the Hebrew into the Greek had made such a botch of it as the King James and Douay translations from the Hebrew would seem to indicate. There is this in favor of the old translation from the Hebrew into the Greek, though to my mind, it means something a d is to some extent comprehensible and consistent with the rest of the Scriptures so far as they are comprehensible.

There is very much that I would like to say in the way of comment upon the passage, but time and space forbid, and I will only call attention to one word in the blessing upon Joseph. In my translation I have followed the usual rendering, although I favor another for several good reasons. The word is auxanoo. Whether the word in this form comes from auxoo, meaning to grow or increase, or from euxaomai, meaning to vow or pray, turns upon one letter in the stem, viz. o, and whether this letter be o or o depends upon whether the writer used an Attic or old Epic form, as the older Epic forms generally softened the broader a of the later Attic into e. So it necessarily must be determined rather by interpretation than by translation which thought was probably in the mind of the inspired writer.

Was Joseph, Jacob's youngest son the child of a vow after Jacob's thorough conversion and after he had received the new name of Israel. I am inclined to think so. Let others think and investigate for themselves. If from euxaomai the form would be the perfect passive participle; if from auxanoo it would be the Epic form of the Aorist middle, and would read "Joseph, son (whom I vowed or prayed for) or son of my vow, scalot son of my vow, my youngest son, etc."

The prophecy upon Dan is very remarkable in view of modern claims in regard to Dan's agency in the civilization of the European nations, and I never could see exactly how "Gad" could "gird himself backward" as he is represented to do in the Douay version, nor the special significance of Naphthali being a "hind let loose" in the King James version. If I succeed in getting other scholars and students of prophecy interested in this topic I shall have accomplished my object.

Yours respectfully,

CHAS. GARDNER.

Jacob's Prophetic Blessing.

GEN. XLIX. 1–27, INCLUSIVE.

And Jacob called his sons and said unto them, May ye have been gathered together that I may declare unto you what will befall you in the last days. May ye have been gathered together and may ye have hearkened unto me, O ye sons of Jacob, may ye have hearkened, O Israel, may ye have hearkened unto your Father.

Reuben, my first-born, thou my strength and a beginning of my offspring hard to bear with art thou, and self-willed in thy stubbornness, thou hast foamed out like water, mayest thou not have soothed away with fervor, for thou didst go up unto the couch of thy father. Then thou didst pollute the bed unto which thou didst go up. Symeon and Levi, brethren, consummated an iniquity of their choosing. Would that my mind had not come into their counsel and my secret thoughts to contend against their sedition; because in their anger they slew men and in their unlawful desire they hamstrung a bull. Accursed was their anger, because it was self-willed, and their madness, because it was stiff-necked. I will distribute them in Jacob and scatter them in Israel.

Judah, may thy brethren have praised thee: may thy hands be upon the neck of thine enemies. The sons of thy Father will worship thee. A lion's whelp is Judah. From a shoot hast thou gone up, O my son. Reclining thou hast lain down to rest like a lion, who will awaken him. A ruler from out Judah will not fail and a leader from between his thighs until those things which remain in reserve for him shall have come. And he is an expectation of nations, he who bindeth his foal to the vine and his ass' foal to its tendril. He will wash his priestly robe in wine and in the blood of the grape his outer garments. His eyes are more gracious than wine and his teeth whiter than milk.

Zabulun, by the sea-coast will he dwell and beside the rushing impulse of ships and he will extend unto Sidon.

Issachar longed for that which was good, when he rested between the lots, and when he perceived the rest that was good, and the land that was fat he put his shoulder to the toil, and became a husbandman.

Dan will judge his royal people as though he were also one tribe in Israel. (to understand this see Ezekiel prophecy of the final allotment of the land).

And let Dan have become a serpent in a way, one who lieth in wait in a path, one who biteth the horse's heel: and when he swaiteth the salvation of the Lord the horseman will fall backward.

Gad, piracy will rob him, but he will rob it utterly.

Asher, his bread will be fat, and he will give luxury to rulers.

Naphthali, a stump that hath remained will he be, one who yieldeth beautiful fruit in his product.

Joseph, thou son who hath been enlarged, thou son who hath been enlarged to be my zealot, thou my youngest son, for me mayest thou have subverted unto him whom the slanderers mocked at. Even did they shoot at him, the lords of the bow, and their bows along with their might were broken, and the sinews of the hand of their right arms became relaxed because of the hand of Jacob's Mighty One. From thence was the Israel who prevailed, namely, from God thy Father, and my God hath helped thee, and blessed thee with a blessing from heaven above and with a blessing of an earth that hath all things. On account of a blessing for breasts and a womb, hath he strengthened the blessings of thy father and mother above the blessings of solitary mountains; and over the blessings of everlasting hills will they be upon the head of Joseph and upon the crown of the head of the brethren of whom he hath become the leader.

Benjamin, a rapacious wolf is he, in the morning even now will he eat, and in evening doth he give sustenance.

Conference Report.

The Church of God of Northern Indiana met in Quarterly Conference with the Antioch Church, in Marshall County, commencing June 16.

The conference was called to order by the Chairman, D. T. Halstead; the Secretary not being present Jared Benjamin was chosen Secretary pro tem. Delegates were present from Eagle Creek church, Stark county, who presented a letter requesting recognition. The letter shows that the church was organized Feb. 26, 1881, with four members, and that they now number thirty-nine. The conference gave the delegates a hearty welcome and bid the church God speed.

On motion of Brother Roberts it was decided to recommend that the churches of this conference send letters or delegates to the annual conference giving a full account of their numbers and standing.

On motion it was decided that the chair appoint a committee of three to determine the time and place for holding the next annual conference, whereupon S. A. Chaplin, Wm. Ballsbach, and B. S. Dwiggins were appointed such committee.

Brother Ramsey, of Iowa, preached Saturday night to a very attentive audience, from Acts iv. 11, 12.

Sunday morning, at nine o'clock the brethren and sisters assembled and spent an hour in social meeting, and it was truly an hour of rejoicing to hear so many testify of the goodness and love of God. They all spoke of a lively hope of eternal life in the kingdom of God. We can truly say it was good for us to be there. A more harmonious meeting it has not been our privilege to attend, and our heart's desire is that we may all feel strengthened and encouraged to do our Master's will.

At ten o'clock Brother J. F. Wagoner spoke to a large and attentive audience on these words: "All Scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness, that the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works."

The committee to whom was referred the selection of the time and place for holding the next annual conference decided it should be held at Rensselaer, commencing Friday before the fourth Sunday in August next, and continue over the following Sunday.

A most earnest and hearty invitation is extended to all the brethren and sisters to attend. Let us show that we are willing to sacrifice our time and work for the Lord.

There were present at the meeting the following ministers: S. A. Chaplin, Plymouth, C. C. Ramsey, Floyd, Iowa, D. T. Halstead and B. S. Dwiggins, Rensselaer, H. Barnhill, Argos, J. F. Wagoner, Denver, H. R. Carter, Ligonier, and A. B. Oppy, Plymouth.

These brethren are ready and willing to work in the Master's vineyard, and our earnest prayer is that their labors in the service of God may be abundantly blessed, and that many may be constrained to come to the light, and that the cause of God will be built up through their labors.

Report of the Northwestern Advent Christian Conference of Michigan.

Conference convened according to notice with the church at Dayton, April 29, at 9 a. m. After singing and prayer, the Conference was called to order by the President, Elder John Bower. The Secretary being absent, L. Bower was chosen Secretary pro tem. The following committees were appointed by the Chair:

On Devotion—S. S. Mitchel, A. C. West, S. Dudly.

On Business—O. R. L. Crozier, J. Crumb and George Deboice.

On Credentials—O. R. L. Crozier, R. Burtonshaw and S. S. Mitchel.

Ministerial Committee—Leslie Bower, R. Burtonshaw, and O. R. L. Crozier.

Members of the Conference present: Ministers—John Bower, J. Crumb, O. R. L. Crozier, R. Burtonshaw, Wm. Wheeler, L. Bower, M. J. Jones, Geo. Deboice, R. Balloy.

Ruling Elders—A. C. West, J. J. Bennett, S. S. Mitchel.

Delegates—P. S. Decker, J. Raymer, Isaac Van Tassell, Dewit C. Traver, Mary Ann Rodgers, Mary Bush, Joseph G. S. Satorlee.

Voted to invite all the visiting brethren to take part with us in our business meeting, except voting. Elder Wm. C. Wells offered himself to the Conference for membership with the following communication, and was received by a unanimous vote:

Dear Brethren:—I have had in contemplation the thought of offering myself to your Conference for membership. In doing this I would say that I was ordained or set apart as a gospel minister by a council of Baptist churches and ministers in Butler, Branch county, Mich., Jan. 1, 1865, and have been a church member since 1851. In all this time I have never had any charges preferred against me. A few years since I learned from the Bible the doctrine of the natural mortality of man, the soon coming of the Lord and the kingdom on earth. The preaching of this disturbed my Baptist brethren, and in our conversation with Brother Beals, the Michigan Baptist State Convention General Missionary, he said to me, "Brother Wells, submit yourself to the denomination." I was suppressed, and answered "I can submit myself to no one but Jesus Christ and his word." That position is claimed as Baptist principles. Loyalty to Jesus and his word, but the fact that I could acknowledge no master but Jesus was the cause of my leaving the Baptists. Believing that you as a company of Christians acknowledge no master but Jesus, I would be glad to become associated with you, believing that a gospel church is an independent body of Christians, governed wholly by the New Testament.

Respectfully submitted.

WM. C. WELLS.

The Church of God at Hopprie was presented at the Conference for membership, and was received by a unanimous vote. The report of ministers was very good and encouraging, all feeling the importance of the commission. Go.

Brother Fox, of Pyron, was with us. He has recently commenced to preach the coming of Christ. Brother Drew, of Jamestown, was also with us, and gave us a good warm exhortation. He is a live man in a live work.

At 3 p. m. the Business Committee reported the following:

Resolved, That we advise the churches to elect delegates to our Conference.—Carried. Moved that the churches be advised to take more pains to have regular preaching.—Carried. Moved that the churches be advised to adopt some uniform method for raising funds; we would recommend laying by on the first day of the week.—Carried. Moved that the next quarterly meeting be held with the church at Garfield Center, and that B. Bailey preach the opening sermon.—Carried. Moved that the report of this meeting be sent to the World's Crisis, Bible Banner, and THE RESTITUTION for publication.—Carried. Moved to adjourn to the call of the Chair and Secretary.

L. BOWER, Sec., pro tem.

There was fifty-seven testimonies in the Love Feast Sunday morning, and forty-nine at the Communion in the evening.

Report of the Michigan Conference.

The twenty-fifth annual conference of the Church of God in Michigan was held in the Christian meeting house at Watson Corners, Allegan Co., beginning Thursday evening, June 1, 1882.

The ministers in attendance were Elders B. Woodward, H. R. Kendall, E. Hoyt, J. S. Hatch, and L. C. Chase, of Michigan, also O. M. Myers of Illinois, and J. T. Ongley of Pennsylvania. The meeting was opened with prayer by Brother Kendall, followed by a sermon by Brother Ongley, text, Titus ii. 13.

Friday, June 2. Met for social worship at 9 A. M.

At 10:30 Brother Kendall spoke from John vii. 37, "If any man thirst, let him come unto me, and drink." Brother Hatch spoke at 12 M. from 1 John iv. 17, "Herein is our love made perfect that we may have boldness in the day of judgment."

Met again at 7 P. M. After a short social meeting Brother Myers spoke on the commission of the apostles. Mark xvi. 15, 16.

Saturday, June 3. The business meeting was called to order at 9 A. M. by President B. Woodward. The secretary being absent, D. F. Spencer was elected Secretary, Pro. Tem. The reports of the Secretary, Treasurer, and Evangelist were read and accepted. The election of officers was next in order and resulted as follows: Pres. D. F. Spencer, Pine Creek, Calhoun Co.; Sec. Herbert Miller, Mendon, St. Joseph Co.; Treas. Wm. McCrodan, Hammond, Kent Co. Executive Board, L. C. Chase, C. H. Richardson, Wm. Kent, G. B. Myers, G. W. Coats, Jacob Lemon, P. A. Brown and H. C. Hammond. The President appointed Bros. McCrodan, Kent, I. Cat, Hoyt, and Hammond as a special committee to devise and recommend a plan for raising an Evangelist fund. After the business meeting Brother Chase spoke from 2 Tim. i. 13, "Hold fast the form of sound words which thou hast heard of me."

In the evening Brother Hatch spoke on the subject of the Christian's hope. Text James i. 16, 17.

Sunday, June 4. The Conference assembled at 9:30 A. M. Brother Ongley offered prayer after which followed an interesting hour of social worship. At 10:30 Brother Chase gave a candid discourse from Luke xxiii. 19–43; the thief on the cross. At noon Brother Myers spoke from 1 Cor. xv. 33, "Evil communications corrupt good manners." In the evening Brother Ongley spoke at 6 o'clock from Heb. iv. 9.

A vote of thanks was extended to Brother Woodward for the able manner in which he had discharged his duty as Evangelist. Brother Chase spoke from Isa. xlv. 12, "I have made the earth and created man upon it."

The meeting closed by partaking of the Lord's Supper. Owing to the unusually rainy weather the attendance was not as large as was expected, but all who attended seemed well pleased with the meeting. The Brethren in Watson have the thanks of all present for their hospitality and kindness. The Executive Board appointed J. S. Hatch of St. Joseph, Berrien Co., Mich. as State Evangelist for the ensuing year. Persons wishing his services in that capacity will please address him as above. Also L. C. Chase, E. Hoyt, B. Woodward, and W. McCrodan, were appointed as local Evangelists.

The ordinance of baptism was appointed for Monday, when it was expected that several would become members of Christ's body.

HERBERT MILLER, Sec'y.

WATSON, Mich.

June the fourth closed the evangelical labors of Elder B. W. Woodward, as state evangelist. As an evangelist, Brother Woodward has great reason to rejoice and be exceeding glad, for his efforts in bringing the truth before the people in the western part of Michigan from north to south have been crowned with the richest reward that could be asked by mortal. Many souls who have walked in the darkness for years, have been brought to the light, and in the cleft of the rock found shelter and comfort for this life and a glorious expectation of immortality in the happy future. On Sunday, June 5th, as a final reward for his labors in Watson he raised from the watery grave eleven souls, who rejoice, most of them, in the light brought them by his earnest and faithful labors here. Some of the number had been previously immersed, but not feeling satisfied with the past, threw aside denominational prejudices and faithfully performed their duties, and arose to walk in the new light and life of God's favored ones. Brother Woodward has been found a most efficient and faithful worker, despite his bereavement and poor health of the past year, and though this coming year another takes his place as state evangelist, he will not sit idly down, while so many are calling him in the direst need of human souls, the need of a more thorough knowledge of the Bible. And so he will use the talent given him, not allowing it to rust while he waits by the wayside. And may God bless his efforts in the future as in the past is the earnest prayer of his many friends.

GIFFORD, Iowa.

Editor Restitution:

As I have never noticed anything in THE RESTITUTION from our town, and having read a great many letters from the brethren and sisters from different parts of the country, I thought perhaps it might be pleasing to them to know that a small company of believers in the one faith lived here. We have had no preaching here since Brother Myers went to Illinois, until April, when Brother Ramsey preached us four discourses. He came here upon the heels of a Union Revival that had been in progress for five weeks. They closed on Thursday evening, and Brother Ramsey began on Friday evening. On Sunday he went to the water and baptized four into the all-saving name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins. We organized a Bible reading after Brother Ramsey went home, and we meet every Sunday at three o'clock, read and exhort one another to abide strong in the faith. Our Orthodox friends have learned long ago that we understand God's plan of salvation too well for them, so they keep silent. During the meeting alluded to above they revived themselves, and undertook to convince us of our error, but they soon learned that a house built upon a solid rock would not fall, though the winds and the rain beat upon it vehemently. We carried our Bibles with us, and when we met them in the shops and market places we would discuss the matter with them, and they actually got so they would slip out and run when they would see us coming. When I saw this I could not help thinking what Paul said, 'The time will come when they will not endure sound doctrine.' The ministers told their converts if any one offered to argue with them not to listen, to stick their fingers in their ears, for, said they, you are not capable of understanding the Bible. I could only say, O Lord, how long will men continue to pervert and turn a deaf ear to thy word? May God help them to see and to do.

In talking with them upon the subject of baptism, for part of them were good old Quakers that did not believe in water baptism, we drove them from one position to another until they, in order to sustain their belief, said (a minister, too,) that the apostles were divided, and did not teach the same doctrine—especially upon the subject of baptism. When they had to acknowledge that the Holy Ghost was divided, and directed the apostles differently; I had to leave them—my hope for them was lost. In the last days perilous times shall come. When we look around us and see the wickedness of man on every hand, and see how God's word is handled, and when we see the frost biting our corn down to the ground in June, and hear of the cyclones that are sweeping through the land, rendering great havoc to life and crops, we can realize that the times spoken of have come. However these are only the beginning of sorrows. Our Orthodox friends tell us that we are always harping upon this point, they say the world is growing better, these signs are no warning to them. When we stop and think, how many we can think of that are looking for Christ's return while the world is going on in its haste, but few are looking for the return of the Lord, and thousands upon thousands not even think of such a thing. Will he not come upon them as a thief in the night? Let those of us that are looking for the Deliverer take heed to the signs given us, and watch lest he come and find us naked.

Soldiers of the Cross Reunion.

It has been decided by the brethren of the One Faith in the South-West to have a Soldier's Reunion at Pringel's Ford, on the Rail Road, eight miles east of Parsons, Kansas, not far from Brother Phillip John, (P. O. Parsons, Kan.) to whom any can write who desire to. Meeting to commence on Friday night, July 14, 1882, and continue over Sunday in camp. As it is to be a camp meeting, let the soldiers come, as much as possible, in wagons and bring bedding and food and tents if you have them. Should any find it impossible to come in that way, and come by rail or on horseback, then some provision will be made for them in camp or near—only come. It is not a conference meeting to quarrel over differences, but a genuine Soldier's Reunion, for the purpose of rejoicing with each other in the battles of the past wherein we were victorious and to weep with each other in battles wherein we were taken prisoner; and to hear words from the brethren from all parts of the country that we may be bound closer together and therefore strengthened to hold out faithful to the end.

Many of the brethren speakers will be there from all parts of the South-West, and it would therefore seem good that all the brethren in South-Eastern Kansas, South-West Missouri, and South-Western Arkansas attend this Soldier's Reunion and get acquainted with each other and learn from each other and thereby open up a broader field in their own vicinity for disseminating the truth.

This would be a good time for eastern or visiting brethren to come and get acquainted with their western brethren, and to encourage and strengthen them by their counsels.

I expect to be there —on my way to Texas—commencing a meeting in Texas 80 miles west of Dennison on the 21st of July and then through North-Western Texas; I can be addressed at Bethany, Mo.

BRING THE BOOK.

"The people spake unto Ezra the scribe to bring the book, and he read therein before the street that was before the water gate from the morning until midday, before the men and the women, and those that could understand, and the ears of all the people were attentive unto the book of the law."

Yes, bring the book; it is God's voice, speaking to the children of men. No matter about creeds, no matter what the multitudes think or believe, the truth can only be found in God's book. He commands the sinner to "go and buy the truth." The price may seem great, it may cost the sacrifice of all worldly gain, but the treasure once in possession will make all other things seem but as dross. It will not save the sinner to think, over and strongly, that he will be saved out of Christ. God has said, "believe the gospel," "repent," "be baptized," and "keep the commandments." These are his conditions of salvation, and we must respect them, if deliverance from sin and death, and the possession of life everlasting, and the glories of God's kingdom are ever to be our portion. Who has a right to say that we can be saved without complying with these conditions? He who does, arrogates to himself authority and assumes fearful responsibility. We need to bring the book before the multitudes—oh, that they could be attentive to the words of the law—then might they have life.—S. R. W., in Glad Tidings.

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

The brethren will smeet in conference at Lanark, Ill., June 23, and continue over Sunday. A general invitation is extended to all, and we urge the brethren to turn out and make this one of the enjoyable seasons. Come one, come all!

J. M. GLOTTFELTY.

There will be a three days meeting of the One Faith, if the Lord is willing, at Pleasant Hill school house, in the southeast corner of Montague Co., Tex., four miles south of Forestburg, and thirty miles west of Gainsville, on the Jamsville & Jacksboro road, and one-half mile west of the old conference ground. Meeting to commence Friday evening, July 21, at 4 o'clock. A general invitation is extended to all. Bro. J. S. Lawyer of Missouri is expected to be present.

EGYPT—ALARM AT THE HEADQUARTERS OF THE SUEZ CANAL.

ISMAILA, June 19.—Alarm is felt here because of the proximity of a large number of Bedouin Arabs, who have lately approached close to the town and been observed hovering along the unguarded banks of the canal.

BANKS PREPARED FOR A SIEGE.

ALEXANDRIA, June 19.—The banks are mostly prepared to resist a seige. The Ottoman Bank has been converted into an armory. The entrance is blocked by bales of silk, and the clerks are well supplied with provisions. They also have ropes ready to haul up refugees from the streets.

ARABI PASHA

has thanked the Khedive for his appointment as member of the Ministry. There is no doubt he is straining every nerve to maintain order. He is beginning to realize that he has provoked an exodus of Europeans which will ruin the country.

DES MOINES, Iowa, June 18.—A tornado swept through central Iowa late last night from northwest to southeast, from twenty miles north of Des Moines. The town of Grinnell was struck by it and half the place was left in ruins. The following despatch was received from Grinnell early this morning: Our city is half in ruins by a cyclone. From five to ten persons are killed and from fifty to one hundred wounded. Send doctors from Newton and Des Moines by special train. We have no wires working outside of the town. Send immediately by order of the Mayor of this city. Both college buildings and half of our best residences are flat on the ground.

O. M. CHRISTIAN.

MALCOM, June 17.—A terrible cyclone passed over here at 9:30 to-night. We have found seven dead, and the wounded are numerous. Five of the best business houses, including the Gazette office, are demolished, and both churches and one-third of the dwelling houses in town are flat or badly damaged.

KANSAS CITY SWEPT BY A TORNADO.

KANSAS CITY, June 18.—The most destructive wind and rain storm that has visited this city in years occurred between one and two o'clock yesterday morning. The velocity of the wind was estimated at sixty miles an hour. The rainfall was heavy and the lightning terrific. Not a single square in the town escaped the fury of the storm. The streets in every quarter were strewn with signs, awnings, limbs of trees, and debris of all descriptions. Scarcely an exposed building in the city remained whole, chimneys being blown down, roofs taken off, and in many cases houses ruined. The total loss will probably reach $200,000.

LEAVENWORTH, June 18.—A terrible wind storm prevailed between 12 and 1 o'clock yesterday morning. St. Mary's Academy, four miles south of this city, suffered greatly.

CAIRO, Ill. June 18.—A heavy wind and rain storm swept over this city at about 3 p. m. today, doing great damage to roofs and trees, and overturning about twenty box cars in the Illinois Central yards.

SECRET PRAYER.

Oh, sweet and healing is secret prayer, when the heart, oppressed with a burden which none but God must know, and none but God can remove, retires with him apart, and lays down the load at his feet, and pours all anxieties into his pitying bosom, where no eye but his can see, and no ear but his can hear! There we may use postures, expressions, pleadings, that might not be suitable in the presence of others. There we may lay open those hidden wants and solicitudes which we may not reveal to our dearest friend. Cyprian has very beautifully described the benefit and delight which he found in retired prayer and meditation: "That no profane listener may hinder my musings, and no domestic clamor drown them, I withdrew to a neighboring solitude, where creeping tendrils of the young vines form a shady arbor. Behold! there I obtain a feeling of truth which lessening could not give, and drink in, from the quick impartings of divine grace, stories of heavenly thought which long years of study never supply."

King John, the monarch who rules Abyssinia with a rod of iron, is severely opposed to missionaries. He has banished a party of them who recently arrived at Massowah. These missionaries had distributed some Bibles to the natives, but, under the influence of the native priests, King John caused search to be made for these in the houses and huts. In cases where copies of the Bibles were found the owners were chained and otherwise treated with great cruelty.

STAND FAST IN THE FAITH.

JOHN WALKER BROWN.

Stand fast in the faith!—'tis the mandate of God,
Once uttered on Sinai, once written in blood;
From the throne of the Lord, from His throne in the skies
It was breathed o'er earth, it is uttered on high.

Stand fast in the faith!—'tis the warning cry true
Poured deeply and clearly through ages of time,
Through the long lapse of years and centuries old,
Like the voice of a trump it its burthen hath told.

Stand fast in the faith!—for apostles have died,
With the words on their lips, earnest souls might decide;
Confessors and martyrs, in defiance and flame,
Have shrunk not in its servants and witnessed its claim.

Stand fast in the faith!—for the church of the Lord
Hath inscribed on her banners its glorious word;
O'er all its bright colors its glories displayed,
And blazoned on bosses, and buckler, and blade.

Stand fast in the faith!—for the warrior host on Through fiery ordeal battle-lines, still warfare is done;
'Till the trumpet of conquest sounds over the field,
And the palm waves proudly o'er helmet and shield.

Stand fast in the faith!—there's no sound on the line or,
Like the voice of the storm when it howls through the tree,
Or its hoarse notes of warning, how sounding afar,
Over the elements in the wild crash of war.

Stand fast in the faith!—for the foes are about
Withdrawn—full of fear across the realm of God;
The wild hordes of Edom—the spearmen of Gath,
And the troops of Philistia with weapons of wrath.

Stand fast in the faith!—there are traitors that creep
Through the slumbering camps when the night watch is deep;
Who unlike the emissary who went to betray
The altars of God to the idols of clay.

Stand fast in the faith!—there are those at thy side,
Who can vanquish the foe in his vampories of pride;
Be loyal—be valiant—by heroic be inspired,
Lo! the chariots of God and the horses of fire.

Stand fast in the faith!—though the conflict be fast,
The field hath no strife where thy exploits is lost:
His eye is upon thee—thou know'st what he will,
"He: quit you like men—and stand fast in the faith."

Stand fast in the faith!—though the faithless may jeer,
We will peril our all, O Redeemer, for thee;
We will stand in the conflict, mounted that shine arm
Shall shield every soldier from peril and harm.

SOME THOUGHTS ON GOD AND HIS CHRIST.

"God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him, should not perish."

In this was manifested the love of God toward us because that God sent his only begotten son unto the world that we might live through him. The first knowledge to be acquired in the Christian religion is that of the being and character of God, and next the relation and mission of his Christ. "Ye believe in God, believe also in me," said Jesus. But can we not remember the awful pictures of the Divine Being that used to be portrayed to us in our early days. A great wrathful and Omnipotent Being who cannot bear to look upon sin, and whose dread vengeance hath the dark and frightful forms of squirming torture set against a lurid background of burning sulphur. Then we had the interposing figure of the Lamb of God who "offers himself a sacrifice to satisfy Divine justice" and hides those damning iniquities of ours behind his blood, like a veil, then the Creator is satisfied at the sight of the blood of his Son, and we dare approach tremblingly singing, "Oh, the blood, the cleansing blood," etc.

I suppose it is unnecessary to state to the majority of the readers of THE RESTITUTION that this is all wrong, but as some may read this that are still groping after light, it might be well to state right here for their benefit that this monstrous story, although promulgated with all the solemn sanctimoniousness that ignorant folks mistake for religion, does not contain the truth as one of its elements. False at the beginning, false all the way through, and a calumny on a good God in the end.

At this point, however, we must be prepared to receive a discharge of texts in which "blood" occurs, "the blood upon the door posts," "without shedding blood there is no remission," etc., all duly emphasized with the tooth and nail emphasis. Nevertheless it must be repeated in spite of all the misunderstood quotations to the contrary that such doctrine is a calumny on the living God, and it must be added that the train of evils that have attended it by man may never be estimated. Of it was born the horrors of religious persecutions of the "middle ages," by it was banished the proper filial affection that man owes his Maker; it has been the prolific mother of scoffers, infidels and atheists, (see accounts of the early training of such men as Thomas Paine and Robert Ingersoll by themselves), and the end is not yet, even in those who have corrected their theology to something of the Bible standard, yet the terror implanted in youth is hard to get rid of, and the best of many sensitive minds continues warped in proportions as the foul heresy was burned in during the period of their youth.

The quotations at the head of this paper express the true character of our Father in heaven, and the relations of his Son and a shadow. But one or two quotations is nothing, one dozen; it is easy to mix and mingle quotations to support an absurdity; the whole tenor of the Bible is one long history of the patient government of a just and powerful God, whose tender mercy readily forgave iniquity, transgression and sin, who made all allowance where the spirit was willing but the flesh weak, who overlooked ignorance that was not willful, in short it is an account of his fatherhood. The Holy Scriptures is a long appeal direct from the voice that called our spirits into being. "Look unto me all ye ends of the earth, and be ye saved," "wait upon me," "I have loved you with an everlasting love," etc. He has spent the rolling centuries drawing us with the cord of love and with the bands of a man, and would you tell me that only the blood of his Son, his only begotten, is well pleasing in his sight! Besides, gentle reader, he forgave iniquity before his Son was born, far less died. And does it not suggest itself to your common sense that no satisfaction could possibly accrue from the death of an innocent person? What would be the popular verdict concerning a man that punished an innocent child for his bad brothers? Would he be considered sane, far less just? And why dare insinuate such conduct to our God? In love he plead, in tenderness he sent. He sent prophets and wise men and scribes, and they were all maltreated, and last of all came the Son, and he was murdered. Who did it? Who took pleasure in shedding his blood? Search and look.

A certain man had seven sons and he appointed them a task, but they were disobedient and left their task and went to the river to play, all except one, the youngest, he was obedient, and when his father saw he was obedient he sent him to his brothers, saying, "Speak kindly to them, perhaps they will turn again and be obedient, and I will not have to punish them." And when they saw their younger brother and heard his words they mocked him, and beat him and threw him in the river. But the father was near and rescued him, and calling the disobedient sons he told them of the punishment that awaited them for their rebellion that had culminated in the treacherous deed. "But," he added, "I have one sole condition of pardon, ask my boy, if he pardons you, I will." It is thus that God dealt with mankind, he never caused his Son to be slain to satisfy justice, or thirst for vengeance or for blood. He stood by ready to redeem him from the rage of his rebel creatures and to exalt him and give him a name above every name, he snatched him from the power of death and the grave, and made the very murder a memorial of his measureless mercy.

Modern Pioneers of the Truth. An Item of History.

The recent letter to the Brethren of the One Faith, published in THE RESTITUTION from our venerable and well-beloved Brother Albert Anderson, of Shanon Hill, Virginia, awakens the most grateful feelings and affectionate recollections of the present writer towards one of the most devoted, intelligent, faithful and self-denying of God's servants—one of the excellent of the earth, whose praise is in all the churches where he is known.

Brother Anderson is doubtless the oldest in the faith of the gospel of the kingdom now surviving on this continent or elsewhere. Born of religious parents and early imbued with a deep reverence for the Holy Scriptures, he joined us a very early age the Baptist Church of Virginia, at that time the religious body the closest in resemblance to the Bible Model. He entered and continued in the ministry for many years, while conducting an English and Classical school, for which his careful education, particularly his Greek and Latin studies, admirably fitted him. When Alexander Campbell, of Bethany, unfurled the banner of Reformation in the Baptist Churches, in the columns of the Christian Baptist, Albert Anderson, following the light of the Bible, joined the new movement, which had adopted for its motto: "The Bible, the whole Bible and nothing in religion but the Bible."

An honest and faithful adherence to the same wise and wholesome rule caused him, later in life, to give head to the doctrine, first developed in this age and country by Dr. John Thomas, an Anglo-American and one of the friends and brethren of Mr. Campbell, who as early as the year 1832-33 propounded through his Journal called the Apostolic Advocate, published in Richmond, Va., certain question—34 in number—and inviting answers calling for Bible proof of the immortal soul theory and suggesting "Life only in Christ, at the resurrection of the dead" as the true Bible doctrine of future Life.

In the face of his own rule, just quoted, Mr. Campbell, in the spirit of bigotry, which he had so ably exposed and rebuked in his own case when contending against the Baptists for the Bible doctrine of remission of sins to a penitent believer of the gospel in the act of baptism, did not hesitate bitterly to denounce all such enquiries and to brand Dr. Thomas and all who might agree with him, even in the right of free investigation, as heretics, factionists, etc. Undaunted by these anathemas of the Bethany Vatican, Dr. Thomas, Albert Anderson, and other bold and fearless men, though only a handful at that time, dared to investigate, under the noble Divine admonition to "Prove all things; hold fast to that which is good" and thus were enabled to discard the Pagan dogma of universal immortality to man and to adopt in its stead, the blessed truth that "Life and immortality were brought to light through the Gospel," and were only "in Christ."

It was shortly after this period that the writer, then a member of no communion, though informed that he had been "baptized in infancy," was won in a great degree, by the preaching and by conversations with Mr. Anderson, to examine the subject of life, death and immortality as revealed in the word of God, which resulted in his conviction of the truth as to the life question, and soon after led to his baptism by Brother Anderson. But as this was followed by other and fuller discoveries of more truth, affecting our faith and practice, I must follow up this reminiscence of a by-gone day with a future number, if the Lord will.

An Explanation.

I was not explicit enough. Brother Cook could not have misunderstood me had I said, "We have no reason to suppose any public demonstration to the world occurred" on the occasions mentioned. That is what I meant, and I have no reason to change my mind; even in the case of Elijah the narrative gives us no reason to suppose even Israel, as a people, were cognizant of that event, and a fair supposition in the case would allow them no more than a rumor. In the coming translation, with my understanding, I see a lack of public demonstration as is manifest in these types; a few unprepared ones will, no doubt, know of their removal and where they have gone, and a few may see some depart, but the world will know only as a rumor, and, perhaps, an earthquake sound.

Evening.

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

On velvet slopes the shadows lie,
The crimson paler along the west,
The steadfast stars arise on high,
And labor's weary hand may rest.

So gradual is the twilight's fall,
That day is past and night begun,
For we have heard dear Nature's call
And tired children, every one.

Yet homeward fly the little birds,
And homeward fare the laden bees,
And sweet as songs must to words
The zephyrs murmur through the trees.

Then through the balmy silence,—hark!
There sounds the children's vesper chime;
Between the dawning and the dark
There comes no holier, fairer time.

Soft thrill the voices low and sweet,
While little figures kneeling pray,
And trustfully at Jesus' feet
Lay down the burden of the day.

Then mothers fix the robes of white,
And kiss the lips, and smooth the brow;
The happy children say good-night,
And earth is watched by angels now.

A Lie Sticks.

A little newsboy, to sell his paper, told a lie. The matter came up in Sabbath School.

"Would you tell a lie for a penny?" asked a teacher of one of her boys.

"No, ma'am," answered Dick very decidedly.

"For sixpence?"

"No, ma'am."

"For a shilling?"

"No, ma'am."

"For a thousand?"

Dick was staggered. A thousand shillings looked big. Oh! wouldn't it buy lots of things! While he was thinking, another boy called out: "No, ma'am," behind him.

"Why not?" asked the teacher.

"Because, when the thousand shillings are all gone, and all the things they've got with them are gone, too, the lie is there all the same," answered the boy. It is so. A lie sticks. Every thing else may be gone, but this is left; and you will have to carry it with you, whether you will or not. A hard, heavy load it is!

The Dog.

I have found that domestic animals grow in disposition like to their owners, and that they show unmistakably by their actions, the manner of treatment they receive. Who has not noticed the trembling abjectness of terror manifested by the ill-used dog? the bristling fur and distended eyes of the frightened cat? These with many other abused, over-worked and neglected creatures have:

"Grown familiar with disfavor,
Grown familiar with the scorn
Of the breed by which nourish."

Their lives are an unspeakable agony and who but the Creator, knows of the sorrowful yearning after tenderness that may be akin to that of our human longing? There is such a heart-gleam of joy in the eyes of a dog, such a thorough awakening of his whole being as it were, from torpid indifference to most exuberant gladness, that it changes the entire animal from tip to tail. Can this be a mere machine set in motion only by its desire for food and drink? Is there not more than the selfish motive in the unfeigned welcome, the challenging bark, the grateful caresses?—What human friend will bear with us so constantly our changeful moods, our careless neglect, our irksome solitude?—Who but a dog friend will look up to us with those adoring eyes, when we are forsaken of fortune, and our clothes grow shabby, and our fare is meagre? Who would remain as faithfully to share cold and semi-starvation, with the wide world before him, and luxurious homes inviting, and fair hands beckoning him to come?

The dog is incorruptible; he is beyond and above temptation. He knows the full value of affection, and his requitals know no limitations: "Semper Fidelis," is his motto: and its promise is never broken.—Cora Wilburn, in Our Dumb Animals.

Once Too Often.

A man who had a valuable diamond was so foolish as to play with it by tossing it over the side of the ship. He kept throwing it up, while leaning over the bulwarks of the vessel, and catching it again. A friend expostulated with him, but he replied: "Oh, never fear, I've done it so often." At last he missed his aim and the treasure was gone—and lost beyond recall. "Yes; and you have done it once too often, now," said the friend.

And I saw a young man playing with that "pearl of immortality," his conscience. He trifled with it by resisting its admonitions. When it dissuaded him from doing an unholy thing he laughed at it and said, "Oh, silly conscience; do not be so captious!" I warned him that he would lose his soul if he was not careful. "O, don't be troubled!" he said; "I have done it very often, and no harm has come to me yet."

I saw a young lady coming forth from a ball-room very late at night, flushed, nervous and excited from the revelry. I recognized her as one who had belonged to my flock a few years ago. I stopped to admonish her, warning her that to many an innocent one the ball-room had been the fatal trap through which she had fallen into ruin. "O, nonsense!" she said, with a careless toss of her head; "you don't understand it. I have been there so often that I know all about it. There is no more harm than there is in going to a concert."

I saw a youth fresh and ruddy from his country home, and with the dew of his Christian mother's benediction still upon his brow. When I spoke to him of his spiritual welfare he said: "Well, I am only rowing some of the straight-laced notions in which I was trained. I used to suppose that a theatre was the open door to perdition, and that a billiard-hall was as bad as a rum-shop; but now I go to the theatre every week, and play a game of billiards almost every night after my work is done." I suggested that his early view of these things might, after all, be the true one. "No," he answered, impatiently, "you cannot make me believe that. I have been there too often, and seen too much, to be kept in such narrow ignorance about the theatre."

I met a boy whom I knew as a Sabbath School scholar. I was surprised to see him airily smoking a cigarette. He was abashed when he came suddenly upon me, and on my expressing regret at his falling into such a habit he replied, "O, there is no harm in it; I have smoked a good many cigarettes, and they have harmed me no more than so many sticks of candy would."

I saw a young man coming out of a saloon. I stopped him and warned him of the fatal charm of the intoxicating cup. "Oh, I take nothing but beer," he replied, "and have taken that too often to be fooled with the fanatical idea that beer is intoxicating."

Never shall I forget the cry of agony which came from the lips of a broken hearted young woman, as, with downcast eyes and half-averted face, she begged my prayers and sympathy. The story I learned from other lips. It was this, that she had gone once too often to the dance, and had there lost the jewel of her purity; and nothing I could say to her more could silence that wail of anguish which came forth with almost every breath.

I was kneeling beside a young man who came one evening into our meeting. He was on the verge of delirium tremens with, that I had never tasted one first glass!" he said. "I never meant to come to this, but now it seems as though the fire of hell was burning within me." He had gone once, yes, a hundred times, too often to the saloon.

The boy that smoked his cigarette I now see constantly, linking with the foul odors of tobacco and rum—twin brothers in vice, and too often found together. The lad evidently smoked more than when he took his first cigarette.

Who is this young man arrested today for stealing from his employer? "I first began to suspect him," said that employer to me, "when I found he was frequenting the theatre and billiard-hall." He had taken from the firm nearly a thousand dollars, little by little, and now his Christian mother had come to intercede that he might not be sent to prison. "He was a good boy," she said, "before he left home. He never gave me any anxiety." How was it that he had been brought into that condition of mind where he could speculate, little by little, day after day? No sudden impulse, but a deliberate habit. Evidently he had been playing with the jewel of his conscious, tossing lightly on the billiard table, throwing it about in the frivolities of the theatre, till it was at last lost in the desperate throw of theft. O, young man! young woman! beware, lest you sin once too often.—A. J. Gordon, D. D.

Sententious.

The poet is the man with the double vision, one who is at once near-sighted and far-sighted; who sees closer things wonders because he sees their far relations too.—W. C. Gannett.

We see a world in a grain of sand,
And a heaven in a wild-flower,
Hold infinite in the palm of our hand,
And eternity in an hour.

William Blake.

The actual working-period of a life of three-score years and ten is very short. He who has not learned the value of an hour is doomed to failure. On an hour often swings a destiny for eternity.—T. L. Cuyler.

An influence rather than an influence unconsciously flows forth from a noble, saintly life. The late Rev. W. Arnot, speaking of Dr. James Hamilton, of London, said: "I would place the three things about him in the relation of good, better, best. His preaching was good; his books were better; his life was best."—Wm. Ormiston.

Some persons are temples; they have received our most holy faith, and it is imbedded in their deepest convictions; and they have built upon it characters so pure and so beneficient, that you speak of them with reverence, as of a shrine where God dwells; all their strength and grace are consecrated to heaven; anthems of praise and prayer ascend from their hearts, good angels visit them, and the Holy Spirit chooses them for his abode. What will you be? Behold the many possibilities before you. Make no foolish determination, and rear no walls which you will wish overthrown.

What greater calamity can fall upon a nation than the loss of worship? Then all things go to decay. Genius leaves the temple to haunt the senate and the market. Literature becomes frivolous. Science is cold. The eye of youth is not lighted by the hope of other worlds, and age is without honor. Society stoops to trifles and when men die, we do not mention them.—R. W. Emerson.

What dollar cares our life beside neglected!
What useful lessons have we tramped and taught!
What warmth, what radiance, have our minds reflected!
What rich and rare materials have we brought
For deep investigation, earnest thought!
Concealed within the soul's upholstered pile,
How many a sparkling gem remains unwrought,
That industry might place on learning's shrine,
Or lavish on the world, to further God's design!

MISCELLANEOUS.

WHAT ATHEISM ALWAYS DOES.

Canon Farrar has made the venerable Westminster Abbey resound with a vigorous sermon on the evils of atheism. "For a time," he said, "an atheistic populace may uphold the tattered banner of corpse-like traditions which have been stolen from the rifled grave of Christianity. But it will never be long before it declares itself the enemy of the church, the enemy of the family, the enemy of the throne: never long before it tears down the flag of decency and order, and upholds in its place, in not the red flag of socialism, or the black flag of spoliation, at any rate, the standard of material appetites and physical desires."

A SKEPTIC'S ESTIMATE OF CHRIST.

It remains a possibility that Christ actually was what he supposed himself to be . . . a man charged with a special, express, and unique commission from God, to lead mankind to truth and virtue. About the life and sayings of Jesus, there is a stamp of personal originality, combined with profundity of insight, which . . . must place the prophet of Nazareth, even in the estimation of those who have no belief in his inspiration, in the very first rank of the men of sublime genius, of whom our species can boast. When this pre-eminent genius is combined with the qualities of, probably, the greatest reformer and martyr to that mission, who ever existed upon earth, religion cannot be said to have made a bad choice. In pitching on this man, as the ideal representative and guide of humanity; nor even now would it be easy for an unbeliever to find a better translation of the rule of virtue, from the abstract into the concrete, than to endeavor so to live that Christ would approve our life.—John Stuart Mills' Three Essays on Religion, pp. 254-5.

SEEN BY ITS OWN LIGHT.

"The sun can be seen in nothing but its own light." This is one of those simple truths which by their simplicity slip away unnoticed until pointed out by some mind great enough to note what is simple. One of the marks of true genius is, as the powers of the mind enlarge, to carry with us a child-like spirit. The fact that the sun, which lights up all nature, lights up itself may be a childlike, but certainly is not a childish, thought. The proverb in which it is embalmed is one of the "jewels five words long, that on the stretched forefinger of all time sparkles forever." By its aid we are led on as by an easy flight of steps to ascend other and higher rounds of the ladder of truth. God, who is light, dwells in light, and can alone be seen by that light which he sheds upon the mind. In thy light, O God, can we alone see light. Men grope hopelessly after God until he reveals himself not only to them, but around them and in them. We require not only a light without, but a light within. The Bible in our hands is of little avail without the Holy Spirit, as the celestial fire to kindle a flame of love in our hearts. A child who prays for God's blessing in reading the Bible may know more really about the truth than the greatest scholar who is too proud to bend the knee. "All thy children shall be taught of God."

FEEBLE SAINTS.

It was an amusing distortion of a good hymn, but there was not a little sound philosophy in it when the old negro preacher sang,

"Judge not the Lord by feeble saints."

And yet this is precisely what the great majority of unconverted men are doing all the time. They will not go to the Bible and give heed to what God himself says. They have no ear for his voice of mercy that offers them salvation for the taking. They do not pay any attention to the solemn warnings that the Scriptures utter. They judge the Lord by "feeble saints." They attempt to feed their starving souls on the imperfection of Christians—poor food enough they find it! Because God's people are not all that they ought to be, therefore these earthlers will keep aloof from the religion which they profess. Because God's believing followers are not perfect—they do not claim to be—therefore, say these unbelievers, there is no power in religion. Christians cannot claim exemption from criticism. They do not expect it. They know that the eyes of the world are upon them. But they say to the unbelievers—"If you would know the truth, go to the Word; go to him who is the truth; judge not the Lord by feeble saints."—Christian Weekly.

Festivities.

The Syrian Protestant College in Beirut has now 162 students, of which the great majority joy for their education. Twenty years ago it was hardly thought possible to induce a Syrian to buy a copy of the Scriptures. Last year there were issued from the American press at Beirut 15,715 copies of the Scriptures, every one of which was sold.

Mohammedans from all parts of the East are accustomed to make pilgrimages annually to the sacred shrines at Mecca and Jedda. The Friend of India says that the state of affairs there this year has been appalling, almost beyond description, and that during the recent Hadji season the pilgrims died at the rate of three hundred per day, of cholera, principally. As is customary among the Turks, not the slightest regard was paid to sanitation, and the multitudes were herded together like so many animals, not heeding disease and death.

IN THE CRADLE OF THE RACE.

Railroad building has begun in the far East. The next quarter of a century will see Nineveh, Babylon, Damascus, and the cities familiar to us through the most ancient of ancient history, within easy communication of the rest of the modern world by a complete system of railways. A road, 500 miles long, is now under way from the Black to the Caspian Sea. It runs along the valley of the river of Cyrus, south of the Caucasus, and from a portion of it Mount Ararat is in sight. It seems incredible that there should be business to justify railroads in those graves of old nations, but wherever human beings live they must travel, and food and clothing must be transported from one point to another. The steel rails will soon girdle Mesopotamia, Central Asia and Arabia, and will help to bring about the poet's dream of the parliament of men, the federation of all the nations.—Demorest's Monthly.

The discovery of the Phantom City is announced in a telegram to the North American Review from M. Desire Charnay, the Central American explorer. During the last few years accounts have been given by the natives of Central America to explorers of a large city they said existed in the country of the Locandones. The descriptions of the city seemed like the Arabian legends of a fairy land. It had, the natives said, white turrets gleaming in the sun, inhabitants who keep up the customs and habits of the times of the Spanish invasion, and monuments with inscriptions thousands of years old. No travelers had visited it, and Mr. Stevens and others pronounced it inaccessible. But the natives still existed on its existence, and its wondrous beauty. At length it became known to explorers by the name of "the Phantom City." A year ago, M. Charnay, an explorer of indomitable perseverance and courage, undertook an exploration under the direction of Mr. A. T. Rice, of the Review, and nothing more was heard of him until his telegram a few days ago briefly announcing that in the mountainous region in the northwestern part of Guatemala he had found the Phantom City. Further details of M. Charnay's discovery are anticipated with intense curiosity.

Evolutionary philosophy has received a severe blow in some of the recently discovered Egyptian manuscripts. These containing the histories of the fifth and sixth dynasties, taken from the pyramids at Sakkara last spring by M. Maspero, and about to be published in Paris, are said to establish the fact that the oldest religion of the Egyptians was the most nearly monotheistic, and that the grosser forms of idolatry came later in the history of the country. Fragments of the texts in the possession of Maspero, hitherto not supposed to have had any relation to each other, are found to have been used in many later temples and tombs. Commenting on this fact, a writer in The Nation says: "This adds force to the growing conviction among Egyptologists that the earliest Egyptian civilization we know of is the highest, and that all we know of is its decadence. The oldest pyramid is the largest and best built, the oldest temple, that beside the Sphynx at Gizeh, shows masonry since unapproached; the oldest papyrus, though as yet hardly understood, is the wisest; and the tombs and the temples of the Theban period are filled with extracts from the ancient books not yet found complete. Three or four of these books furnish five-sixths of the texts of the tombs of the kings."—Interior.

TELL ME ABOUT THE MASTER.

Tell me about the Master!
I am weary and worn to-night,
The day has had me in shadow,
And only the evening is light—
Light with a radiant glory
That lingers about the west
But my heart is aweary, aweary,
And longs like a child for rest.

Tell me about the Master
Of the hills he trod barefoot,
Where the fear of the load of life departed
Dropped down in Judea's dust:
For he, too, felt the weary milestones
But a continual journey mark;
Rough like the hill-country behind me,
The mountains before me are dark.

Tell me about the Master
Of the message so freely given,
Of his mercy and tender compassion,
Of his love that was mighty to save:
For my heart is aweary, aweary,
Of the woes and temptations of life,
Of the cross that stalks in the noonday,
Of falsehood and malice and strife.

Yet I know that whatever of sorrow,
Or pain, or temptation befall,
The infinite Master has suffered,
And knoweth and pitieth all.
So tell me the sweet old story,
That falls on each wound like a balm;
And the heart that was bruised and broken
Grows patient and strong and calm.

ORIENTAL SKETCHES.—No. IX.

Bashan and Its Giant Cities.

J. L. PORTER, A. M.

KERIOTH.

We turned westward to Keriath, and soon fell into the line of the ancient road, its pavement in many places perfect, though here and there torn up and swept away by mountain torrents. On our right, about two miles distant, lay Ayun, a deserted city as large as Saleah. Kuweiris, Ain. Munoiderah, and many others were visible,—some in quite green vales, some perched like fortresses on the sides and summits of rugged hills. The country through which our route lay was very rocky; but though now desolate, the signs of former industry are there. The loose stones have been gathered into great heaps, and little fields formed; and terraces can be traced along every hill-side from bottom to top.

In two hours we reached Kureiyeh, and received a cordial welcome from its warlike Druse chief, Ismail el-Atrash. The town is situated in a wide valley at the south-western base of the mountains of Bashan. The ruins are of great extent, covering a space at least as large as Saleah. The houses which remain have the same general appearance as those in other towns. No large public building now exists entire; but there are traces of many; and in the streets and lanes are numerous fragments of columns and other vestiges of ancient grandeur. I copied several Greek inscriptions bearing dates of the first and second centuries in our era.

Among the cities in the plain of Moab upon which judgment is pronounced by Jeremiah, Keriath occurs in connection with Beth-gamul and Bozrah; and here, on the side of the plain, only five miles distant from Bozrah, stands Kureiyeh, manifestly an Arabic form of the Hebrew Keriath. Keriath was reckoned one of the strongholds of the plain of Moab. Jer. xlviii. 41. Standing in the midst of wide-spread rock-fields, the passes through which could be easily defended; and encircled by massive ramparts, the remains of which are still there,—I saw, and every traveller can see, how applicable is Jeremiah's reference, and how strong this city must once have been. I could not but remark, too, while wandering through the streets and lanes, that the private houses bear the marks of the most remote antiquity. The few towers and fragments of temples, which inscriptions show to have been erected in the first centuries of the Christian era, are modern in comparison with the colossal walls and massive stone doors of the private houses. The simplicity of their style, their low roofs, the ponderous blocks of roughly hewn stone with which they are built, the great thickness of the walls, and the heavy slabs which form the ceilings,—all point to a period far earlier than the Roman age, and probably antecedent to the conquest of the country by the Israelites. Moses makes special mention of the strong cities of Bashan, and speaks of their high walls and gates. He tells us, too, in the same connection, that Bashan was called the land of the giants (or Rephaim.) Deut. iii. 13; leaving us to conclude that the cities were built by giants. Now the houses of Keriath and other towns in Bashan appear to be just such dwellings as a race of giants would build. The walls, the roofs, but especially the ponderous gates, doors, and bars, are in every way characteristic of a period when architecture was in its infancy, when giants were masons, and when strength and security were the grand requisites. I measured a door in Keriath: it was nine feet high, four and a half feet wide, and ten inches thick,—one solid slab of stone. I saw the folding gates of another town in the mountains still larger and heavier. Time produces little effect on such buildings as these. The heavy stone slabs of the roofs resting on the massive walls make the structure as firm as if built of solid masonry; and the black basalt used is almost as hard as iron. There can scarcely be a doubt, therefore, that these are the very cities erected and inhabited by the Rephaim, the aboriginal occupants of Bashan; and the language of Ritter appears to be true. "These buildings remain as eternal witnesses of the conquest of Bashan by Jehovah."

We have thus at Keriath and its sister cities some of the most ancient houses of which the world can boast; and in looking at them and wandering among them, and passing night after night in them, my mind was led away back to the time, now nearly four thousand years ago, when the kings of the East warred with the Rephaim in Ashteroth-Karnaim, and with the Emim in the plain of Kiriathaim, Gen. xiv. 5. Some of the houses in which I slept were most probably standing at the period of that invasion. How strange to occupy houses of which giants were the architects, and a race of giants the original owners! The temples and tombs of Upper Egypt are of great interest, as the works of one of the most enlightened nations of antiquity; the palaces of Nineveh are still more interesting, as the memorials of a great city which lay buried for two thousand years; but the massive houses of Keriath scarcely yield in interest to either. They are antiquities of another kind. In size they cannot vie with the temples of Karnac; in splendor they do not approach the palaces of Khorsabad; yet they are the memorials of a race of giant warriors that has been extinct for more than three thousand years, and of which Og, king of Bashan, was one of the last representatives: and they are, I believe, the only specimens in the world of the ordinary private dwellings of remote antiquity. The monuments designed by the genius and reared by the wealth of imperial Rome are fast mouldering to ruin in this land; temples, palaces, tombs, fortresses, are all shattered, or prostrate in the dust; but the simple, massive houses of the Rephaim are in many cases perfect as if only completed yesterday.

It is worthy of note here, as tending to prove the truth of my statements and to illustrate the words of the sacred writers, that the town of Bashan was considered ancient even in the days of the Roman historian Ammianus Marcellinus, who says regarding this country: "Fortresses and strong castles have been erected by the ancient inhabitants among the retired mountains and forests. Here in the midst of numerous towns, are some great cities, such as Bostra and Gerasa, encompassed by massive walls." Mr. Graham, the only other traveller since Buckhardt, who traversed eastern Bashan, entirely agrees with me in my conclusions. "When we find," he writes, "one after another, great stone cities, walled and unwalled, with stone gates, and so crowded together that it becomes almost a matter of wonder how all people could have lived in so small a place; when we see houses built of such huge and massive stones that no force which can be brought against them in that country could ever batter them down; when we find rooms in these houses so large and lofty that many of them would be considered fine rooms in a palace in Europe; and, lastly, when we find some of these towns bearing the very names which cities in that very country bore before the Israelites came out of Egypt, I think we cannot help telling the strongest conviction that we have before us the cities of the Rephaim of which we read in the Book of Deuteronomy."

Keriath is a frontier town. It is on the confines of the uninhabited plain, where the fierce Ishmaelite roams at will, "his hand against every man." The Druses of Keriath are all armed, and they always carry their arms. With their goats on the hill-side, with their yokes of oxen in the field, with their asses or camels on the road, at all hours, in all places, their rifles are slung, their swords by their side, and their pistols in their belts. Their daring chief, too, goes forth on his expeditions equipped in a helmet of steel and a coat of linked mail. In this respect also the words of the prophecy are fulfilled: "Moab hath been at ease from his youth.... Therefore, behold, the days come, saith the Lord, that I will send unto him wanderers, that shall cause him to wander, and shall empty his vessels and break his bottles." Jer. xlviii. 12. What could be more graphic than this? The wandering Bedawin are now the scourge of Moab; they cause the few inhabitants that remain in it to settle down amid the fastnesses of the rocks and mountains, and often to wander from city to city, in the vain hope of finding rest and security.

Age not come Herald.

MRS. DAVIS AND HER MISSION.

Leaves from My Journal.

Jerusalem, April 12, 1882. I am glad to be able to write today that I am much better. Thanks to Almighty God and his good angels who have so faithfully cared for me, and who are still supplying my wants abundantly. How strange that God should have cared so much for me! I do not feel that my poor life is worth all this extra expense and labor and care. But the Lord's ways are often mysterious, and sometimes past finding out, for the present, at least.

I am not able to write much, as the ulcers in my side is not yet healed. As I have before told you, my sickness was brought on by going from the hot sun into a cold, damp room to sit and sleep. This, perhaps, is the greatest cause of sickness in this country. We need different houses, and we will have them too. The roofs must be so constructed as to keep the buildings dry; and there must be more and larger windows, with higher and more airy rooms; and fires to take away the chilly dampness; which, however, would be trifling, if the buildings were properly constructed to keep out the water and let in the sun and air. I have learned a lesson which will be beneficial to others when they come, as well as to myself. People say, if I live through this, I shall live forever; and I think so.

Those who come should have sufficient means to carry them through the first year, for they will not be able to do much work until they are acclimated. After one year there will be no trouble.

Jerusalem has been full of strangers for four or five weeks. They say there was never so many people gathered here before. Well, it is some benefit to the place, as they leave money and some good influence.

Mr. Constantine is our American Dragoman; I depend much upon him. He looks after my mail, shows me many favors, and is indeed a very kind gentleman. His amiable wife is a lovely woman and a good mother. They speak the English language well. I think, with all my trials and afflictions, I am very fortunate in falling in with kind friends. I have found them all the way and all the time since I left Boston. God must have put it into their hearts to assist me. It is not only those who sympathize with me in faith, but Jews also, who reject Christ; and Mohammedans, who believe in the Koran, as well as Protestants,—all appear to be moved to help me. I accept it as a token of favor by God to the enterprise I am engaged in, and not because of any personal consideration towards myself.

I do not advise any one to come before September, on account of the heat. They should start in August and reach here in September. That will be in season to put in some crops, if circumstances admit of it. I came about the right time, landing at Jaffa on the 5th of September.

Farming is the thing to do here at present; but no one should think of settling down alone. It should be a colony of several families. Everything sells well that can be raised. If butter could be made here, (I mean good butter, there is plenty of dirty butter,) it would bring a high price, as much of the good butter used now is imported. There is now a village and a whole valley to be sold at a fair price; and there is yet plenty of farming land, four, six, eight and ten miles from Jerusalem. It does seem that some are waiting, like Felix of old, for "a convenient season," when they ought to be moving.

Notwithstanding all the misfortunes and drawbacks that I have met with, I find that I am daily growing more and deeper in love with the Holy Land. No misfortune could make me wish to return to America. There is a feeling that I am at home here, such as I never felt before in any other place, and if I was obliged to leave, it would be leaving home. I am waiting, watching, praying, and I believe it will not be in vain. In a few years there will be plenty of business here, a pure religion, and no lack of interest. May God speed the work in his own good time!

April 18. I am glad to be able to write that my health is quite restored. I begin to think that death is not going to sweep us off so very easily after all. I am sure that I would have died in Boston with the sickness I have passed through here. My kind friends, the Illinois Americans, have been unceasing in their efforts for my recovery. They have warmed and fed me with a liberal hand. The truth is, they live what they profess, and it tells better than words. Saying, "Be ye warmed and filled; notwithstanding ye give them not those things which are needful to the body: what doth it profit?"

And now that I am quoting important Scripture, I will go further. "Even so faith, if it hath not works, is dead, being alone. Yea, a man may say, Thou hast faith, and I have works: shew me thy faith without thy works, and I will shew thee my faith by my works." James 2. Talking about setting up the kingdom of God, and even praying for the kingdom to come, if we do not have works in harmony with our faith and prayers, will amount to—I was about to say—just nothing at all; but it will amount to something; it will make us act hypocritically. As the time has now so evidently arrived when the kingdom is about to be set up, why not go about the work, which sooner or later must be done, to set it up? May God help us to seek for the kingdom, and the righteousness of the kingdom consistently. Go to work for it.

I attended a meeting with my friends Sunday, and heard Mr. Spafford's views of the present Christianity, and was much interested. He believes all the prophecies concerning this land; and they pray daily for the rain, for the return of the Jews, etc. They were wise, I think, in putting all they possessed together, and so live cheaper, and are watching opportunities to benefit themselves and others; and by their wise, economical course, they find themselves in a condition to do it.

They believe in science; and that the highest scientific ability will be employed in building up this city and restoring the land. They are also looking for a power to come to cleanse us from all sin, and are praying for it. They believe in loving their neighbor in truth and deed as themselves, in keeping the law, overcoming the flesh, and living forever without going into the grave at all. They are generous and broad in their views, which I do admire. They, of course, have errors; but I thank God that they see as much truth as they do. They will in time, I trust, see more. Their friends in America have turned against them; even their own children call them "crazy" (These are good testimonials:) but they believe it will all work for their good.

There is an item of news flying here, important, if true, that a rich Jew in England has subscribed ten million dollars to build a railroad two hundred miles in Palestine. This is cheering news; and if it is an exaggeration, we know that a railroad is needed here, and the subject is being agitated in several parts of the world, and wealthy men are considering it. May the screeching engine soon be heard in Palestine!

There is also a rumor here that thousands of Jews who designed to go to America, from Russia, have changed their minds, and are coming to Palestine. The inhabitants are much excited about the return of the Jews; and I think the Jews themselves are astonished at the events transpiring with their own people. It most certainly is a new movement; and there has been nothing like it since the days of Zerubbabel and Ezra: and even many features of the work now are already fulfillment of prophecies that had no application then.

The redemption of Israel is at hand, and we may expect great events to transpire. "Fly swifter round, ye wheels of time, and bring the welcome day."

You wished me to tell you what the people eat, and how they dress. Well, as to dress, the Arabs are fast becoming European in dress. The men want coats and pants, and the women love frills and flounces as well as the Americans. The Arabic customs are surely becoming things of the past. The principal food is rice, mutton, bread and vegetables. Let Americans come here with their improvements, in any considerable numbers, and the people would soon become Americanized in their customs and habits. Although for thousands of years everything has been at a standstill, and no improvements made, the same old customs, implements and fashions remaining, it is now actually true that an enterprising spirit for a change is the order. Even these straws are troubling our opponents, and those who profess to believe the word, but reject it. They will be troubled yet more and more as the work progresses.

The harvests this year will be abundant. The great rains have increased the crops much. They tell me there was never before such rains in April. The fields are literally one bed of gorgeous flowers. I had never dreamed of so much beauty. If the showers continue through the summer, we shall have a paradise, even now. Perhaps God intends to make a banquet on flowery beds for the reception of his people. Who knows.

I am glad the good Lord put it into my heart to come here. I have no fears but that he will provide everything necessary for me; and I shall trust him. I desire to see his salvation. You say, "Hold the Fort." I have no idea of giving it up. I am stronger than ever. This is the time to favor Zion, and Zion is here. This is the time, and this is the place; and why give up because of trials, however severe they may be?

THE ROTHSCHILDS.

Baron Nathaniel de Rothschild, is the present head of the great Rothschild family. He is a son of the late Baron Lionel de Rothschild, who for many years represented the city of London in the British Parliament. He is the head of the great banking firm of Rothschild & Sons, in succession to his uncle, the late Sir Anthony de Rothschild, whose title he also inherits and is well known as a most generous supporter of all philanthropic enterprises, having for their object the alleviation of poverty and suffering. While the members of his own race and faith have the first claim upon his attention, they do not monopolize it, for he is always ready to aid those who are in trouble whatever their race or faith.

He is at present the President of the Jews' Free School in London, where about three thousand children are being educated. He is also the President of the United Synagogue (a confederation of the principal London synagogues), and occupies a similar honorable and influential position in connection with the Great Synagogue, one of the synagogues comprised in the above-named confederation. He is highly esteemed in Aylesbury, where he resides, and he has for several years been its chosen representative in the Imperial Parliament. He is a Liberal in politics. As may be expected, he takes a deep interest in the sufferings of outraged compatriots in Russia, and, with two other members of his family, has given a sum of no less than £75,000 to the fund now being raised for the alleviation of their distress.

Sir Nathaniel de Rothschild is a great grandson of the founder of the house. This was Meyer Amslem Rothschild, who was born in "The Jews' Alley," at Frankfort-on-the-Main, in 1743. Meyer was intended by his father for the ministry, and was sent when only thirteen years of age to Furth, in Bavaria, to study the Talmud, preparatory to becoming a rabbi. But Meyer's genius was not suited to the study of Talmudical lore, and he soon abandoned the profession and devoted his attention to financial pursuits. Horr Oppenheim, a banker of Hanover, gave him a clerkship in his office, and there, on the lowest round of the ladder, he commenced his career. He soon gave evidence of his abilities, and in a few years became associate manager of the bank. He afterward commenced business on his own account and laid the foundation of his enormous fortune. One of his most remarkable achievements was the skilful manner in which he took care of forty million dollars, the property of the Landgrave of Hesse Cassel. This sum he held when Napoleon confiscated the Landgrave's estates, and when, eight years afterward, the Landgrave applied for the money it was handed over to him with interest. Meyer Rothschild was dead by that time, but his eldest son, Amslem, faithfully accounted for every kreutzer of the amount.

Meyer Rothschild lived to be seventy years of age. He died in the old house in the Jews' Alley amid the lamentations of innumerable friends who owed to him more than was ever known. His long life had been one of unstinted kindness, and throughout the Jewish quarter especially, he had given money with a lavish hand to help whenever he was satisfied it would be wisely employed. He left ten children, five sons and five daughters. The five sons were Amslem, Solomon, Nathan, Charles, and James. The most conspicuous was Nathan Meyer, the third son, who was born 1777. He was sent to England in the year 1800 to found an English branch of the house, as his brothers had respectively founded one in Vienna and another in Paris. An interesting story is related of Nathan having been at the battle of Waterloo and having hurried back to England to make investments; but it is not true. Carrier pigeons were used, there being no telegraphs to carry news of the battle, and Rothschild by that means learned how the English prospered. He bought government securities at low prices, from the terrified capitalists who believed that Napoleon would certainly conquer England, and when the news came of the victory and the funds rose, Rothschild was in possession of riches to a fabulous amount. A friend of the family who visited the house during some disturbances in London was admitted to Lady Rothschild's private sitting-room, and there saw temporarily placed for security under the carpet, on the floor of the room, solid bars of gold, so that she and her children literally trod on a golden pavement.

The next generation of the English branch of the Rothschilds consisted of Lionel, Anthony, and Meyer, the three sons of Nathan Meyer Rothschild, who died in 1836. Lionel was the head of the house, and was recognized indeed by other branches as the head of the family. It was Lionel who fought the long battle for the admission of the Jews to the British Parliament. His fellow-citizens of London held him in so great respect that they elected him as their representative in 1847. He presented himself to be sworn, but as he could not, as a Jew, consistently take the oath as it was then worded, he was not then allowed to take his seat. The question of altering the oath so as to suit him and any of his co-religionists who might be elected, was hotly debated both in the Lords and Commons. It was not, however, until 1858 that the cause triumphed and Rothschild took his seat, and during the whole of those eleven years the citizens of London regularly re-elected him, although they knew that in doing so they would lose one of the votes to which the city was entitled.

Baron Lionel died in June, 1879, leaving three sons, Nathaniel, whose portrait we give, Alfred, who is now one of the Governors of the Bank of England, Leopold, who is well-known leader in English society. Through all the generations of this remarkable family, not only in the branch we have traced, but in the branches settled in other European cities, the same characteristics of liberal generosity have been displayed, and while they have distributed freely, the growth of their wealth has been unchecked, until now through it they exercise an important influence on every government in Europe.

THE BIBLE SOCIETY AND THE WORD "BAPTIZO."

The American Bible Society has refused its aid in sending out Dr. Judson's Burmese Bible among the Karthen because it translates the word baptize by "immerse," though it is acknowledged to be an accurate and scholarly version.

The New York Independent insists that for the Bible Society to reject this rendering is to say to the Burmese, "You must either be kept in ignorance of the meaning of a certain word of Holy Writ, or you shall not have the Bible from us." "Gentlemen of the big brick house," the same journal adds, "it is not a right thing to do. The only question you have a right to ask is whether the translation of Dr. Judson is faithful to the Greek. If it is not, condemn it; if it is, then publish it, no matter what parties of controversialists be helped or hindered thereby. You were not appointed, gentlemen, to watch the interests of contending sects, but to circulate correct translations of the Scriptures; and for you to refuse to circulate a given version, not because it is incorrect, but because it may have a certain effect on certain controversies, is a violation of the solemn trusts committed to your charge."

"Alas for the rarity of Christian charity," exclaims the Boston Watchman, "when the ponderous catholicity of this great Bible Society is restrained and utterly stopped in its outgoings because a single word of Scripture is not mistranslated, but translated. We sincerely believe that such catholicity is fast becoming effete. It must be that there are venerable men who have come down from a former generation in the management of this society; men who are not modern enough to forget that the body of Christians whom they thus alienate from their fellowship are not the small, unscholarly, contemptible, sect which they were once held to be. Our Wendell Phillips wittily recalls the days of the standing order. 'A Baptist minister was then little better than a negro,' he says. 'The five points of Massachusetts decency were to trace your lineage to the Mayflower, graduate at Harvard College, be a member of an Orthodox church, pay your debts, and frighten your children to sleep by saying "Thomas Jefferson!"' But times have changed when a standard work on Congregationalism traces the model of our Republic through Thomas Jefferson to a Virginia Baptist church. It will not be long before these staunch inheritors of the traditions of the standing order, who now stand at the helm of the Bible Society, will be gone. Their children will not perpetuate their folly by refusing to give to the heathen that noble version of that noble man Dr. Judson—that living section broken off from Plymouth Rock that it might form the foundation-stone of one of the most widely useful missionary enterprises the world has ever seen. In its present action the Bible Society does not honor itself. It cannot dishonor the Baptists, or support its charge of non-catholicity against them." —N. Y. Tribune.

Many of those that love the "present truth" are "lonely ones," and cannot associate with others of like faith. They indeed have an important mission, because nearly all with whom they associate are ignorant of the times in which we live, and need to be warned in regard to them. How many, like Lot, go off among those that do not believe as they do. Judgments are coming on the world as surely as they did upon Sodom. Let did not succeed in keeping all of his own family in the right way. Are you, my lonely brother or sister, doing all for your family and neighbors that you should or can do? May not the blood of souls be found on your garments?—W. A. F.

The Restitution.

"THE RESTITUTION OF ALL THINGS WHICH GOD HATH SPOKEN BY THE MOUTH OF ALL HIS HOLY PROPHETS SINCE THE WORLD BEGAN."

VOL. XXXI. PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, JUNE 28, 1882. NO. 24.

THE RESTITUTION.

TERMS--TWO DOLLARS PER YEAR, Payable in advance. Three and six Months at the same rate.

Address all Letters and Communications to THE RESTITUTION, Plymouth, Indiana.

TO CORRESPONDENTS:

"THE RESTITUTION" centers the final restitution of all things, which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the tramp of nations at his feet before him to the powers of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the dead destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

COMING AGE--ITS PROXIMITY. No. 115.

Witnesses under the Latinized German Powers--Seventh Head--Ten Kingdoms. Under the Roman Empire. In the Beginning of the Judgment-Age. Exposition of Rev. xvii. Beast--Eighth Head.

J. P. WEETHEE.

We have traced the three agents that had any part in the persecution of the witnesses, giving to each one that part noted in sacred and profane history. The Latin empire was the executioner of the decrees of the Papal hierarchy, while the Greek empire originated the civil element of the Papacy, and established its ecclesiastical supremacy. Under the ten Romano-German kings the apostacy became fully established. Under the eighth head it reached the zenith of power. We can present this hierarchy in the clearest light by Rev. xvii. This chapter is evidently supplementary to chapter xvii. and carries us forward to God's national judgments. The session opens with the judgment of the harlot. Judgment first begins at the house (nominal) of God, then falls upon the nations. The reasons are evident:

1. She has sinned against greater light.

2. She holds in her communion some of "God's people," who cannot escape without the fall of the harlot.

Open your chart at Rev. xvii. and give us you undivided attention. Verse 1. "And there came one of the seven angels that had the seven bowls, (Rev. xv. 1; xvi. 1,) and spake with me, saying, Come hither; I will show thee the judgment of the great harlot that sitteth upon many waters." John's guide and Interpretor is an angel; one of the seven sheriffs of God's final executive wrath. "And I saw another sign in heaven, great and marvellous, seven angels having seven plagues, (which are) the last, for in them is finished the wrath of God." Rev. vi. 1.

The 16th chapter narrates the work of these seven angels. The angel knew that John had been a witness of those seven terrible judgments, and that he was excited at their exceeding severity, he calls him away to witness the desolations of the beast and his rider. As if the angel had said, John, I know that these judgments perplex you on account of their severity, but come with me, and you will understand the reason of their severity; I will show you their crimes, which had been completed when these judgments began.

John's vision is filled with an extended wilderness; dark, waste, howling; a scene of utter desolation. On the far extreme of the wilderness, and about to emerge from it, was an object of a most revolting aspect. It was a woman. John had seen her before. She then sat quietly upon many waters. Rev. xvii. 15. Her position and aspect are wonderfully changed. In that vision she sat quietly and securely in the pride of her victory over the nations. Here she is in the midst of and completing the work that gave her that elevation.

This vision of the harlot on the waters is not particularly narrated. It only shows her position on many waters, which are called in verse 15, "peoples, and multitudes, and nations, and tongues." In the wilderness vision, the supplementary and explanatory vision, the harlot and the nations appear under acting symbols.

Verse 2. "With whom the kings of the earth committed fornication, and they that dwell in the earth were made drunken with the wine of her fornication." This shows that the nations over which the harlot had control participated in her crimes.

Verse 3. "And he carried me away in the spirit into a wilderness, and I saw a woman sitting upon a scarlet-colored beast, full of names of blasphemy, having seven heads and ten horns." A woman on a scarlet beast is here a complex symbol, and demands special attention, since it denotes the position and relationship (mistress and servant) of these two agents during the entire period of the sun-clad woman, with her family in the wilderness—1260 days or years, the sackcloth period of the witnesses; the time in which the Latin empire under the decemregal and its restored imperial administrations made war on the saints.

Verse 4. "And the woman was arrayed in purple and scarlet, and decked with gold and precious stones and pearls, having in her hand a golden cup full of abominations, even the unclean things of her fornication." The harlot's dress and her full cup attract special notice. They both point to a period when her work is completed; her ornaments, and her full cup are sufficient evidence; she carries the price of her wages on her person, and her pollutions in her hand.

Verse 5. "And upon her forehead a name written, MYSTERY, BABYLON THE GREAT, THE MOTHER OF HARLOTS, AND OF THE ABOMINATIONS OF THE EARTH." We here see on her brazen front her name, Babylon the Mystic. Following which is her character. Who wrote her name and character? He that knew it, and who was bringing her to his judgment bar to receive her sentence. That cup was to be filled to her double. The Romanists say that the mother is not here called a harlot, but only her children. True; still what mean her robes, her jewels, and her cup? But what does the executive angel denominate her? "I will show thee the judgment of the great harlot." Verse 1. She is therefore like her daughters who have simply imitated the conduct and practices of their parents.

Verse 6. "And I saw the woman drunken with the blood of saints, and with the blood of the martyrs (witnesses) of Jesus. And when I saw her I wondered with great wonder." Her condition—she was drunk. John saw this probably by the manner of her riding. On what is she drunken? She is drunken with blood. This might have been revealed to John by the angel, while giving him her past history.

Whose blood had she been drinking? The blood of saints, holy ones, for such is the meaning of the term; the blood of those who lived quietly, and harmless; whose only crime was their belief in and practice of the pure doctrines of the Son of God; private yet devoted members of the church of God. She had been drinking the blood of another class, the blood of the witnesses; for such is the translation of martyr (Greek).

Those witnesses gave her much trouble, and their blood was, therefore very pleasant to her taste. John was very greatly moved with wonder at what he had seen.

Verse 7. "And the angel said unto me, Wherefore didst thou wonder? I will tell thee the mystery of the woman and of the beast that carrieth her which hath seven heads and the ten horns." This verse teaches the relationship that existed between these remarkable agents, namely, the same that there is between a beast and his rider. They render each other mutual aid, in carrying out the plans of the rider.

Verse 8. "The beast that thou sawest was, and is not, and is about to come up out of the abyss, and to go into perdition. And they that dwell on the earth shall wonder, (they) whose name hath not been written in the book of life from the foundation of the world, when they behold the beast, how that he was, and is not, and shall come." We have here followed the Revised Version; the expression "and shall come," though not the literal translation of the Greek παρεσται εστιν, yet it expresses the idea contained in the first clause of the verse; the Authorized Version is obscure. The last form of that beast is out of the abyss, very incorrectly translated "the bottomless pit."

Verses 9, 10, 11. "Here is the mind which hath wisdom. The seven heads are seven mountains, on which the woman sitteth; and they are seven kings; the five are fallen, the one is, the other (seventh, doeem-regal) is not yet come; and when he cometh, he must continue a little while. And the beast that was and is not, is himself also an eighth, and is of the seven; and he goeth into perdition." This interpretation must be correct, since it is from a being that knew the truth. The difficulty lies in expressing the precise thoughts in English, which the angel conveyed to John in Greek words. The seven heads have the first interpretation by the angel. The words of the explanation given to John are the following:

Αι επτα κεφαλαι, επτα ορη εισιν, οπου η γυνη καθηται επ' αυτων. Και βασιλεις επτα εισιν, οι πεντε επεσαν, ο εις εστιν, ο αλλος ουπω ηλθεν, και οταν ελθη, ολιγον αυτον δει μειναι.

The literal rendering is as follows: The seven heads are seven mountains, where the woman sitteth on them. And are seven kings; the five are fallen, and the one is, the other has not yet come, and when it cometh, there is need that it remain a little.

We have given every word its literal meaning. The woman did not sit on the mountains, but on the waters. Rev. xvii. 1.

In Rev. xvii. two visions appear. In the former vision the woman was seen sitting on many waters, surrounding seven mountains. The woman and waters are symbolic, verses 15, 5, 18; so are the mountains. In the latter vision the woman is riding on a scarlet colored beast in a wilderness. The heads are mountains in one vision and kings or administrators in the other. That these are not literal mountains is clear from the following: "The five are fallen, the other is not yet come." These seven mountains cannot, therefore, be the seven hills covered by the ancient literal Rome. The difficulty is solved with this view. The Latin empire, and the Latinized German empire, its modern continuation, or the Latino-German empire, has existed under seven forms of administration, as follows: Regal, Consular, Dictatorial, Decemvirate, and Tribunitian. These five heads or administrations had fallen before John had his revelations. The sixth or Imperial administration was then in being. The seventh, or rule of the ten kings who were of German origin, had not come, the beast of the abyss, the last form (infidel) of the fourth monarchy, was the eighth administration. This is called the European system, composed of the old Latin and Latino-German nations whose languages are more or less of Latin and German origin. These will be noticed hereafter.

Verse 12. "And the ten horns that thou sawest are ten kings, which have received no kingdom as yet; but they receive authority as kings, with the beast, for one (the same) hour. Verse 13. These have one mind, and they give their power and authority to the beast. Verse 14. These shall war against the Lamb, and the Lamb shall overcome them, for he is Lord of lords, and King of kings; and they (also shall overcome) that are with him, called chosen and faithful."

The ten horns are the symbols of the ten kingdoms above named, which come up out of the Latin empire. They became Roman Catholic, and helped the Latin empire sustain the Papal hierarchy through the 1260 years of persecution.

Verse 15 explains the waters. "The waters which thou sawest, where the harlot sitteth, are peoples, and multitudes, and nations, and tongues." This verse explains verse 1. Harlot sat on many waters in the former vision.

Verses 16, 17. "And the ten horns which thou sawest, and the beast (the whole family) these shall hate the harlot, and shall make her desolate and naked, and shall eat her flesh, and shall burn her utterly with fire. For God did put in their hearts to do his mind, and to come to one mind, and to give their kingdom to the beast, until the words of God should be accomplished." The actions of the western nations during the 1260 years of Papal persecutions, and since the judgment "hour" commenced, have such a perfect accomplishment in history, that these two verses are sufficiently explained, to us, at least, in this advanced period.

Verse 18. "And the woman whom thou sawest is that great city (Mystic Babylon, verse 5,) which reigneth over the kings of the earth; hath dominion over them." Such has been the position of mystic Babylon. She has controlled the nations as her complex symbol indicates—as a rider controls the beast that he rides.

This chapter is both supplementary and explanatory. It is just such as is needed to enable us to understand the remainder of the Apocalypse. The Lord strengthen us, that we may correctly expound the future of this holy book.

ORIENTAL SKETCHES.--No. 19.

Bashan and Its Giant Cities.

J. L. PORTER, A. M.

THE MOUNTAIN AND OAKS OF BASHAN.

Leaving Kerioth I turned my back on Moab's desolate plain, and began to climb the Mountains of Bashan. Bleak and rocky at the base, they soon assume bolder outlines and exhibit grander features. Ravines cut deeply into their sides; bare cliffs shoot out from tangled jungles of dwarf ilex, woven together with brambles and creeping plants; pointed cones of basalt, strewn here and there with cinders and ashes, tower up until a wreath of snow is wound round their heads; straggling trees of the great old oaks of Bashan dot thinly the lower declivities; higher up little groves of them appear, and higher still, around the loftiest peaks, are dense forests. Our road was a goat-track, which wound along the side of a brawling mountain torrent, now scaling a dizzy crag high over it, and now diving down again till the spray of its minature cascades dashed over our horses. For nearly two hours we rode up that wild and picturesque mountain side. We passed several small villages perched like fortresses on projecting cliffs, and we saw other larger ones in the distance; they are all deserted, and during those two hours we did not meet, nor see, nor hear a human being. We saw partridges among the rocks, and eagles sweeping in graceful circles round the mountain tops, and two or three foxes and one hyena, startled from their lairs by the sound of our horses' feet; but we saw no man, no herd, no flock. The time of judgment predicted by Isaiah has surely come to this part of the land of Israel: "Behold, the Lord maketh the land empty, and maketh it waste, and turneth it upside down, and scattereth abroad the inhabitants thereof. The land shall be utterly emptied, and utterly spoiled; for the Lord hath spoken this word." Isa. xxiv. 1, 3.

On one of the southern peaks of the mountain range, some two thousand feet above the vale of Kerioth, stands the town of Hebran. Its shattered walls and houses looked exceedingly picturesque, as we wound up a deep ravine, shooting out far overhead from among the tufted foliage of the evergreen oak. Our little cavalcade was seen approaching, and ere we reached the brow of the hill the whole population had come out to meet and welcome us. The sheikh, a noble-looking young Druse, had already sent a man to bring a kid from the nearest flock to make a feast for us, and we saw him bounding away through an opening in the forest. He returned in half an hour with the kid on his shoulder. We assured the hospitable sheikh that it was impossible for us to remain. Our servants were already far away over the plain, and we had a long journey before us. He would listen to no excuse. The feast must be prepared. "My lord could not pass by his servant's house without honoring him by eating a morsel of bread, and partaking of the kid which is being made ready. The sun is high; the day is long; rest for a time under my roof; eat and drink, and then pass on in peace." There was so much of the true spirit of patriarchal hospitality here, so much that recalled to mind scenes in the life of Abraham, Gen. xviii. 2, and Manoah, Judges xiii. 15, and other Scripture celebrities, that we found it hard to refuse. Time passed, however, and we were reluctantly compelled to leave before the kid was served.

In the town of Hebran are many objects of interest. The ruins of a beautiful temple, built in A. D. 155, and of several other public edifices, are strewn over the summit and rugged sides of the hill. But the simple, massive, primeval houses were to us objects of greater attraction. Many of them are perfect, and in them the modern inhabitants find ample and comfortable accommodation. The stone doors appeared even more massive than those of Kerioth; and we found the walls of the houses in some instances more than seven feet thick. Hebran must have been one of the most ancient cities of Bashan. The view from it is magnificent. The whole country, from Kerioth to Bozrah, and from Bozrah to Salcah, was spread out before me like an embossed map; while away beyond, east, south, and west, the panorama stretched to the horizon. Two miles below me, on a projecting ridge, lay the deserted town of Adneh, thought by some to be the ancient Ashteroth-Karnaim; about three miles eastward the grey towers of Sehaeh, a large town and castle, rose up from the midst of dense oak forest. About the same distance northward is Kuft, another town whose walls still stand, and its stone gates, about ten feet high, remain in their places. Yet the town is deserted. Truly one might repeat, in every part of Bashan, the remarkable words of Isaiah: "In the city is left desolation; and the gate is smitten with destruction." Isa. xxiv. 12. We observed in wandering through Hebran, as we had done previously at Kerioth and other cities, that the large buildings,—temples, palaces, churches, and mosques,—are now universally used as folds for sheep and cattle. We saw hundreds of animals in the palaces, and the larger buildings of Hebran were so filled with their dung that we could scarcely walk through them. This also was foreseen and foretold by the Hebrew prophets: "The defenced city shall be desolate, and left like a wilderness; there shall the calf feed, and there shall he lie down.... The palaces shall be forsaken,.... the forts and towers shall be for dens for ever, a joy of wild asses, a pasture of flocks." Isa. xxvii. 10; xxxii. 14. And of Moab Isaiah says: "The cities of Aroer are forsaken; they shall be for flocks, which shall lie down, and none shall make them afraid." Isa. xvii. 2.

From Hebran we rode along the mountain side in a north-western direction, crossing a Roman road which formerly connected the capital, Bozrah, with Kufr, Kanteah, and other large towns among the mountains. It is now "desolate," like all the highways of Bashan, and in places completely covered over with the branches of oak trees and straggling brambles. In an hour we passed a group of large villages, occupied by a few families of Druses. Here, too, we found that the largest houses are now used as stables for camels and folds for sheep. Continuing to descend the terraced but desolate hill-sides, crossing several streamlets flowing through picturesque glens, and leaving a number of deserted villages to the right and left, we at length reached Suweideh, which we had previously visited on our way to Bozrah.

I had now crossed over the southern section of the ridge, and had completed my short tour of the mountains of Bashan. It was not without feelings of regret that, after a visit so brief, I was about to turn away from this interesting region, most probably for ever. I felt glad, however, that I had been privileged to visit, even for so brief a period, a country renowned in early history, and sacred as one of the first provinces bestowed by God on his ancient people. The freshness and picturesque beauty of the scenery, the extent and grandeur of the ruins, the hearty and repeated welcomes of the people, the truly patriarchal hospitality with which I was everywhere entertained, but, above all, the convincing, overwhelming testimony afforded at every step to the minute accuracy of Scripture history, and the literal fulfillment of prophecy, filled my mind with such feelings of joy and of thankfulness as I had never before experienced. I had often read of Bashan,—how the Lord had delivered into the hands of the tribe of Manasseh, Og, its giant king, and all his people. I had observed the statement that a single province of his kingdom, Argob, contained threescore great cities, fenced with high walls, gates, and bars, besides unwalled towns a great many. I had examined my map, and had found that the whole of Bashan is not larger than an ordinary English county. I confess I was astonished; and though my faith in the Divine Record was not shaken, yet I felt that some strange statistical mystery hung over the passage, which required to be cleared up. That one city, nurtured by the commerce of a mighty empire, might grow till her people could be numbered by millions, I could well believe; that two or even three commercial cities might spring up in favored localities, almost side by side, I could believe too. But that sixty walled cities, besides unwalled towns a great many, should exist in a small province, at such a remote age far from the sea, with no rivers and little commerce, appeared to be inexplicable. Inexplicable, mysterious though it appeared, it is true. On the spot, with my own eyes, I had now verified it. A list of more than one hundred ruined cities and villages, situated in these mountains alone, I had in my hands; and on the spot I had tested it, and found it accurate, though not complete. More than thirty of these I had myself visited or passed close by. Many others I had seen in the distance. The extent of some of them I measured, and have already stated. Of their high antiquity I could not, after inspecting them, entertain a doubt; and I have explained why. Here, then, we have a venerable Record, more than three thousand years old, containing incidental descriptions, statements, and statistics, which few men would be inclined to receive on trust, which not a few are now attempting to throw aside as "glaring absurdities," and "gross exaggerations," and yet which close and thorough examination proves to be accurate in the most minute details. Here, again are prophecies of ruin and of utter desolation, pronounced and recorded when this country was in the height of its prosperity,—when its vast plains waved with corn, when its hill-sides were clothed with vineyards, when its cities and villages resounded with the busy hum of a teeming population; and now, after my survey of Bashan, if I were asked to describe the present state of plains, mountains, towns, and villages, I could not possibly select language more appropriate, more accurate, or more graphic, than the language of these very prophecies. My unalterable conviction is, that the eyes of the Omniscient God alone could have foreseen a doom so terrible as that which has fallen on Moab and Bashan.

THE GOSPEL OF CHRIST.

How uncongenial to the world is the gospel of Christ! Persecution and persuasion have been employed against it by turns. The bribe of the statesman and the bayonet of the soldier have been used in turn, in order to crush it; but it has risen from every conflict radiant with greater beauty; the hundred hands of infidelity can not destroy it; the branch of the oak may be broken by the wasps that settle on it, or the rock be uprooted by the sea-birds that claw above it, as Christianity be put down by its opponents, or finally and fatally betrayed by its professed friends. The church may be in danger, but Christianity never; the chapel may be deserted, but Christ will have a people; the minister may become apostate, but Jesus Christ remains the same, yesterday, today, and forever; the earthern vessel may be broken in shivers, but its precious contents will be unearthed, and its fragrance spread only the wider.

In sunshine and in storm, by night and by day, through good report and through bad report the great mission of the gospel has been carried on with varied success. Its sacred banner has been carried by saints and by martyrs, with the wind and against the wind, from the Jordan to the Tiber, the Thames, the Nile and the Mississippi. Its glad sound has been lifted up and been heard on the sea-waves, amid the noise of outcasts and the tumults of the people; the communion table has been spread in all places of the earth. And, wherever that blessed gospel has been received in simplicity it has achieved the most beneficial results. It has no sooner laid its consecrating hand upon the poor than they have felt unspeakably rich. It has no sooner touched the shackles of the slave than, disenthralled and unfettered, he has stepped into that freedom with which the truth makes free. Crushed and controverted as it has been at every step, it has dotted the broad earth with holy temples as with stars, and made them the rallying places for the overburdened hearts and shattered hopes of the children of men. In spite of fierce opposition it has been woven into the literature of nations, and into the languages of the earth. At this day it gives some of its coloring to the conversations of coteries and to the talk of the streets. It still enters palaces with the majesty of a queen, and descends into cottages with the cordiality and kindness of a mother or a sister. It mingles with our griefs, and waits upon our sickness. It hallows the ties of marriage, and mitigates the separations and the sorrows of the grave. It is the joy of the good, the strength of the feeble, the hope of the wise, the glory of the saints—and, blessed be God, it shall know no end; its "silver cord" never shall be loosed, its "golden bowl" shall never be broken.

Beneficent as the gospel is, it is painful to learn that its least victories have been the fruits of tears and suffering. It "came by blood," and by blood it must be perpetuated. But it has been found, as it has been clearly shown in every cycle of its progress that the truths thus written in blood have been more widely read, as well as more enduring, than if engraven with the point of a diamond on the rocks of every quarter of the globe. From Pope Pharaoh to Pope Pius IX.—from the College of Baal to that of the Congregation of Sacred Rites at Rome—from the massacre of the innocents at Bethlehem to that of St Bartholomew and the Sicilian Vespers—the meekhearted followers of the cross have been "sawn asunder," and burned, and endured "cruel mockings;" but all this and incalculably more persecution has failed to arrest its progress. It has rather fanned its half-lowed flame. It has blown far and wide the ashes of the martyrs of many a land, there to take foot and grow up and bear Cadmean harvests of yet more holy, more undaunted men.

Philosophy, with its cobwebs, tried to perplex its witnesses; and power, strove to extirpate them. Vial after vial was poured out on the meek confessors of the Christian faith, constituting a series of successive persecutions, unparalleled for cruelty in the history of mankind. But the death of the martyr was not the destruction of his creed. On the contrary, his blood fell as dew upon the truth, and made it flourish the more. The air became as the trumpet of jubilee, and the winds of heaven as winged angels, wafting the tones of the gospel from sea to sea. Opposition served only to brighten the hallowed lights, or to concentrate their scattered rays into an intenser focus, rendering more visible, and thereby more glorious, the painted ones that suffered—and more monstrous still the surrounding grim and spectral superstitions of the earth. The gospel, in spite of opposition, was eventually throned above the Cæsars.

The trees of the forest have fallen, but the vine brought out of Egypt has been rooted by the tempest. Its branches have been swept by successive storms, and its boughs have been hewn and trodden down by Cains and Herods and Neros and Hildebrands of the earth; but, like the banyan tree, it has only multiplied its roots and spread the more. The philosophical mythologies of Greece and the warlike rites of Rome have passed away; the priesthood of Levi and the flamens of Quirinus have retired from their altars, and the wide earth scarcely renders back one echo of their voices; but the gospel endures—nay, it flourishes, deriving fresh strength from the wrecks of error, and new beauty from the contentions of truth.

In the worst of times, and in the most terrible apostasy, God has a people. In the most unfavorable circumstances, and in the least suspected ages, they are and have been found; black indeed must that desert be in which there is no oasis, and Alpine snows must have been more than Alpine cold amid which no flowers blooms; we may not see them, but God does; and even we, dim as our vision is, if we only look below the turbid and agitated surface, shall see a silver stream that flows onward in beauty and in splendor to the main.—Dr. Channing.

THE RESTITUTION.

S. E. CHAPLIN, EDITOR.

Plymouth, Indiana, June 28, 1882.

WILL reply to communications as fast as possible.

SOME very welcome pieces have been delayed but will appear soon.

BROTHER MYERS' book on the Covenants has come to hand. Puller notice hereafter.

WE insert copied notices of two quite interesting books under the proper head. We direct special attention to the new work by J. H. Pettingell, on "The Life Everlasting."

WILL our friends do all they can to increase our list during the coming six months, so that our paper may be made self-sustaining. We shall use every effort to make THE RESTITUTION interesting and instructive. Important changes are so rapidly transpiring that we know not what a day may bring forth. Gentile Powers are undergoing their last transformations, and the kingdom of God is at hand.

GUITEAU'S death-warrant was duly signed and the seal of the Criminal Court attached Monday morning, June 26, and sent to the warden who keeps the jail. The time of execution has been fixed at the interval between noon and two o'clock in the afternoon, Friday, June 30, 1882. The preparations for the execution have all been made, even to the selection of the rope. Guiteau is now engaged preparing a speech to be delivered on the scaffold. The gallows-scene, that ends the utterances and the existence of this deep-pearel crank, will be the finale of an eventful historical tragedy.

WHEN in Philadelphia we called on our brother editor, J. D. Brown, of the Bible Banner. While in his office we had the pleasure of an introduction to J. H. Pettingell A. M., the talented author of "The Life Everlasting," and also to Elder G. R. Kramer, of Wilmington, Del., who is an earnest and eloquent advocate of the literal fulfillment of prophecy. Like ourself, our brother editor of the Bible Banner is laboring and sacrificing for the cause in which he is engaged. From him we met with a kind and cordial reception, notwithstanding some discrepancy of views on the Millennial question—or age to-come.

SIX months of the year are now numbered with the past. This half-year period has been characterized as one of physical disturbance. Solar outbursts and sun spots have been marked features in the condition of the great central orb, while auroral displays, cyclones, tornadoes, and destructive floods, have been the corresponding terrestrial disturbances, showing some abnormal unbalanced condition in the electrical state of our earth in its relations to the sun. What may take place during the next six months is for the future to disclose. We must bear in mind that August and September are the months when hurricanes revel in fury. In the political world the prospect is as far from being assuring as in the physical. The war-cloud is gathering in the East, and it may overshadow the heavens before another six months have closed. Turkey is doomed, as its allotted time is expiring, and, therefore, diplomacy can never settle the Oriental question. Then, lastly, the social world is disorganized. Capital and labor, the governing and the governed, are at antagonism. The worst is not yet. We are about to enter the "time of trouble." There is no lasting peace and quietude for our world till the Prince of Peace shall come and rule in the earth.

Communications.

SOME THOUGHTS ON GOD AND HIS CHRIST.

That the God of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of glory, may give unto you the spirit of wisdom and revelation in the knowledge of him, having the eyes of your heart enlightened that ye may know what is the hope of his calling, what the riches of the glory of the inheritance of the saints, and what the exceeding greatness of his power to usward, who believe, according to that working of the strength of his might, which he wrought in Christ when he raised him from the dead and made him to sit at his right hand in the heavenly places.

Those who endeavor to understand the spirit of the Holy Scriptures rather than analyze the letter, will see that the mission of Jesus, the Christ of God, was not an interference on his part between the wrath of God and a sin-stricken world, but an interference between man and his rebellion, so that they might turn and live. This, it is almost unnecessary to say, is a great difference, an enormous difference, the difference of the east from the west, and the heaven from the earth. It cannot be doubted that God foreknew of the great tragedy, the culminating act of rebellion on the part of our race in the murder of the Holy One and the Just; nor can it be supposed that the noble messenger himself was blind to the horrible death that awaited him; for otherwise, for it is evident that he calmly stepped into the hideous jaws of death to battle with it, naked, dishonored, mangled.

It is also evident that God ordained it thus from the beginning, that he should be permitted to suffer and die at the hands of his enemies. But as to the motive of God in thus working, I deny that his justice demanded any such denouement, or that our Heavenly Father has ever shown "satisfaction" or approbation of the act.

However, we can trace to some extent the design of God in the mission of Christ. He thus illustrated his boundless patience and forbearance with a race that were simply exasperating in their rebellion. It showed to what lengths their stupid rebellion would go if carried to its legitimate issue. It revealed the heart and the nature of the Captain of our salvation, and proved him to be the faithful Son of his generous Father. It exhibited the power of God to rescue from the power of death and the grave, and the impotence of man to "destroy the soul" of those that wait upon their Maker, and it was a means of instituting a standard to all future generations, of the love and power of God that even overlooked and forgave bare-faced rebellion.

From this point of view we can clearly see the meaning of such figures of speech as "the blood of Christ cleanseth from all sin," etc. Whoever heard of blood cleansing? It stains—never cleanses. It is as impossible for blood to wash clean as it is for a camel to go through the eye of a needle, and the blood of the murdered Jesus was a stain of the deepest and it sunk deeply upon the heads of those who exclaimed "His blood be upon us and upon our children." But with God all things are possible, and thanks be unto him that he has contrived it so that the most desperate crime that was ever committed against him—an open outrage of his authority—he mercifully turned to our account, gave us the benefit of our ignorance, and taught us a lesson of humility. Therefore it is written "Kiss the Son," for here the line is drawn between clemency and condemnation.

We see thus that every good and perfect gift is from the Father, and we conclude that all thanks, praise, and ascription, in the primary sense, be accorded to him, for even the Son is subject to him, for of him, and through him, and to him are all things.

During the time of Jesus' sojourn among the children of men, he was careful to impress upon us that he came not in his own name, that he spoke not his own words, nor performed his own works. His finger ever pointed upward to the Creator, to his God and our God, to his Father and our Father, to indicate that the communication that he opened between creature and Creator was direct. "Ask the Father," said he, "ask the Father in my name." He said again. "I say not unto you that I will pray the Father for you, for the Father himself loveth you."

Far be it from us to detract from the glory of the Son of God, I would that we could all appreciate the greatness of the greatest of created beings, the Lord of light and glory, in whom dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily; but I believe there is a possibility of robbing God in Christ's name, for the glory that he had from the beginning was the glory that the Father gave him.

Glory to God in the highest! Holy, Holy, Holy, Lord God Almighty, which was, and is, and is to come. Worthy art thou, our Lord and our God, to receive the honor and the glory, and the power; for thou didst create all things, and because of thy will they were and were created.

Worthy is the Lamb that was slain to receive power, and riches, and wisdom, and might, and honor, and glory, and blessing. Blessing, and honor, and glory, and power, be unto him that sitteth upon the throne and unto the Lamb. J. F. GELLETLY.

Editor Restitution:

Last November a Rev. D. D. of this city (Bolleville, Canada,) delivered a sermon in his church advocating the unconscious state of the dead, which elicited the following letter. On sending the letter in the newspaper I asked the Doctor if he was going to reply and he said he would not. I therefore took it on myself to defend the truth, which resulted in several letters on both sides of the question. I send the correspondence to you hoping you can use it in THE RESTITUTION. The sermon and letters were published in the Daily Ontario and the Weekly Chronicle (both of one establishment) of this city. Yours, etc.,

A. ROBINSON.

THE SLEEP AFTER DEATH.

Mr. Editor:

SIR—As I cannot agree with all the statements of the Rev. Dr. Clarke, of the Episcopal Church, Belleville, in his sermon as published in Weekly Chronicle of the 2nd inst., and preached by him on the 26th November last, perhaps you would allow me space sufficient in your valuable paper to state my objections. The Doctor states that the soul after death sleeps in an unconscious state until the resurrection. Is it not very strange that the universal church of Christ should have taught a contrary doctrine as being in accordance with Scripture? And the Doctor, at every morning service in his church, teaches the conscious state of the soul when he chants the Te Deum Laudimus, in which he says: "The glorious company of the apostles praise thee. The goodly fellowship of the prophets praise thee. The noble army of the martyrs praise thee." etc. How could they do this if they were asleep? It does not say that they will or shall praise thee, but that they do. It was said of Christ that he should "make known things kept secret from the foundation of the world." And the conscious state of the soul after the death of the body was a doctrine he taught when he said to the penitent thief: "Today, shalt thou sleep with me in Paradise." The parable of Dives and Lazarus teaches the same thing most forcibly, for it says as soon as each died they went to different places, and conversed, which they could not do if they were asleep. This parable teaches a state of things existing in the spirit world, if it does not state an actual occurrence.

Again, we are told in the New Testament, "Moses and Elias appeared on the Mount of Transfiguration, and talked with Christ about the death he was to die at "Jerusalem;" and that Christ charged his apostles who saw these persons that they should keep it secret. Surely the Rev. Doctor will not say that these holy men were awakened out of sleep to appear just at this time, and then go to sleep again! It is also stated after Christ's resurrection, that "many of the bodies of the saints which slept arose out of their graves, and appeared with Mary in Jerusalem." It does not say that "many of the spirits of the saints which slept arose," etc. St. John is told by the angel which appeared to him in his vision, that "those he saw around the throne of God with crowns on their heads, and palms in their hands, clothed in white, were the saints who had washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb, therefore are they ever before the throne, and serve God day and night in his temple." Not asleep, but awake and actively employed.

There are many more passages of Holy Writ that might be quoted to disprove the sleeping theory of the Rev. Doctor, but not to be tedious and trespass too much on your time and patience, I will not multiply them at present. There is one thing, however, I would like to say. There is one portion of the Doctor's hearers (supposing that he does not always have a congregation composed exclusively of saints) that will thank him if he will assure them that they will have a very long respite from the torments of a guilty conscience, while they take their post mortem nap.

FRANKONIA.

THE SLEEP AFTER DEATH.

Editor Ontario:

SIR—With your permission, I would like to say a few words on the above subject, through your valuable paper. If "Frankonia" will read the Church Fathers, he will find that several of them believed in the unconscious state of the dead between death and resurrection, and, therefore, the "Universal Church of Christ" has not "taught a contrary doctrine." Would it not be better to draw our conclusions from the Old and New Testaments, rather than rely on what the Church believes as a rule, as the Church has not always been pure, either as to doctrine or practice. While it is true that our authorized version of the New Testament contains the passage (Luke xxiii. 42) as quoted by "Frankonia," some other translations read: "In that day thou shalt be with me in Paradise." This rendering does away with an apparent contradiction in John xx. 24, where Jesus, three days after his crucifixion, tells Mary he had not yet ascended to his Father. A part of the "Universal Church," at least, teaches that where the Father and Christ are, is Paradise, and that Paradise and Heaven are synonymous terms. The thief wished to be remembered at a certain time—"when thou comest into thy kingdom." The answer was in harmony with the prayer, and by altering the punctuation, would read thus: "Verily I say unto thee today, thou shalt be with me in Paradise," (or his kingdom). Some commentators punctuate the passage as above, which I think makes good sense of it, and does away with the contradiction as claimed by infidels. "Frankonia" admits in effect that the Old Testament does not teach that the soul is conscious between death and the resurrection when he says: "It was said of Christ that he should make known things kept secret from the foundation of the world." I agree with him in this, but go farther, and say that the New Testament does not teach it either, when fairly analyzed and correctly translated.

The characters represented in the parable of the rich man and Lazarus (according to the language used therein) appear to have been material beings instead of immaterial souls; for the rich man had eyes and a material tongue, and Lazarus had material fingers, and they were all apparently material, corporeal individuals. If "Frankonia" will turn to Isa. xiv., he will see that dead men in their graves are represented as talking to the king of Babylon; so that Dives is not the first dead man that was represented as if alive. Moreover, a gulf would not be any hindrance to an immortal soul, as we are told they can fly through space; and it will be noticed that the gulf was very narrow, as conversation could be carried on across it. The words "soul" and "spirit" do not occur in the whole parable, neither is the phrase "immortal soul," or "immortal spirit" to be found between the lids of the Bible. If so, will some one quote the chapter and verse? That which took place on the Mount of Transfiguration, was called a vision by Christ, for he says, "Tell the vision to no man," etc. That a vision is not a reality can be seen from what Peter says in Acts xii. 9, for he says that he "wist not that it was true but thought he saw a vision." According to Peter, then, a vision is not a truth or reality. Therefore, it would hardly be safe to conclude that the soul is conscious between death and the resurrection. If we had to prove it from the vision on the Mount, and to say that the souls of Moses and Elias were there, is mere assumption. The record says that Moses and Elias were there, not their souls. God could resurrect individuals as well then as any other time, and it would not follow that they would fall asleep again. The revelation of St. John was a vision, and those around the throne of God were not departed spirits of the saints, but a representation of things which "must shortly come to pass," as we read in the first chapter of the book of Revelations. I think most any clergyman will admit that St. John saw things in the vision which have not yet become realities, but will in the future. If the doctrine of the immortality of the soul be true, it is strange that we have to appeal to visions and figurative language to prove it. If it is a Bible doctrine, I would think there would be at least twenty plain statements therein to that effect.

THE JEWISH PERSECUTION: A SIGN OF THE END.

The present murders, spoliations, and persecutions of the Jews in "holy" Russia, may be the beginning of the end of all their troubles, and the time may be at hand for which they have so long and fervently prayed and hoped. Many people believe that the "seven times" predicted by Daniel are drawing to a close, and that the "Times of the Gentiles" are nearly fulfilled. The waters of the mystical Euphrates are drying up rapidly before our eyes, and now we hear of frightful persecutions of the chosen people in Russia, where two-thirds of them reside, and rumors of a second Exodus, all of which may portend the end of this age, for we are told that immediately before this dispensation terminates, the chosen people will return to their old heritage in a time of unexampled trouble.

"Surely the Isles shall wait for me, and the ships of Tarshish first to bring my sons from far." Isa. lx. 9. As Tarshish, or Tyre, was the greatest naval power in ancient times, and in this respect resembles Great Britain, which is the greatest naval power of the present time, it is to be hoped therefore that Great Britain, or Christian Tarshish from the Isles of the Sea, is the power destined some day to render powerful assistance to the Jews in their restoration to the Holy Land.

For some years back a yearning to return to Palestine has been manifested by Jews, and as a consequence a steady influx of the people into the country has been taking place. During the last ten years the Jewish population has doubled itself. Jerusalem is gradually becoming a centre of civilization, and is assuming the appearance of a modern town. Villas are being erected in the neighborhood of the city, and there are no less than three Jewish building societies in operation. The Russian persecutions have now given such an impetus to Hebrew emigration into Palestine that money is all that is required in order to re-people the land, especially as the Sultan, who is a liberal-minded and humane man, receives the Jews into his dominions with pleasure, and renders them whatever assistance he can. The Jews appreciate the kind treatment of the Sultan and Mussulmans, and they say that they find the Turks are more merciful than the members of the Greek Church. Such an influx of Hebrews has not been known since the destruction of Jerusalem by Hadrian.

Whether this awakening of the Jews and this intense longing of "... thousands of Jewish families in Russia and elsewhere to settle in the land of their forefathers, is the beginning of the foretold Jewish restoration of the Hebrews to their ancient heritage will doubtless occupy a period of several years, and will take place for the most part, as Daniel says, "during a time of trouble such as never was since there was a nation." Unfortunately this Jewish emigration has begun in bloodshed and persecutions, and any observant person looking at the present state of the nations of the Continent, would not be surprised any morning to hear of war breaking out, the magnitude of which would not be surpassed "since there was a nation."

We have conditions, then, at the present time, to remind us of the predictions of the prophets, even to the great maritime power from the isles of the Gentiles, rendering generous and willing assistance in money and ships to the Jews.

But besides all this, we are told that we are approaching the time when the final restoration of the Jews should take place. The exact day or year is not stated in the Scriptures, but we can gather from Daniel that this great event, unspeakably important to Jew and Gentile, would occur in the "Time of the End." The "Time of the End" is or will be evidently the closing years of the "Times of the Gentiles, or the time when Jerusalem will cease to be trodden down by the Gentile powers. Although not expressly stated, it is strongly inferred in the Scriptures that the "Times of the Gentiles" were to continue, in symbolic language, for "Seven Times," or seven years, whose days are years, i. e., 2520 years, according to the year-day interpretation. If we date this "Seven Times," the latter half of which period is often called "time, times, and the dividing of time" from the reign of Nebuchadnezzar, "the golden head of the fourfold image," we shall find that the "Times of the Gentiles" are drawing to a close.

Many people believe that the final fall of the Gentile power, and consequently the end of this dispensation, will terminate with the close of the sixth thousandth year of the world, and the beginning of the seventh thousandth year will usher in the Millennium.*

At the present time many wise and thoughtful people think they can discern the clouds which portend the commencement of the storm, gathering in the distant horizon, and the way in which nations will arrange themselves in order to work out unconsciously the will of him who knows the end from the beginning. Wars, or a series of wars, which may prove to be the precursors of a new dispensation, may break out ere long, for Europe is in a state of unprecedented ferment, and little better than an armed camp; and, moreover, the Eastern question is yet unsolved. It is thought by many strategists, that Palestine will some day be the great battlefield of the nations. A military writer describes the country as "the gateway between the East and West; or rather, as the Bardican which commands the two avenues of the Euphrates and Red Sea line of communication." Russia, next to Turkey, is the power that has the greatest hold on Palestine. Her hospice commands Jerusalem, and is evidently constructed more for military than for religious purposes.

It is our almost universally admitted that the prophet Ezekiel in speaking of Gog, the chief Prince of Meshech and Tubal, refers to the Czar of Russia and his dominions. The name and titles of the Northern King should be rendered "Gog of the land of Magog, Prince of Rosh, Meshech, and Tubal."—William O'Neill, M. D., M. R. C. S.

THE TORNADO SEASON.

The year 1882 bids fair to be known hereafter as the tornado year. There were several wind-storms in 1881, but only 187 persons were killed by them, while already during the first six months of 1882 there have been 315 killed, many hundreds seriously injured, and millions of dollars worth of property destroyed. Though the principal part of this loss belongs to what may be called the tornado region—namely, that section of country northeast from the northern part of Texas, including the Indian Territory, Kansas, Missouri, Northern Arkansas, and Iowa—still all parts of the South and Southwest have suffered severely, and one severe wind-storm swept through a portion of Pennsylvania. Three terrible visitations commenced in March, there being two in that month—one in Georgia, involving a loss of six lives, and one in Dakota, which sacrificed twenty-six. In April heavy winds were very prevalent all over the Southern States destroying a large amount of property and killing no less than 118 persons. In May there was a comparative lull, though there was a severe tornado in the vicinity of McAllister, Tex. which resulted in the death of eighteen persons, and there were numerous less destructive blows in Kansas and Texas, which helped to swell the death-roll for the month to forty four. This seemed to be the signal for unbosoming the fury of the winds in the West, and the present month has witnessed an almost constant succession of terrible tornadoes throughout Iowa and some parts of Kansas, the principal ones being most severely felt at Grinnell, Independence, and Emmetsburg, and other parts of Central Iowa. The list of the dead already reaches 127, and many more have received injuries from which they cannot recover, while many hundreds have been bruised and maimed, and the damage occasioned by the loss of houses, barns churches, schools, crops, stock, and farming implements can hardly be estimated. In the Grinnell disaster the onslaught was unprecedentedly furious, three tornadoes raging at one time, one commencing in the southwest part of Boone County and ending near Ogden; the second commencing near the Missouri frontier and ending near Burlington; and the third beginning near Grinnell and sweeping over a course of 200 miles before its awful journey was terminated, leaving behind it a swath half a mile in width of utter destruction and devastation. As if not content with these, Nature has manifested her anger in unusually severe wind, hail, and thunder storms, floods and tidal waves, which have helped to increase the enormous loss of property throughout the West.

The description of one of these tornadoes answers for all of them, for there is no difference between them except in the aggregate of destruction they cause. In each case there is the same swiftly-whirling funnel-shaped cloud giving warning of its approach, not only by its distinct form and the commotion it causes in the atmosphere, but also by the terrible roaring sound which precedes its assault. The preliminary phenomena are always the same. All the data concerning their occurrence are now well known, and the experiences of the past twenty years indicate to an absolute certainty that the region west of the Mississippi River from the northern line of Iowa and Nebraska down to Arkansas the Indian Territory, and Texas, must always be exposed to them, especially in the months of May and June.

It is hopeless to attempt to stop them by any measures known to science, but they are now so well known in their origin, direction, progress, and results that the Signal Service Bureau ought to be able to give timely warning of their approach so that persons may be able to protect themselves, if not their property. It has been proved that the cellar of a house is the only place of safety. As it may not be feasible for every man to excavate himself by a cave in his grounds to which he and his family could repair, it seems, as one Iowa paper has already suggested, that a strong and substantial shelter might be designed in the cellar so that the danger of falling timbers might be averted and thus a harbor of refuge would always be at hand. At Grinnell, as at Omaha nine years ago, the tornado gave ample warning of its approach and left sufficient time to seek refuge in cellars, and those who did so escaped in almost every instance.—Chicago Tribune.

The best recipe for going through life with beautiful manners is to feel that everybody, no matter how rich or how poor, needs all the kindness he can get from others in this world.

ALEXANDRIA, June 26. — Arabi Pasha states that if the Porte abandons him, he will publish correspondence proving that every step taken since the 7th of September last was instigated by the Porte.

EXPLOSIVES.

ALEXANDRIA, June 26.—An uneasy feeling continues to prevail along the Suez Canal. It is rumored that a number of cases containing explosives, accompanied by men in uniform, had arrived at Ismailia and been deposited in unoccupied public buildings, under the supervision of the Governor.

The Khedive has been advised to go on board a vessel, as there is some danger that he will be seized as a hostage.

FORT STANTON, N. M., June 23.—The Mescalero Indians have broken out. The Indian police killed some prisoners who tried to escape from Fort Union. Montezuma, the War Chief, is on the Agent's side, and is fighting the other Indians. The Agent was fired on and wounded twice. Troops are going to the spot immediately.

Sententious.

Perseverance is the best school for every manly virtue, and hope should always accompany it.

True repentance has a double aspect; it looks upon things past with a weeping eye, and upon the future with a watchful eye.—South.

"Let us not stand all day idle,
And the Master at the door;
The fields are white to harvest,
And our labor almost o'er,
Let us arise up and working—
Time is gliding fast away—
For the eventide is waning,
Soon shall break eternal day."

He that waits for an opportunity to do much at once may breathe out his life in idle wishes, and regret, in the last hour, his useless intentions and barren zeal.

"Be still," nor doubt His faithful love.
The cup He fills by faith and patience press;
He smiles He cries thee, through the fire.
Will calm thee strength thou dost not grieve.

"Be still," thy cares are measured all
By Him who notes the sparrow's fall;
There's not a grief which rends the breast,
But He can change or calm to rest.

Anxiety and worry are the friction of the soul, irritating, disorganizing, and wearing out the delicate machinery of life. They dim the brightness and sour the sweetness of what might otherwise be the happiest life. They repel sympathy, alienate friendship, and destroy love. They are productive of no good, and work only evil, both to self and others.

Cultivate a spirit of reverence for the aged. It is a great blot upon the character where it is lacking. To revere the aged is to revere a thing that is almost sacred. In them are stored up many rich experience of joy or suffering, good and evil that may be of great benefit to us if we only contemplate them rightly. They are monuments; as it were, upon which are inscribed the lessons for us to learn—teaching us what to cherish and what to avoid—what to love and what to hate.

AT CLOSE OF DAY.

If you sit down at set of sun,
And count the acts that you have done,
And counting find
One self-denying act, one word
That eased the heart of him who heard;
One glance most kind,
That fell like sunshine where it went,
Then you may count that day well spent.

But if through all the livelong day
You've chafed no heart by yea or nay;
If through it all
You've nothing done that you can trace
That brought the sunshine to one face;
No act most small
That helped some soul, and nothing cost,
Then count that day as worse than lost.

THE END OF THE WAY.

The following beautiful lines were written by a young woman in Nova Scotia, an invalid for many years with spinal disease, and a great sufferer, not in whom the grace of God is most wonderfully manifested.

My life is a wearisome journey,
I'm sick with the dust and the heat
The rays of the sun beat upon me,
The fetters are wounding my feet;
But the city to which I am journeying,
Will more than my trials repay,
And the toils of the road will seem nothing
When I get to the end of the way.

There are so many hills to climb upward,
I often am longing for rest;
But He who appoints me my pathway,
Knows just what is needful and best:
I know in His Word he has promised
That my strength shall be as my days;
And the toils of the road will seem nothing
When I get to the end of the way.

He h[illegible] well to forsake me,
O[illegible] tried me so much;
All His people have been dearly purchased,
And none can never be lost such.
By-and-by I shall see Him and praise Him,
In the City of unending day:
And the toils of the road will seem nothing
When I get to the end of the way.

When the last feeble sigh has been taken,
And the gates of pearl stand ajar,
And the beautiful songs of the angel
Float out on my listening ear;
When all that now seems so mysterious,
Will be plain and clear as the day:
Yes, the toils of the road will seem nothing
When I get to the end of the way.

Though now I am footsore and weary,
I shall rest when I'm safely at home;
I know I'll receive a glad welcome,
For the Savior Himself has said, Come!
So when I am weary in body,
And sinking in spirit, I say,
All the toils of the road will seem nothing
When I get to the end of the way.

Crossing fountains are there for the thirsty:
There are cordials for those who are faint:
There are robes that are whiter and purer
Than any that fancy can paint:
Then I'll try to press [illegible]
Thinking often through each weary day,
The toils of the road will seem nothing
When I get to the end of the way.

THE KEYS OF THE KINGDOM OF HEAVEN.

Much controversy exists in the religious world upon this subject. I therefore offer a few lines giving my understanding of it, and if not fully in accordance with the teaching of the word, I invite some contributor to THE RESTITUTION to write more largely upon the subject, and give the true sense.

Jesus said to Peter, "I will give unto thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven." Luke xvi. 19. These keys were then in the hands of Jesus the Christ. And if we compare these words of Jesus, with those of the prophet Isaiah, and also of John, we will see that the keys of the kingdom of heaven are the same as the keys of the house of David, "And the keys of the house of David will I lay upon his shoulder: so that he shall open, and none shall shut, and he shall shut, and none shall open." Isa. xxii. 22. These things saith he that is holy, he that is true, he that hath the key of the house of David, he that openeth, and no man shutteth, and shutteth, and no man openeth. Rev. iii. 7.

David was king over all Israel, in an undivided state, so Jesus who "hath the key of the house of David" (when Israel shall become one again, "and they shall be no more two nations, neither shall they be divided into two kingdoms any more at all,") shall be king over all Israel. So the kingdom of heaven is the kingdom of David restored, the kingdom of David and the kingdom of Israel are one. But the kingdom of Israel is still overturned, and as a kingdom it is no longer in existence, neither will it be until "he shall come whose right it is" (to reign). So the children of Israel must be gathered together in their own land, before "the God of heaven (will) set up a kingdom, which shall never be destroyed." So when God shall make the tribes of Israel "one nation (again) in the land upon the mountains of Israel, . . . . one king shall be king over them all." Then God says, "They shall be my people, and I will be their God. And David my servant (Jesus the seed of David) shall be king over them." Ezek. xxxvii. 22–24.

We also read, "Behold, the days come, saith the Lord, that I will raise unto David a righteous Branch and a king shall reign and prosper, and shall execute judgment and justice in the earth. In his days Judah shall be saved, and Israel shall dwell safely, and this is his name whereby he shall be called, The Lord Our Righteousness." Jer. xxiii. 5, 6. So Philip said to Nathaniel, "We have found him, of whom Moses in the law, and the prophets did write, Jesus of Nazareth, the Son of Joseph." And when Nathaniel answered Jesus he said, "Rabbi, thou art the Son of God: thou art the king of Israel." John i. 45, 49.

These Scripture texts show that the expression, kingdom of heaven as made by Jesus to Peter, means the kingdom of Israel (David) restored, so it is very important to understand what is meant by the keys of the kingdom of heaven. Inasmuch as the word keys indicates power: power to unlock or open the way, and as Jesus said, "All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth." Matt. xxviii. 18. This power was then, in the hands of Jesus, and none else could share in this power except those who received it by or through him. But in the person of Peter Jesus found a fit subject to commit this power, so he said to him, "I will give unto thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven." Jesus also added, "And whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth shall be bound in heaven: and whatsoever thou shalt loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven." Two questions arise:

1. When did Peter receive "the keys of the kingdom of heaven?"

2. Were they given to Peter exclusively?

We observe the promise is in the future tense, "I will give," not I do give, or have given. So when Jesus spake these words to Peter, it was then a promise, to be fulfilled in the future from that time.

Now after the death and resurrection of Jesus the Christ, his disciples were assembled together, and Jesus stood in the midst of them, and said, "Peace be unto you: as my Father hath sent me, even so send I you. And when he said this, he breathed on them, and saith unto them, receive ye the Holy Ghost (Spirit): Whomsoever sins ye remit, they are remitted unto them: and whomsoever sins ye retain, they are retained." John xx. 21–23. And when Jesus sent his disciples, he commissioned them, saying, "Go ye therefore, and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. Teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you." Matt. xxviii. 19, 20. "Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature. He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved; but he that believeth not shall be damned" (condemned). Mark xvi 15, 16. "And behold, I send the promise of my Father upon you: but tarry ye in the city of Jerusalem, until ye be endued with power from on high." Luke xxiv. 49.

Now it was expedient that Jesus should leave his disciples, and ascend to the Father that this promise should come upon them, which is, "The Comforter," "The Spirit of truth," "The Holy Ghost" (Spirit). John xiv. 16, 17. 26.

So when Jesus had "showed himself alive after his passion by many infallible proofs, being seen of them forty days, and speaking of the things pertaining to the kingdom of God:" "they asked him, saying, Lord, wilt thou at this time restore again the kingdom to Israel? And he said unto them, It is not for you to know the times or the seasons, which the Father hath put in his own power. But ye shall receive power, after that the Holy Ghost is come upon you; and ye shall be witnesses unto me both in Jerusalem, and in all Judea, and in Samaria, and unto the uttermost parts of the earth." Acts i. 3. 6–8.

Now in the presence of the disciples, Jesus "was taken up and a cloud received him out of their sight." Then they returned to Jerusalem to wait until they would be endued "with power from on high." They therefore continued "in prayer and supplication," all of one mind, such was their manner until "the day of Pentecost was fully come," and while in this place, all of one mind, the promise of the Father came upon them: even "a sound from heaven as of a rushing mighty wind," "and it filled all the house," "and it sat upon each of them."

Thus we find that a dispensation of the gospel was committed unto them. So Paul says, "I am not ashamed of the gospel of Christ: for it is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth: to the Jew first, and also to the Greek." Rom. i. 16.

And this "gospel of Christ" is "the gospel of the kingdom." Matt. iv. 23. "And this gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the world for a witness unto all nations." Matt. xxiv. 14. So I understand "the keys of the kingdom of heaven," to be the gospel, or, the good news of the kingdom.

But Jesus first addressed himself to Peter, because he was the chief speaker among the disciples, and on the day of Pentecost when the disciples were endued with power from on high, to use the keys of the kingdom, we read, "But Peter, standing up with the eleven, lifted up his voice, and said unto them, Ye men of Judea, and all that dwell at Jerusalem, be this known unto you, and hearken to my words." Acts. ii. 14.

Then he spake boldly unto the people concerning Jesus the Son of God, whom they had crucified, and God had raised up, and when they had heard the speech of Peter, "they were pricked in their hearts, and said unto Peter and the rest of the apostles, Men and brethren, what shall we do? Then Peter said unto them, Repent, and be baptized every one of you in the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins." Acts ii. 37, 38.

And again, at the homestead of Cornelius, Peter was the chief speaker, we read, "Then Peter opened his mouth and said, Of a truth I perceive that God is no respecter of persons." Acts x. 34. Then he preached, "How God anointed Jesus of Nazareth with the Holy Ghost and with power." Verse 38. And after he was slain by unlawful men, "Him God raised up the third day, and showed him openly: Not to all the people, but unto witnesses chosen before of God, even to us, who did eat and drink with him after he rose from the dead. And he commanded us to preach unto the people, and to testify that it is he which was ordained of God to be judge of quick and dead. Verses 40–52. "And he commanded them to be baptized in the name of the Lord." Verse 48.

Thus we see that the apostles (Peter the chief speaker) unlocked the way to "the kingdom of heaven," under the Christian dispensation. The gifts and sacrifices under the old dispensation pointed forward to Jesus the great "High Priest, who is set on the right hand of the throne of the majesty in the heaven." Heb. viii. 1.

And John says, "I indeed baptize you with water unto repentance." Matt. iii. 11.

But under the new dispensation the apostles baptized "for the remission of sins." So "whatsoever Peter and the rest of the apostles bound on earth should be bound in heaven, and whatsoever they should loose on earth should be loosed in heaven," or in other words, "Whosesoever sins ye remit, they are remitted unto them; and whomsoever sins ye retain, they are retained." John xx. 24.

Thus the use of the "keys" to open the way to "the kingdom of heaven." By Peter the chief speaker among the apostles, under the new order of things, through the preaching of the gospel, and remitting the sins of those who believe by baptism, thus bringing them into Christ, that they may add to their "faith, virtue; and to virtue, knowledge; and to knowledge, temperance; and to temperance, patience; and to patience, godliness; and to godliness, brotherly kindness; and to brotherly kindness, charity. . . . . For so an entrance shall be ministered unto you abundantly into the everlasting kingdom of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ." 2 Peter i. 5–11. For, "a book of remembrance was written before him for them that feared the Lord, and thought on his name, and they shall be mine saith the Lord of hosts, in the day when I make up my jewels: and I will spare them, as a man spareth his own son that serveth him." Mal. iii. 16, 17.

A LETTER TO A BROTHER.

Dear Brother:

When you were here we began a conversation on the millennial kingdom, but were interrupted and had no further opportunity to exchange views on that interesting theme. I was sorry it so happened, for if I am in error I am willing to be corrected, and am always anxious to swap it for truth.

There are many theories regarding the millennial reign, and the errors, extravagancies, and sins of its advocates, are often quoted as proof against the doctrine. Such things you know can be brought against any doctrine; pardon me therefore if, while trying to leave men and their opinions, I state a few of what appear to me to be good reasons for believing in a millennial kingdom, and I hope you will not hesitate to point out any errors you may see in them.

I suppose we shall agree in regard to the kingdom of Christ, that it is to be on this earth and that the saints are to reign with him. The points on which we differ are probably, who are the subjects of this government, and what is their condition? Of course all these matters must be decided by the Scriptures, and in studying them I must be guided by this rule:—that when the spirit spoke to a man he used words in their usual sense—the sense in which the hearers would understand them—otherwise no idea could be conveyed.

So that when we know what a name or word meant at the time, and among the people where it was spoken and written, we know the writer's meaning, and what that writing means today, for writing does not change its meaning.

In Rev. xix. 20, I find testimony in regard to some features of Christ's kingdom. Christ returns with his saints for conquest, they meet the foe, one party, the beast and false prophet, are cast into the lake of fire; another party, the kings of the earth and their armies, are slain; a third party, the old serpent, is captured, bound, and thrown into prison for a thousand years.

Now why is he imprisoned for this period? The reason is stated. "that he should deceive the nations no more till the thousand years should be ended." From this statement I understand, that he had formerly deceived the nations and that he would do so still if not restrained, and that the nations whom he formerly deceived are still alive and in a condition liable to be deceived, and will continue so thus through the thousand years. Is the deduction correct?

The war is ended, the enemy is ground to powder, their commander in prison, the saints take the kingdom and ascend their thrones. Now over whom are they to reign, and for whom are they to exercise priestly functions? For the saints are priests as well as kings, and a priest is always a mediator between God and man—the man being on probation, Heb. v. 1, and our high priest will still be a priest on his throne, Zech. vi. 13, with his brethren about him, all of the Melchizedec order.

King-Priests, uniting the temporal and spiritual powers as the counterfeit Christ and his priests have assumed to do. Are not the subjects of their administration the nations over whom the overcomers shall have authority and for whose protection the deceiver is bound?

The thousand years end and Satan is loosed and goes out to deceive the nations. But who and what are those nations that are on the earth at the end of the thousand years? Are they the immortal saints who must again be tempted? Are they the wicked dead who are to be raised and again deceived, which would involve a freedom of will to choose between good and evil, therefore on probation, and after being consumed must they be raised again to stand before the throne and die a third death?

I cannot think they are either of these for I am told that they are Gog and Magog. To learn who these are I must turn as at other times to the O. T. with which the revelator always supposes the reader to be familiar and in which is found every symbol and character in Revelation.

There I find that Gog and Magog were a great confederacy of nations who, about the time of the second advent, sent their armies to invade the land of Israel, where they were nearly all destroyed by mutual slaughter and terrible judgments inflicted, that God might be known in the eyes of the many nations. Ezek. xxxviii. 20, in speaking of the same overthrow at the coming of the Lord, says that those who escape shall be sent to distant nations to declare his glory, Isa. lxvi. 15–19, so that I must conclude that the nations were not all destroyed at the coming of Christ, but some have lived on through the millennium and must have their loyalty tested before the new order of things commences.

Now this thousand years seems to me to be a very important matter. Six times is it mentioned in six plain narrative verses, and although it does not end or limit Christ's reign, it does seem to be a stay or epoch in it during which several things are transpiring.

1. Satan remains bound through the thousand years. v. 2.

2. The nations are protected from his deceptions through it. v. 3.

3. The martyrs reign with Christ during the thousand years. v. 4.

4. The rest of the dead live not till its close. v. 5.

5. It is the Priest-King age of the saints' reign. v. 6.

Rev. v. 10; ii. 26; Luke xix. 17–19; Matt. xix. 28; 1 Tim. vi. 15; 1 Cor. vi. 2, 3.

I am aware that it is objected that the thousand years is a symbolic or indefinite number. I cannot assent to that. I know what a thousand years means in the dictionary and in history, and if it does not mean the same in the Bible, then where is there a name, a number, or a word in the Bible upon whose meaning we can certainly depend. If I, who pretend to believe the Bible, take the liberty to add meanings to its words, or take meanings from them, a thing never done to any other book, do I not occasion and justify the infidel's sneers that the Bible is like an old fiddle upon which one can play any tune they please? And shall I not bring upon myself the judgment written against such offences?

The hope of Messiah's personal reign over the nations, is not a new hope. All will admit that the Jews for several centuries before Christ, expected a Messiah who, reigning on David's throne, would govern all nations. Neither will any one deny that the apostles indulged a similar hope even after Christ had risen and had expounded unto them in all the Scriptures the things concerning Himself, and had talked with them forty days regarding his kingdom. They died without recording a change of hope. Acts xxviii. 20.

It continued the almost unanimous faith of the church for several centuries, says history, and it was not till the disciples of Plato became the teachers of the church that she turned her ear from the hope of the fathers and drank the intoxicating fables of Greece and India.

As I view the darkness, sorrows and sins of this age, it is a consolation to reflect that though man may forget or deny God's "benevolent design" —Eph. i. 9, 10 Baptist—toward his offspring, yet he will not abandon us. Christ will yet descend with all men unto him, he will yet see all the kindreds of the nations worship before him, because he will be their good and just governor among them. During the night wild beasts roar and trample; the nations, the sun will rise and enlighten and bless them. Ps. lxxii. C.

STOCKTON, KAN.

Fellow Restitutionist:

I write to let you know that we are all well and having a pretty good prospect for good crops in Western Kansas. And I also hereby wish to announce that there will be a discussion (the Lord willing) between Benjamin Cobb, Elder of the Christian, or Campbellite church, and Josiah M. Pike, Elder of the Church of God, at Stockton, commencing July 16 and lasting four days. Said debate to be held eleven miles southwest of Stockton in a sod school house, on Lone Creek, and discussing the following propositions, viz:

1. Resolved, That man is wholly unconscious between death and the resurrection.

2. Resolved, That man has a conscious existence between death and the resurrection.

3. Resolved, That the kingdom of God, or of Christ, has not been in existence in this, or the gospel dispensation, but will in the future be set up or established on this earth.

4. Resolved. That the kingdom of God, or of Christ, has been in existence here on earth through this, or the gospel dispensation.

On the first and third propositions, Pike affirms, and Cobb denies; and on the second and fourth, Cobb affirms, and Pike denies. One day to be occupied on each proposition, and four speeches of thirty minutes each to each proposition.

Brethren, pray for us to God through Jesus our Great High Priest, that he will grant me strength and power by his word (which is "Spiric," and sharper than any two-edged sword,) to help me gain the victory, for the Master's sake; and that I may do all to God's glory.

I remain your brother in the one hope. Amen.

JOSIAH M. PIKE.

Report of Quarterly Assembly.

The quarterly assembly, announced to include the fourth Sunday in May, was all that could be expected in this day of small things, for the whole truth. The introductory discourse was delivered by the writer, from Rom. i. after which Brother Steele, from Ohio, who is a workman that needeth not to be ashamed, joined with us in proclaiming the word alternately during the meeting. Brother and Sister Steele with a family of eight cast their lot in with us here, to work for the Master until he comes, or the fall asleep.

On Sunday morning the brethren continued the reading of the same epistle, each in turn, as that is their custom every first day of the week, much to the edification of the assembly. Then before the breaking of the bread, the foundation of the apostles, and prophets, Jesus Christ himself the chief corner stone, upon which the house or church of God is established, was presented in the light of truth, as the only basis of Christian union, and which we showed to be one Abrahamic faith, repentance, and baptism in the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins, whereupon all who were then in the field were invited to separate themselves from the congregation, and participate in the rich memorials of a Savior's love.

While singing one of the sweet songs of Zion, and giving the right hand of fellowship, Sister Young, a married daughter of Brother Steele, also from Ohio, gave public expression of her love and heartfelt gratitude to God for the hope set before us in the gospel of his Son.

Notwithstanding the frequent showers, on account of which we had to hold the meeting in Brother Spaid's house, there was a good attendance who manifested considerable interest, some expressing a desire to unite with us soon, others saying it was the best meeting we ever had in the community. May it be bread cast upon the waters to be gathered many days hence, to the glory of God, and may the dear brethren and sisters there be faithful unto the end, that they may receive a crown of life that fadeth not away, not only on account of their faith in the things of the Kingdom of God and the name of Jesus, but for the sacrifice which they are ever ready to make to prepare for these meetings.

The meeting closed with the understanding that the next be held on the first Sunday in August, at the House of the Brethren, in Winchester, Va.

LITTLE BAPTISM.

A theologian had been a Lutheran, and, of course, was baptized in infancy. He asked the question, "Have you been baptized?" he answered curtly, "Well, is it, that a beetle?" We conceive that the "beetle" fails to answer the end of baptism: for it is neither the sign which the Savior ordained, nor does it set forth the truth which baptism was intended to embody. Between sprinkling and immersion there is a radical difference and if either of the two be right, the other must be wrong. The two ceremonies cannot be optional and equally right, for by no measure of straining can they be made equivalents of the same thing. We have no right to supplant Christ's "much water" by man's "beetle," and he who does so must answer for it to his Lord.—Second and Third.

Notice.

J. S. Hatch, of St. Joseph, Berrien Co., has been appointed State Evangelist for the ensuing year, by the Executive Board of the Church of God in Michigan. Persons wishing his services in that capacity will please address him as above.

HERBERT MILLER, Sec.

Hesdon, Mich. June 19, '82

Notice.

The time for Grove Meetings having arrived, I would inform brethren desiring such and wishing my assistance, that I am ready once more to render it. Brethren in any of the Western or Northwestern states who desire can have a tent meeting by making arrangements soon. I can furnish the tent. Address

J. F. WILCOX,
35 Evergreen Place, Chicago.

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

There will be a three days meeting of the One Faith, if the Lord is willing, at Pleasant Hill school house, in the southeast corner of Montague Co., Tex., four miles south of Forestburg, and thirty miles west of Gainsville, on the Jonsville & Jacksboro road, and one-half mile west of the old conference ground. Meeting to commence Friday evening, July 21, at 4 o'clock. A general invitation is extended to all. Bro. J. S. Lawyer of Missouri is expected to be present.

B. F. HOPKINS.

The Piedmont A. C. C. will hold its fourth annual session with the church at Beaver Creek, N. C., commencing Friday, Aug. 25, and holding over Sunday. Persons traveling by rail will leave the train at Hickory, N. C., and go via Lenoir.

J. J. HUMPHREY.

Book Notices.

THE LIFE EVERLASTING. What is it? whence is it? whose is it? By J. H. Pettingell, A. M., (author of "Hamiltetical Index," "Theological Triflemas," etc.,) with a copious synopsis, in which twenty representative men—clergymen, laymen, professors, doctors, and scholars—of the various churches of Europe and America, unite with the author in giving their own views of the Christian doctrine of the immortality of man. The whole constituting the most thorough and exhaustive discussion of this question now existing—such general inquiry, ever published. Just out of press. 800 pages. Price by mail $2. May be ordered of booksellers generally, or directly of the publisher, J. D. Brown, 606 Minor street, Philadelphia, Pa.

THE RESTITUTION OF ALL THINGS. This attractive volume of 268 pages is written in a clear, vigorous style, by one who is evidently in deep earnest as to the opinions he advances. He believes fully in the personal advent and reign of Christ on the earth; that his feet shall stand again on the very spot of Olivet from which he once ascended, and that the whole land of Palestine shall be restored to more than its primeval glory, becoming one widely extended, rich and flowery plain. The temple shall be rebuilt in untold magnificence for the dwelling-place and worship of Christ, the Jews shall be restored to the promised land, and the whole earth redeemed. The book is a fervid plea, on the ground of Scriptural promise and prophecy, for this grand and final consummation of all things.—The Interior. Price $2. Address, Willett & Co., 5th Beekman st., N. Y. City.

OPENING OF THE SEALED BOOK OF DANIEL. By Castle Churchill, to whom all orders should be addressed, at Churchill post office, Tulare County, Cal. Price 25c.

Soldiers of the Cross Reunion.

It has been decided by the brethren of the One Faith in the South-West to have a Soldier's Reunion at Pringel's Pond, on the Rail Road, eight miles east of Parsons, Kansas, and far from Brother Phillip John, (P. O. Parsons, Kan.) to whom any can write who desire to. Meeting to commence on Friday night, July 21, 1882, and continue over Sunday in camp.

I expect to be there—on my way to Texas—commencing a meeting in Texas 80 miles west of Denniston on the 21st of July, and then through North-Western Texas; I can be addressed at Bethany, Mo.

COMING.

BY CATHERINE M. STEARNS.

"Therefore be ye also ready; for in such an hour as ye think not, the Son of Man cometh."—Matt. xxiv. 44.

He will come, perhaps, at morning,
When to sleepy ear is sweet;
When the active stir, unwearied
By the noonday toil and heat;
When the tear-bedewed eye looks tearless
Up the shining light of life,
And the care-worn is jeaning,
Yearning for some richer strife.

He will come, perhaps, at noontide,
When the pulse of life throbs high,
When the fruits of toil are ripening,
And the harvest time is nigh;
Then, through all the full-ordered splendor
Of the sun's meridian blaze,
There may shine the strange new beauty
Of the Lord's true-figured face.

Or, it may be in the evening—
Gray and somber is the sky,
Shades around the earnest gather,
Fast and dark the shadows lie
When we hope, for rest and shelter
And the tender thoughts of home
Fill the heart with vague, sad yearning,
Then, perhaps, the Lord will come.

If he only finds us ready
In the sweetness happy light,
In the strong and busy noontide,
Or the coming of the night—
If he only finds us waiting,
Listening for his sudden call,
Then his coming, when we think not
Is the sweetest hope of all.

MRS. DAVIS AND HER MISSION.

Leaves from My Journal.

JERUSALEM, April 18.

All is well this morning. Sweet peace rests upon Jerusalem. The air is mild and the birds are singing merrily, as though they expected good news.

Yesterday I went with an Arabic school to a picnic in the field. We had four female teachers and sixty-five pupils; twenty-five of whom were Mohammedans. We arrived at the place about 10 a. m. The children were soon engaged in such sports as we see in America; in fact, I find human nature seeks the same enjoyment here as elsewhere. Our lunch, which was really sumptuous, was provided by the teachers, who were all Arabic. The ground overlooked the Holy City, and as we sat there viewing it, both with delight and sorrow, the mind ran back to scenes of the past, and forward to anticipated scenes of the future. Much of its past history is bloody and dark; its future, except a few more struggles to obtain a final deliverance from its enemies and from sin, is all glorious and bright. What an object for prayer and labor! When Jerusalem is made a praise in the earth, it will be a happy day for the elect.

These children are generally intelligent and extremely well-behaved; quiet, artless, and contented. I was astonished to find so many Mohammedans among them, as the Mohammedan girls have never been allowed to enter these schools till within about two years. I found the girls were delighted to sing in English for my amusement; which they did admirably and heartily. I shall try to give you more of the impressions made upon my mind by the interviews I have with with these people, when I am better able. I returned home much pleased with my trip with the little picnic party.

People generally do not understand, I think, how the German colonies flourish here; for they are very clannish, and no one seems to know they are here. The Arabs say they are mush-ty-h—no good. The improvements which they make are, and will be, a benefit to the country; but I think if they understood how, they might make themselves more beneficial to the inhabitants, and exert a better influence abroad for the regeneration of the country.

Good shoemakers and blacksmiths are greatly needed here. Can't you find men with such trades who would like to labor for the upbuilding of this country? Every blow struck by men of faith will tell. A dentist is also needed here now. I hope the time will soon come when doctors and dentists will be forever dispensed with; but at present they are necessary, especially dentists.

The coming year will evidently bring great events. Watch the signs. The increase of rain and travel, the immigration of Jews and others, are signs of the restitution of this land and city. The restlessness of the nations is ominous of a movement, perhaps a war, at hand. The Eastern Question is not yet settled. Much blood must yet be poured out, before all is quietness and peace forever.

The two sons of the Prince of Wales are now here, and many distinguished people. What is creating the new interest to visit this land? All are asking, "Why is this?" The prophetic student can easily answer the question. The time has come to favor Zion; and the prophet adds: "For thy servants take pleasure in thy stones, and favor the dust thereof." There is an increasing desire to see the place; and if one does nothing more than to visit it, this even has its influence. Some do more than make a flying visit; they come to see the salvation of God. Thus in every way the good work is going on. Mr. Fuller would be surprised to see the improvements which have been made since he was here two years ago. But the visitor of today will probably be much more surprised two years hence.

Mr. Eyd is now on his way to Damascus with a party of travelers. It is just delightful traveling here at this season. I must, however, wait a year or two until the ears will take me. Care reigning in the kingdom of God! What an idea! But this is all the kingdom there is now. Its authority, however, is not yet established; neither has its rule commenced. May it be hastened! We shall want to sing praise to God for redemption, for at least a thousand years, in the commencement of the future glorious reign of Christ.

April 25. My health has been constantly improving since coming to the kind care and good food which I have received from these Americans, who have been unwearying in their labors of love. What should I have done without them? This was the only way to save my life. [These American friends will please accept the hearty thanks of Mrs. Davis' friends in America, for the kindness shown to her in her affliction.]

We have had a glorious rain for the past two days, and the prospect is that more will come. Such rains at this season, I am told, were never known here before. But it is cold; and has been quite chilly for several days. I am obliged to keep a good fire in my room.

An abundance of fruit and vegetables are coming into market, and sold quite cheap. We have had a feast of delicious oranges; and it does seem that such oranges never grew anywhere else but in the Holy Land. We have a great variety of fruit too. The onions have a mild sweet taste, unlike any I have ever tasted before. But the flowers are my fascination; I had never imagined anything so magnificent and gorgeous.

This morning I went, by invitation, to an Arabian wedding. The service was performed in church; after which we all, at-out one hundred, went to the house, where we were served with cake and Jerusalem wine. In the court, men were dancing, firing guns, and demonstrating their joy by all sorts of sports. All seemed happy except the poor bride, who was afraid to look about her, and seemed frightened at finding herself in this new and strange position. The bridegroom, however, smoked his cigarette as coolly as you please. Altogether it was quite a pleasant affair.

I was surprised to read of the death of Mr. Longfellow, so soon after the happy congratulations on his birthday. It reminded me of the pleasant interview I had with him about one year ago, when I received his kind letter of introduction to Mr. Lowell, the American Consul in London. The good men are passing away. But God lives; and Christ has risen from the grave; and those who sleep in him will soon come forth from their dusty beds also.

The news from every quarter fills the predictions based upon the perihelia of the planets very well, I think. God is evidently shaking this accursed world, and if he does not shake us off with the scum, we shall be fortunate. There are plenty of caves here to hide in, should we, like David, ever be brought into such straits as to need them. But getting into strait places puts us into conditions where we can pray; and unceasing prayer will yet be offered day and night for deliverance. But if we are fearful enough to keep out of the afflictions which often come upon the righteous, we shall not feel like praying fervently day and night. Praying to ease our own consciences, trying to make ourselves, our neighbors and God also, believe that we are pious and doing our duty, is not always evidence that we are pious, or doing right. Let us get into the work and Christ will see us through, even though it be by suffering and prayer.

Yesterday I walked on the wall. There is a good street on the inside of the wall, covered with flowers. And there are many tower-rooms and gardens, on the wall, filled with grass and flowers which belong to nobody in particular. I love to walk there, and the view from many points is grand indeed.

Kerosene from America is much used here. Each family has two and three beautiful hanging lamps in the house. Thus America is furnishing more than one kind of light for the land which is to become the glory of all lands, and the city which is to arise and shine for the whole world.

We now have plenty of new potatoes in the market. They are good, as is almost everything that grows here; and still, there can and will be an improvement even in the growth of grains and vegetables and fruit. Passing through so many deep trials makes me almost feel as though I had lived here all my days. The singing of the frogs even sounds natural. They sing me to sleep, just as they did when I was a child in the State of Maine. Everything has a new look to me, instead of old.

Let us pray for the Spirit to be poured out upon this city and land from on high. Read Isa. xxxii. 13-15.

"Upon the land of my people shall come up thorns and briers; yea, upon all the houses of joy in the joyous city, because the palaces shall be forsaken; the multitude of the city shall be left; the forts and towers shall be for dens forever, a joy of wild asses, a pasture of flocks; until the spirit be poured upon us from on high, and the wilderness be a fruitful field, and the fruitful field be counted for a forest. Then judgment shall dwell in the wilderness, and righteousness remain in the fruitful field. And the work of righteousness shall be peace; and the effect of righteousness quietness and assurance for ever. And my people shall dwell in a peaceable habitation, and in sure dwellings, and in quiet resting places."

From The Bible Standard.

THE CHURCH OF CHRIST: ITS PRESENT MISSION AND FUTURE DESTINY.

The dispensational dealings of God with our race have been but little studied by either the world or the Church. Men professing to believe in the One Supreme Ruler have had some idea of his throne in heaven and his kingdom-rule over all creatures and things; but how that rule is carried out, what are the great eternal principles on which it proceeds, the large portion of the world does not stay to enquire.

Then when we come to the Church, or those professing to compose it, how many of God's real children care to enquire as to its nature and constitution, what is its mission here on earth, and what its glorious and eternal destiny? the larger number content themselves with the hope that they are saved, and that their ransomed souls will go to heaven when they die, and they leave the rest to the course of events, believing that it is God's design to use the Church as an instrumentality by which the world at some future time will be converted to Christianity. The glorious Advent of Christ, his millennial kingdom and reign, Israel's restoration and conversion, and the revealed glorious future, both of the Church and the world, enter not into their conceptions.

Now it is quite true that "Secret things belong unto God, but those he has revealed to us and to our children." We are privileged to know some of the thoughts of God on his "plan of the ages" and the varied dispensations he has given and will yet grant to this world of ours, the importance of this dispensational truth is very great. It is one of the keys that opens out the Scriptures. The mariner would fail to navigate the trackless deep without his lines of latitude and longitude. The geographer must have his countries and counties to classify his towns and villages, and thus give direction by which others can find them; and thus the eternal God has made his broad line of the ages, and dotted line of the dispensations. Reference to the past will prove the truth of this; there was the age before the flood, divided into two dispensations, Eden and Adam, and then that which followed and ended in the flood. Next follows Noah and with him a new age, a fresh start for the race. We come down to Abraham and the Patriarchs, the time of covenants and glorious promises of future blessing. Then comes the Theocracy and Moses, the giving of the law—Israel—the prophets—this continued until John, who forms a connecting link between the old and new dispensations; the Christian began with its divine founder, Jesus the Christ; and the Church, which is his body, on the day of Pentecost. Our present enquiry is, What is the church? Is it simply a term of speech? an ecclesiastical term? a material structure? now our only decisive answer to this enquiry, must be the Word of God, he whose the Church is, can alone authoritatively tell us what it is. Our English word Church, comes from the Greek word ecclesia which means an assembly called out, in this sense it is applied to the excited mob at Ephesus. Acts xix. 39, 41. It is also used in the Jewish sense of a congregation met for war or in the synagogue as a religious body. "The church in the wilderness" is the assembly congregation of Israel. "In the midst of the church, or assembly will I give praise unto thee." In the general meaning of the term it refers to an assembly called out for any purpose whatever. But in its New Testament sense it stands associated with Jesus Christ, and signifies the assembly of believers in him, whether male or female. It was thus that Christ spoke of it to Peter: "Upon this rock will I build my church and the gates of hades shall not prevail against it." Note this was in the future tense, not I have built, for the Church of Christ only came into existence after his death, resurrection and ascension. It dates from the day of Pentecost, when the Divine Spirit descended on the assembly gathered in Christ's name in that upper room at Jerusalem, then and there they received that promised baptism of the Holy Spirit, and were thereby incorporated into the body of Christ, and from that day to this, the Lord adds to the Church the saved ones. The purpose to gather the Church existed in the mind of God from eternity, but was not revealed to the Old Testament saints as prophecy was not made known but to Paul, as we learn from Eph. iii. 1, 5, 9, 11.

How glorious this revelation of Divine love! how sublime this Divine conception! and how certainly will Jehovah carry it out! This statement clearly shows that Judaism as such is no part of the Church of Christ. Israel were the people of God, and all Israel will be saved as God's earthly people, God's saints have lived in all ages of the world, but his Church is a new thing in the earth, perfectly unique—coming into existence in the parenthesis of the plan of the ages, it is that upon which the mind of God has been set from eternity; the grand monumental pillar, from which the angels and principalities of the heavens may study and read his manifold wisdom, grace and love; it is that which he has loved and given himself for. "It is the Church which is his body, the fulness of him that filleth all in all." Eph. i. 22, 23. The Church is thus a sacred thing in the sight of God, it is really a part of God's dear Son, whom Paul describes thus, Col. i. 15-18. The Church of Christ is now being gathered by the Holy Spirit out of all nations who lose their nationality, by this union with Christ into one body. "Where there is neither Greek nor Jew, circumcision nor uncircumcision, Barbarian, Scythian, bond nor free: but Christ is all, and in all." The great truth made so prominent in the New Testament is the believers' union with Christ. "If any man be in Christ, he is a new creature." "I am the vine ye are the branches." This is a figure, but the idea is unity, oneness; the branches can only live by the life that is in the root and stem of the vine—such is Christ and his Church; Christ alone is the life of his members, hence it is called his body, and how fully is this sustained, see Rom. xii. 4, 5; again, 1 Cor. v. 12; how we have become thus united is clearly stated in the next verse; now from these statements it is clear, the Church of Christ is his one body, of which he is the living and life-giving head—consisting of many members, but they are members one of another, "Now ye are the body of Christ, and members in particular." Our union now is of grace through faith, but we are thus united wherever we dwell, by whatever name designated among men, all those who are his gather round the one centre, Christ, and are inlwelt and sealed by that one Holy Spirit. Eph. iv. 4-6.

There is another representation of the Church we dare not pass over, it is the Bride of Christ, the Lamb's wife. Eph. v. 23-32. No union can be more sacred than that God instituted between Adam and Eve. husband and wife, the bride takes her husband's name, so the Church, see 1 Cor. xii. 12., she shares his love, station, sorrow, wealth, is his companion, they are no more two but one flesh, all this honor and glory is in store for the bride elect of Christ; the marriage of the Lamb will surely come, but what is our present character? is it as a chaste virgin, we are to be presented to Christ; shall we join with the State? go in for the honors, and help of the world? or humbly live and walk by faith till our Friend and Bridegroom appears? Now from this it is clear, the Church of Christ is no building of mere costly material; the Jews had their temple, and Christians now are proud of what they call their chapels and churches; but Bible Christianity knows nothing of abbeys or cathedrals, churches or chapels as in any way constituting the Church of Christ; our Divine Lord taught in the temple, as his Father's house, where he symbolically as the Shekinah dwelt among them till their rejection—but Peter's boat, the mountain side, the sea shore, were where the people gathered to listen to the great Teacher; the Son of God has consecrated the whole earth or any part of it, "Wherever two or three are gathered together in his name, there is he in the midst." We sometimes hear the Church of Christ spoken of as the invisible Church, now I think this is a mistake, except as it applies to the fury of state persecutions, when some of the members of his body were not to meet within five miles of any English town under peril of pillory, prison or death—the moors of Scotland have borne witness that this Church is not invisible, the Alpine heights of Switzerland, the Catacombs of Rome, say what part of Christendom, but more or less has been drunk with the blood of the saints, but this body of his, the Church, is after all, earth's light, earth's salt; the city set upon a hill that cannot be hid, her very speech betrayeth her; yet in these dark apostate closing days of Christendom, where can this Church in anything like a corporate body be found? In this respect it is indeed invisible, neither the Romish or Greek can lay claim to be the body of Christ; Episcopacy equally fails, and the entire legion of sects Established and Dissenting, cannot claim the honor. What then, has the Church of Christ proved a failure? As an organization it has, but not as the members of the body of Christ, for the foundation of God standeth sure; having this seal, the Lord knoweth them, who are his, and out of Rome, with all its rubbish, the Great Searcher with his lighted candle may find some precious pieces of silver bearing the image and superscription of the Divine Redeemer; Episcopacy with its lordly bishops, its acts of parliament, and state treasury, we know shelters many of the true disciples of him, who, when on earth had not where to lay his head; and among our despised nonconformists and dissenters are many of the members of his body, but our God will not pander to any of earth's titles, the Church is his (Christ's) body and bride, and consist of the called and chosen ones, "for if any man hath not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his." In vain do Christian brethren try to make that straight which is crooked, or build that which the Great Architect has cast aside, it is just what the Master said it would be, "Ye shall be hated of all men for my Name's sake," but "not him that hath an ear, hear what he saith to the churches."

Let us now glance at the present mission of the Church. What say you, has this despised, outcast, nameless body, a mission? Yes, brethren, it has, and one of vast importance; the future ages will show this. Let us notice, earth is the sphere or place where the Church is gathered; all who compose it were of Adam's ruined doomed race, not angels but redeemed from amidst men, and have become by faith the children of God.

It may be well just to note some few things that are not included in the mission of the Church, seeing that we are not a legislative, but only an executive assembly, we have no right to alter orders or institutions, but to keep them as Christ has given them, till he come. We cannot make either ministers or churches, any more than we can create worlds. "Ye are my friends if ye do whatsoever I command you."

Another fond ambition that must perish, is that our mission is to convert the world. Nowhere has this command been given to us, or the promise made, that the effort would be successful. Christ did tell us, "And this gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the world for a witness unto all nations; and then shall the end come." Our true mission is a very humble one; it is to testify to the riches of Divine Grace, and show forth the praises of him who has brought us out of darkness into his marvellous light, to be like Christ we are to "keep the testimony of Jesus" to "contend earnestly for the faith once for all delivered to the saints," but the servants of the Lord must not engage in strife, but be patient, meek, apt to teach; ours is the heroism of suffering. Meek under injuries, patient under wrong, firm and loyal to Christ, should we die at our post. Yet there is dignity and glory in this message, "As my Father sent me," said Jesus, "so send I you." In this service may be won the princedoms and dignities and glories of the kingdom, the smile of Jesus, the "well done" of the Master's good and faithful servant enter into the joy of thy Lord. O, brethren, as he is, so are we in this world. "If we suffer with him, we shall also reign." Our mission is patiently to wait, occupy, watch, and hope for him from heaven.

And now very briefly, the Future Destiny, and with very many it has been to fall asleep, die, be under the dominion of death in the grave, but it is in the hope of eternal life which God, who cannot lie, promised us before the ages began; do not shrink, it is only like our Head; he died and laid in the grave, a lifeless corpse, and we are to be conformable to his death; but they shall rise again. He who is the resurrection and the life declares, I will raise him up at the last day; of all thou hast given me I have lost none.

Our glorious destiny is to be like him, in the body of his glory; our life now is hid with him in God, but when he who is our life shall appear with him in glory; as the betrothed Bride; the marriage of the Lamb shall take place, and his despised Church shall then be presented to him a glorious church, not having spot or wrinkle or any such thing, but holy and without blemish. Her destiny is to sit with him on his throne, share in his glory, as now she bears his reproach; it is to be for ever with the Lord. To have lavished upon her his love through the age of the ages; it is to come with him as his own when he descends with the glory of his Father and the holy angels; to be acknowledged as his Royal Bride, when the hallelujahs of earth and heaven mingle with the jubilant shout, "The Lord God Omnipotent reigneth." Amen.—Rev. Thos. Varey.

"This Name Jesus."

BY FRANCES R. HAVERGAL.

This sacred Jesus! Oh, how sweetly
Fall those words upon the ear!
Like a swell of far-off music,
In the night-watch still and drear.

He who healed the leprous leper,
He who dried the widow's tear;
He who changed to health and gladness
Helpless, suffering, trembling fear;

He who wandered poor and homeless,
By the stormy Galilee;
He who, on the night-veiled mountain,
Bent in prayer the wearied knee;

He who gently called the weary,
"Come and I will give you rest!"
He who loved the little children,
Took them in his arms and blessed;

"This same Jesus!" When the all-lots
Of that last and awful day
Bursts upon the penitent spirit,
Like a midnight lightning ray;

Then we lift our hearts adoring:
"This same Jesus," owned and known—
Him, our own most gracious Savior—
Seated on the great white throne.

For this word, O Lord, we bless thee;
Bless our Master's evangelic name:
Yesterday, today, forever,
Jesus Christ is still the same.

"His Name Is Papa."

A lady in the street met a little girl between two and three years old, evidently lost, and crying bitterly. The lady took the child's hand, and asked where she was going.

"To find my papa," was the sobbing reply.

"What is papa's name?" asked the lady.

"His name is papa."

"But what is his other name? What does your mamma call him?"

"She calls him papa," persisted the little creature.

The lady then tried to lead her along, saying, "You had better come with me. I think you came this way."

"Yes; but I don't want to go back; I want to find my papa," replied the little girl, crying afresh, as if her heart would break.

"What do you want of your papa," asked the lady.

"I want to kiss him."

Just at this time a sister of the child, who had been searching for her, came along and took possession of the little runaway. From inquiry, it appeared that the little one's papa, whom she was so earnestly seeking, had recently died, and she, tired of waiting for him to come home, had gone out to find him.

The Home of the Horse.

There is no doubt that the original home of the horse is not Europe, but Central Asia; for, since the horse in its natural state depends upon grass for its nourishment and fleetness for its weapon, it could not in the beginning have thriven and multiplied in the thick forest-grown territory of Europe. Much rather should its place of propagation be sought in those steppes where it still roams about in a wild state. Here, too, arose the first nations of riders of which we have historic knowledge, the Mongolians and the Turks, whose existence even to this day is as it were combined to that of the horse. From these regions the horse spread in all directions, especially into the steppes of Southern and Southeastern Russia and into Thrace, until it finally found entrance into the other parts of Europe, but not until after the immigration of the people. This assumption is, at least, strongly favored by the fact that the farther a district of Europe is from those Asiatic steppes, i. e., from the original home of the horse, the later does the tamed horse seem to have made its historic appearance in it. The supposition is further confirmed by the fact that horse-raising among almost every tribe appears as an art derived from neighboring tribes in the East or Northeast. Even in Homer the ox appears exclusively as the draught animal in land operations at home and in the field, while the horse was used for purposes of war only. Its employment in military operations was determined by swiftness alone. That the value of the horse must originally have depended upon its fleetness, can easily be inferred from the name which is repeated in all the branches of the Indo-European language, and signifies nearly "hastening," "quick." The same fact is exemplified by the descriptions of the oldest poets, who, next to its courage, speak most of its swiftness.—Popular Science Monthly.

"There Is a Boy I Can Trust."

I once visited a public school. At recess a little fellow came up and spoke to the teacher. As he turned to go down the platform the master said, "This is a boy I can trust; he never failed me." I followed him with my eye, and looked at him when he took his seat at recess. He had a fine open, manly face. I thought a good deal of the master's remark. What a character had that boy earned! He had gotten what would be worth more to him than a fortune. It would be a passport into the best firm in the city, and, what is better, into the confidence and respect of the whole community. I wonder if the boys know how soon they are rated by other people? Every boy in the neighborhood is known, and opinions are formed of him: he has a character either favorable or unfavorable. A boy of whom the master can say, "I can trust him; he never failed me," will never want employment. The fidelity, promptness and industry which he shows at school are in demand everywhere and prized everywhere. He who is faithful in little will be faithful in much.—Boys of Hope Review.

Talks With Young People—Earnestness.

The great want of the times is earnest and active young men and women. The great majority of young people seem to be indifferent and apathetic in regard to everything but pleasure-seeking and self-gratification. An earnest and active young man is rarely out of a situation, and business men like to have those about them who are earnest and zealous in the performance of their duties—no matter how trivial their nature may be.

I know a merchant who has amassed great wealth, and he commenced without means. His peculiar characteristic has always been intense earnestness in his business life and in his conversation with every one, no matter how humble their station in life or position in business. He would be as earnest and attentive in talking with a porter, as he was in conversation with a partner, and his whole attention seemed to be absorbed in whatever he was engaged in.

In waiting upon customers he seemed to be anxious and willing to put himself out in order to accommodate and please those who bought in small, as well as those who purchased in large quantities. His interest in the interests of those who were in conversation with him, was greater than I have ever seen manifested by any one I ever knew. The result of his earnestness and zeal in looking after all business interests was that he grew to be very popular, and he retired from business before he was fifty years old with a large fortune.

One of the greatest hindrances to my earnestness and zeal has been the influence of novel-reading in making me visionary and apathetic in regard to life's duties, requirements, and responsibilities. I used to fill my mind with useless and false impressions as to what society and the world would do for me, and I took as my standard of thought and action the kind of character that was, but the creation of some sensational romance-writer. If I had not stopped novel-reading before I was twenty-one years old, I would have been unfitted for giving the earnest attention to life's realities that is so very necessary to achieve any success whatever.

No clerk whose mind is absorbed in the intricate plot of a romance is fit to give attention to business or mechanical employment in this age of earnestness and intense activity in commercial life.

I never knew of the merchant, to whom I referred above, ever giving utterance to idle jokes or levity during business hours. His whole time and attention while in the store seemed to be absorbed in his business duties, and he never seemed to have any time to spare for foolish jesting.

When I see the boys or girls earnest and attentive, I consider that they have material in them that will make their influence felt in business and social life; but when I see a listless, dreamy, and apathetic young person, I set him down as almost sure to become helpless, useless, and dependent upon the labors of others for support in life.

"THE RESTITUTION OF ALL THINGS WHICH GOD HATH SPOKEN BY THE MOUTH OF ALL HIS HOLY PROPHETS SINCE THE WORLD BEGAN."

VOL. XXXI. PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, JULY 5, 1882. NO. 25.

THE RESTITUTION.

TERMS—TWO DOLLARS PER YEAR, Payable in advance. Three and Six Months at the same rate.

Address all Letters and Communications to THE RESTITUTION, Plymouth, Indiana.

TO CORRESPONDENTS:

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

IMPORTANT TRUTHS FOR THE CONSIDERATION OF THE BRETHREN.

Often has it been a matter of surprise to me and at times a matter of astonishment in perusing the writings of men, as also in my daily and constant associations with them, that they while professing to be followers of Jesus, and having a thorough knowledge of the word of God; and who are for ever making known the fact that they will have a seat with the Lord Jesus Christ on his throne; should by their own self assurance and vanity stumble. Certain it is that they are either wilfully ignorant, or else they ignore certain important and well defined conditions conspicuous in God's word, the strict observance of which, with faith in Jesus Christ, will be the only means of obtaining a seat with him on his throne.

The strict compliance to these conditions by the humble Christian can alone secure the grand victory. These conditions are plainly and definitely set forth in Matt. v., vi., viii. Yet it is a sad but undeniable fact but few are to be found amongst the professing brethren, who endeavor strictly, and conscientiously to shape their lives and live in accord with the covenants there laid down—and some there are who appropriate and divide between themselves and the Lord the honors of his coming, and who actually at the same time have the audacity to assert that it is an impossibility to live in accordance with the commands of our Lord as set forth in that remarkable sermon.

Now dear readers, is it reasonable or possible that the thought should be entertained for a moment, that the Almighty Father who is the embodiment of justice, mercy, and love, could permit men to live and reign with the Lord Jesus Christ, and assist him in ruling the nations and making them to do, not only what they—the self-appointed rulers—failed to do, but according to their own version declare an impossibility i. e. absolute obedience to each and every commandment of the Lord Jesus Christ.

Kind readers, where is the consistency of such men? Does not St. Paul administer to all such persons this stinging rebuke? "O foolish Galatians, who hath bewitched you, that ye should not obey the truth, before whose eyes Jesus Christ hath been evidently set forth, crucified among you?" Gal. iii. 1. Speaking for myself—and knowing my own unworthiness—I can only say that if I am permitted to enter heaven at all, I shall have reason to glorify God in Christ Jesus.

Now my object in writing this is to demonstrate the fact, that a perfectly pure and holy life is not only possible but is absolutely essential to the believer, and not only in obtaining the incorruptible crown, but also obtaining a correct knowledge of the deep and hidden wisdom of God concerning the future of this world. This wisdom is called a "mystery," which none but the humble, prayerful child of God—who being indwelt by the Holy Ghost—is able to penetrate. And such this mystery will continue to be to the majority of mankind until the Lord Jesus Christ takes to himself the kingdom, when this mystery will be clear as the noonday sun. See Rev. x. 7; xi. 15–19; vi. 12, 17.

Now a part of this "mystery" clearly teaches that during the millennium the world will be ruled over by a body of divine men (of "just men made perfect") who are lively (or living stones)—1 Peter ii. 5—are being now sought out and made ready during this present period, known as the "Age of Grace." Everyday life shows us that each of these stones is being prepared by the Spirit of God, who fashions, polishes, and passes them through the fiery furnace of affliction—to test, to purify and by such means make them like unto their pattern the Lord Jesus Christ; who is not only their Grand Model, but also their foundation. Upon this foundation each stone will be built and blended together in one harmonious whole: each one that passes the fiery trial is made like unto pure gold, and is stamped with the "seal" of God's approval.

When the completed number of stones required in the construction of this Divine building is prepared—which will accord with the closing of the Age of Grace—the Lord Jesus Christ who is the "Alpha and Omega" will immediately crown the sublime structure with his own person, being the "Cap" or "Chief Corner Stone" and after this will commence the events recorded in Rev. xix. 11. The prophet Daniel alludes to this Kingdom as the "stone kingdom." Dan. ii. 34, 35. And if we consider the means i. e. material, made use of in this divine building or government, we become amazed at the wonderful display of wisdom, justice, mercy, and love, of our God, who being no respecter of persons, has so arranged it's construction, that whosoever will may come" and become part of the holy company of priest-kings, providing they will and do comply with the conditions previously alluded to. To those therefore, who being perfectly obedient to all the commands set forth in the Sermon on the Mount, to all such the language of our Savior can be applied, viz., "the kingdom of God dwells within you." and although now invisible, it will hereafter be manifested in the sons of God at the appearing of our Lord Jesus Christ. Rom. viii. 19.

And now I would ask, Why, our Savior should lay such exacting terms on all who seek the kingdom of God? I answer, the reason is plain; it is God's just and righteous way of preparing men to rule others; i. e. that first they should learn self-government, nay more, the conditions are such that a man to comply with them must rule himself with a rod of iron. Part of our Savior's mission was to "preach the gospel of the kingdom of God"—Mark i. 14; Matt. iv. 23—in which these conditions are embodied, which he not only fulfilled, but also by his life, and death on the cross, set us an example, showing the necessity of absolute submission to the doctrine he taught. See Matt. viii. 21–39.

I am desirous to make these facts plain; to the end that all may not only see the necessity, but also see reflected in these very conditions, the infinite wisdom, justice, and love of God, who having ordained the Lord Jesus Christ to be the judge of all mankind, first sent him into the world in the likeness of sinful flesh, to the end that being made in all respects like unto ourselves, he would necessarily be better able to feel and bear in his own body, the infirmities, weaknesses and ills to which all flesh is heir. Therefore we have at the right hand of God, a friend, an Mediator and Intercessor, who having himself borne our infirmities, and carried our sorrows, can and does sympathize with us, and who stretches forth his hands inviting all, "whosoever will" to come to him, and be raised up and through him be presented to the Father.

There were several divine purposes embraced in our Lord's mission, each purpose or part bearing special relation, and pointing to others hereafter to be enacted by him during the millennium; and yet in the contemplation of each, we find such beautiful blending of one part with another and such perfect harmony uniting all into the one grand scheme of redemption, that we involuntarily exclaim, "This is the work of God." We see in the Lord Christ, the most perfect man who ever existed on earth; in his conversation, his deeds and his life, we see the reflection of God; in very truth he was indeed a living temple in which the Spirit of the eternal God dwelt, that even those who only touched "the hem of his garment" were made whole. Mark vi. 56.

Now if we would be like him we must follow in his footsteps, we must conquer self, and endeavor to obtain a little of that divine spirit, with which he was filled. To become perfect, we must render implicit obedience to the grand truths he taught, which I have already affirmed to be not only possible but essential, for when once a man has made up his mind, and set his face determining with God's help to succeed, the victory is already half won.

And the sooner we look these facts in the face like men, the better it will be for each and every one of us, and bearing in mind that our Lord says: "' every one that saith unto me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven; but he that doeth the will of my Father which is in heaven." Matt. vii. 21. "Therefore whoso heareth these sayings of mine, and doeth them, I will liken him unto a wise man, who built his house upon a rock." "And every one who heareth these sayings of mine, and doeth them not, shall be likened unto a foolish man who built his house upon the sand," etc. Matt. vii. 24–29. And again, "Be ye therefore perfect even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect." Matt. v. 48. Compliance with such exacting conditions demands self-sacrifice, and at times much personal inconvenience, but this is essential to self-government; and when we realize the grand object to be obtained, the means of attainment dwindle into comparative insignificance. Paul says, "For our present suffering which is but for a moment worketh for us a much more exceeding and eternal weight of glory."

The true man of God is ever a gentleman—one of God's gentlemen—and may readily be identified as such—not owing to his protestations of the fact—but by his conversation, his deeds, his life; these are the correct tests; he is one perhaps knowing but little which will enhance the good reputation of his neighbor, prefers rather to remain silent, than to imply by word or deed anything which would lower that neighbor in the estimation of his fellow men. He is one who never permits passion to usurp the place of reason, who always retains a cool demeanor, even under the most exasperating circumstances, no, not even though he be struck, for why should he, who bearing the name of Christ degrade and sink himself to the level of a brute? He is one who is governed in his associations with the opposite sex, treating them with the same kindness, and courtesy that exists between brother and sister. He is one who only values money for the good he can do with it, by helping his fellow men and spreading God's truths, believing it to be God's goodness if he should be endowed with little of this world's goods, thereby making it easier to comply with his Lord's commands, for having but little he is perfectly willing to share that little with his fellow men; whereas it can be easily seen how much more difficult it is for a rich man to comply with the command which says: "If thou wilt be perfect go and sell that thou hast, and give it to the poor." Matt. xix. 21.

I think the truth of our Lord's words has been pretty well established during the last eighteen hundred years; rich men will not be obedient to the doctrines, hence our Savior's words, "It is easier for a camel to go through a needle's eye, than for a rich man to enter the kingdom of God." Mark x. 25. Dear reader, here at least ought to be conclusive proof that nothing will do short of unconditional surrender, for to such only, can the language in Rev. iii. 21 be addressed: "To him that overcometh (all things) will I grant to sit with me in my throne, even as I also overcame and am set down with my Father in his throne." Again, the man of God is one whose services, talents, and even life itself, are at the disposal of that Being whom having not seen yet he loves.

The child of God is one
Who following in the footsteps of the Lord,
In whose Almighty strength he is renewed day by day
Being made a conqueror,
Beneath whose feet is crushed again
That cunning, and malicious thing—the serpent
Which if not crushed may gain admission to the breast,
And with malignant and Satanic hate,
Entwine, and coil itself about the heart,
Making him in time the slave of Lust.

'Tis strange, yet nevertheless 'tis true, that man
Who has no love for Christ, and his grand truths,
Invariably carries in his breast concealed from view
This creeping loathsome thing,
Petting, pampering, and caressing
As though 'twere his best, his truest friend,
Refusing to part company, even in the dark mysterious night,
When overcome with worldly strife, and turmoil
He seeks that rest which cannot rend a guilty troubled conscience.

'Tis strange, but nevertheless 'tis true, the child of God
Carries in his breast concealed from view
The Spirit of the living God,
Which like a white and spotless dove of purity,
Dwells ever in the secret chambers of that place
Consecrated as a Temple to the Eternal God—His heart.

H. B.

Do not wade far out into the dangerous sea of this world's comfort. Take the good that God provides you, but say of it, "It passeth away, for indeed it is but a temporary supply for a temporary need." Never suffer your goods to become your God.—Spurgeon.

"HOLD FAST TILL I COME."

So spoke the Spirit by the mouth of Jesus, and those divinely inspired precepts are as equally applicable to individual Christians, in the present day, as they were 1800 years ago.

"To him that overcometh, says the messenger to the churches. . . . . I will give power over the nations," and adds a little further on, "they shall sit down with me on my throne, even as I also overcame, and am set down with my Father on his throne."

To the overcomer alone therefore, are these promises given, and any believing and intelligent reader of Scripture, who can see that from all ages, from creation down to the present time the word of the Lord never returned to him void, will also be able to realize the true value of those precious promises in the present perilous times. Still we all have some dark hours, hours of weariness, doubt, humiliation and suffering, when the eye of faith is dim, when we are ready to sink down by the wayside of life, and exclaim with poor, perverse, faithless Jonah, "O Lord, take I beseech thee my life from me, for it is better for me to die than to live." Thanks be to God that in his infinite mercy he will not grant such a prayer as that, knowing that some time in the longed for future we shall be able to look back and say, "He hath done all things well," and at this time spares us awhile to rise up and fight the battle of life again.

Life is hard during this present age, none can wholly deny that; we see around us the wicked flourishing like a green bay tree, while many of God's dear people can only maintain life by a struggle from day to day. Palaces and trenchery hold high places in the land, while truth and uprightness cry for daily bread. Noble and kindly hearts unappreciated and neglected are tossed hither and thither in storms of sorrow and despair, while the vain, the worldly and the narrow minded float gaily along the silvery tide of fortune, basking in the smiles of many friends. We see death, that fell destroyer, snatching from some loving arms one in whom life's hopes and joys are bound up, leaving the aching heart aching and empty for ever.

In many a brave and suffering heart are daily battles fought and won, greater than the greatest victory in the blood-stained annals of this world's history: yet we live on, hiding our sufferings from every eye, but the eye of the Great Sympathizer—following out our daily round of duties, sustained by the power and grace of God. Fail we cannot while underneath are those everlasting arms, forgotten we cannot be while our Father cares for the lillies of the field and the birds of the air, forsaken never, while our Father says, "I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee."

Lift up your heads then little flock while the storms are gathering on all the world around you, rejoice and sing praises for your redemption draweth nigh—the Lord is at hand even at the door; ye who have suffered with Christ shall also reign with him, when he shall return in power and great majesty to gather his elect from the four winds, from one end of the heaven to the other, when together with Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, with patriarchs and prophets, with saints and martyrs of all ages, we shall enter through the gates into the city, and be called to sit down at the marriage supper of the Lamb.

JANET CARLYLE.

The "Explanation" Explained.

Fraternally and with a sole regard to God's truth in the premises, a few words further may be essential to the right apprehension of the Lord's coming—its bearing on the world and related topics of Revelation.

1. We all know, that "the voice in the wilderness" (Isa. xl.) was "John the Baptist"—personified and heard and known as the harbinger of the first advent of Jesus, the Messiah. Matt. iii. 3; Mark i. 1–11; Luke iii. 1–17. "John answered; I am the voice of one crying in the wilderness," etc. John i. 23–34. This, with its antecedents, and consonitants, constituted "the beginning of the gospel of Jesus Christ, the Son of God." The voice was to those who were most concerned, to hear. "When all the people were baptized—Jesus also being baptized; the heaven was opened . and a voice from heaven said, Thou art my beloved Son—in whom I am well pleased." Luke iii. 21, 22.

2. These things did not occur "in a corner;" hence the second coming should be heralded as revealed. When "the shout of war"—(keleusmati), "the trump of God." (as at Sinai) and the world-wide relations of Jesus' kingly coming, are united with "the voice of the archangel." Does it denote stealth and silence? No, no! Surely this cumulative sentence—composed of the strongest terms known to language—and confirmed by the profoundest facts of the past—can not be hushed down. An impression from other sources may remain unchanged as such; and taken only at its value. Faith rests only in the word.

3. Elijah's translation was not foretold, as in this case, to all who read the prophets. But yet it was known abundantly; by it its antecedents; by his absence; by Elijah's endowments and miracles that confirmed his testimony to the facts; by the action of the young prophets and by all this having been "written for (Israel's and) our learning."

On the other hand "the seventh trumpet—the resurrection of the just"—their consonitants and bearing on the Messiah's kingdom, and the world's destiny—all forbid that we suppress their revelation—especially on the ground of Elijah's personal translation, in diverse circumstances.

But I forbear, though "the half" is yet untold. "Buy the truth and sell it not." John xvii. 17.

With kindest regards.

ORIENTAL SKETCHES.—No. 20.

Bashan and Its Giant Cities.

J. L. PORTER, A. M.

ARGOB.

From Suweideh I rode north-west across the noble plain of Bashan, passing in succession the villages of Welgha, Rimeh, Mezrauh, and Sijan, and seeing many others away on the right and left. Most of them contain a few families of Druses; but not one-tenth of the habitable houses in them are inhabited. These houses are in every respect similar to those in the mountains. I was now approaching the remarkable province of Lejah, the ancient Argob, properly so called. A four hours' ride brought me to Nejran, whose massive black walls and heavy square towers rise up lonely and desolate from the midst of a wilderness of rocks. The town has still a comparatively large population; that is, there are probably a hundred families settled in the old houses, which cover a space more than two miles in circumference. It contains a number of public buildings, the largest of which is a church, dedicated, as a Greek inscription informs us, in the year A. D. 564.

Nejran stands just within the southern border of the Lejah. Around the city, and far as I could see westward and northward, was one vast wilderness of rocks;—here piled up in shapeless, jagged masses; there spread out in flat, rugged fields, intersected by yawning fissures and chasms. The Bible name of the province, Argob,* "the Stony," is strikingly descriptive of its physical features. I made a vigorous effort to penetrate to the interior of the Lejah, in order to visit those strange old cities which I saw in the distance from the towers of Nejran, and of which I had heard so much; but no one would undertake to guide me, and the Druses absolutely refused to be responsible for my safety should I make the attempt. The Lejah, in fact, is the sanctuary, the great natural stronghold of the people. When fleeing from the Bedawin, and when in rebellion against the government, they find themselves perfectly safe in its rocky recesses. They are consequently jealous of all strangers, and they will not under any ordinary circumstances, guide travellers through its intricate and secret passes. Argob, Trachonitis, or Lejah,—for by each name has it been successively called—has been an asylum for all malefactors and refugees ever since the time when Absalom fled to it after the murder of his brother.

Being prevented from passing through the centre of Lejah, we turned westward to Edrei, hoping to be more fortunate in obtaining guides there. The path along which we were led was intricate, difficult, and in places even dangerous. We had often to scramble over smooth ledges of basalt, where our horses could scarcely keep their feet; and these were separated by deep fissures and chasms, here and there half filled with muddy water. A stranger would have sought in vain for the road, if road it can be called. In half an hour we reached the plain; and then continued to ride along the side of the Lejah, whose boundary resembles the rugged line of broken cliffs which gird a great part of the eastern coast of England. The Hebrew name given to it in the Bible is most appropriate, and shows how observant the sacred writers were. The word is Chebel, signifying literally "a rope," but which describes with singular accuracy the remarkably defined boundary line which encircles the whole province like a rocky shore.

We passed in succession the deserted towns of Kiratab, Tsarah, and Duweireh, all built within the Lejah; and we saw many others on the plain to the left, and among the rocks on the right. We entered the town of Husr el-Heriry, but were received with such scowling looks and savage threats and curses by its Moslem inhabitants, that we were glad to effect our escape. We now felt that on leaving the Druse territory we had left hospitality and welcome behind, and that henceforth outbursts of Moslem fanaticism awaited us everywhere.

EDREI.

Soon after leaving Busr, the towers of Edrei came in sight, extending along the summit of a projecting ledge of rocks in front, and running some distance into the interior of the Lejah on the right. Crossing a deep ravine, and ascending the rugged ridge of rocks by a winding path like a goat-track, we came suddenly on the ruins of this ancient city. The situation is most remarkable:—without a single spring of living water; without river or stream; without access, except over rocks and through defiles all but impassable; without tree or garden. In selecting the site, everything seems to have been sacrificed to security and strength. Shortly after my arrival I went up to the terraced roof of a house, to obtain a general view of the ruins. Their aspect was far from inviting; it was wild and savage in the extreme. The huge masses of shattered masonry could scarcely be distinguished from the rocks which encircle them; and all ruins and rocks alike, are black, as if scathed by lightning. I saw several square towers, and remains of temples, churches, and mosques. The private houses are low, massive, gloomy, and manifestly of the highest antiquity. The inhabitants are chiefly Moslems; but as there is a little Christian community, we selected the house of their sheikh as our temporary residence.

Under the guidance of our host, we went out in the afternoon to inspect the principal buildings of the city. A crowd of fanatical Moslems gathered round, and followed us wherever we went, trying every means to annoy and insult us. We paid no attention to them, and hoped thus to escape worse treatment. Unfortunately our hopes were vain. I was suddenly struck down by a blow of a club while copying an inscription. The crowd then rushed upon us in a body with stones, clubs, swords, and knives. I was separated from my companions, pursued by some fifty or sixty savages, all thirsting for my blood. After some hard struggles, which I cannot look back to even yet without a shudder, I succeeded in reaching our temporary home. Here I found my companions, like myself, severely wounded; and almost faint from loss of blood. Our Druse guard defended the house till midnight, and then, thanks to a merciful Providence, we made our escape from Edrei.

Edrei was the capital city of the giant Og. On the plain beside it he marshalled his forces to oppose the advancing host of the Israelites. He fell, his army was totally routed, and Edrei was taken by the conquerors, Num. xxi. 33; Deut. iii. 1–4. Probably it did not remain long in the hands of the Israelites, for we hear no more of it in the Bible. The monuments now found in it show that it was one of the most important cities of Bashan in the time of the Romans. After the Saracenic conquest, it gradually dwindled down from a metropolitan city to a poor village; and now, though the ruins are some three miles in circuit, it does not contain more than five hundred inhabitants. How applicable are the words of Ezekiel both to the physical and to the social state of Edrei! "Thus saith the Lord,.... Behold, I, even I, will bring a sword upon you, and I will destroy your high places.....In all your dwelling places the cities shall be laid waste, and the high places shall be desolate." Ezek. vi. 3, 6. "I will bring the worst of the heathen, and they shall possess their houses.....Say unto the people of the land, Thus saith the Lord God,.... They shall eat their bread with carefulness, and drink their water with astonishment,.....because of the violence of all them that dwell therein. Every one that passeth thereby shall be astonished." Ezek. vii. 24; xii. 19, etc.

In darkness and silence we rode out of Edrei. For more than an hour we were led through rugged and intricate paths among the rocks, scarcely venturing to hope that we should ever reach the plain in safety. We did reach it, however, and with grateful hearts we rode on, guided by the stars. Before long we were again entangled in the rocky mazes of this wild region, and resolved, after several vain attempts to get out, to wait for daylight. The night wind was cold, bitterly cold; my wounds were stiff and painful; and there was no shelter from the blast save that of the shattered rocks. The spot, too, was neither safe nor pleasant for a bivouac. The mournful howl of the jackal, the sharp ringing bark of the wolf, and the savage growl of the hyena were heard all round us. Gradually they came nearer and closer. Our poor horses quivered in every limb. We were forced to keep marching round them; for we saw by the bright star-light and the flashing eyes, that the rocks on every side were tenanted with enemies almost as dangerous and bloodthirsty as the men of Edrei. There I knew for the first time what it was to spend a night with the wild beasts; and there I had, too, a practical and painful illustration of Isaiah's remarkable prediction, "The wild beasts of the desert shall also meet with the wild beasts of the island, and the satyr shall cry to his fellow," etc. Isa. xxxiv. 14.

Day-light came at last—not with the slow, stealing step of the West, but with the swiftness and beauty of Eastern climes. Mounting our jaded horses, we rode on between high black stones and crags of naked rock. Climbing to the top of a little hill, we got a wide view over the Lejah. I could only compare it to the ruins of a Cyclopean city prostrate and desolate. There was not one pleasing feature. The very trees that grew amid the rocks have a blasted look. Yet, strange as it may seem, this forbidding region is thickly studded with ancient towns and villages, long ago deserted. Passing through the Lejah to the town of Khubab, we rode on north-west along its border, leaving the towns of Hankin, Kib, Musmieh, and others, on our right. They are all deserted, and there is not a single inhabited spot east of Khubab. The rich and beautiful plain on the north of the Lejah is now desolate as the Lejah itself, and in a ride of ten miles we did not see a human being. We pursued our route to Deir Ali, and thence over the Pharpar, at Kenweh, to Damascus.

Thus ended my tour through eastern Bashan, and my explorations of its giant cities.

*Argob appears to have been the home of the warlike tribe of Gesshurites. Absalom's mother was Maacah, daughter of Talmai, King of Geshur, 2 Sam. iii. 3; and when he slew his brother Amnon he fled, "and went to Geshur, and was there three years," xiii. 38. Probably much of Absalom's wild and wayward spirit may be attributed to maternal training, and to the promptings of his ever fierce Gesshurites.

THE RESTITUTION.

S. A. CHAPLIN, EDITOR.

Plymouth, Indiana, July 5, 1882.

SOME communications intended for the present number are necessarily deferred.

THE majority in favor of prohibition in Iowa figures up 29,107. It will be a matter of rejoicing to the citizens of that State that there is a prospect of getting rid of her Salem dens. If Indiana were only free from these horrible sinks we should rejoice also.

As far as we have read the book entitled "The Life Everlasting," we are highly pleased with it and commend it to our subscribers. It is noticed in another column. So far as we have read Brother Myers' book, "The Covenants," we can commend it also. The Sinaitic Covenant and the Sabbath question are well treated, and the Sabbath shown to be a purely Jewish institution.

THE miserable assassin of President Garfield was hung June 30, at 12:35 p. m. observatory time, in the jail at Washington; and was buried July 1, at 4 p. m. in a grave 7 feet deep under the floor of one of the corridors of the same jail. On the gallows he read a blasphemous prayer that he had written for the occasion, and, with some emotion, tried to chant a piece of exceedingly silly doggerel. The autopsy held over his body revealed no evidence of insanity.

A SISTER, and a widow, sent us twenty dollars last week to pay for two extra subscriptions, and the remainder for the relief fund. Her object is to make THE RESTITUTION her missionary. Not to boast, but to encourage her and others we will say that we have this year already done as much financially and directly for our loved paper. She thinks, and we share her opinion, that there are many who are equally able to make THE RESTITUTION their preacher. Our Sister lives in Colorado. With many thanks we say—God bless her.

THE PENNSYLVANIA RAILWAY.

In our recent trip to the East, as already noted, we passed over the consolidated lines of this Company to New York. From our personal knowledge, acquired on this journey, and on former trips over much of the line, we are prepared to speak in the highest terms of this deservedly popular line of travel. Many towns and cities along the route possess historic interest. It traverses fertile and beautiful tracts of country, and the scenery in the Alleghany mountains is an ever shifting panorama of sublimity and grandeur. Every provision has been made for the safety of passengers while traveling, and for their comfort and convenience at the well-appointed, and in many instances, magnificent stations and waiting rooms. To our numerous readers who may be at a loss to decide between the conflicting claims of the great rival lines between the East and the West, we have no hesitancy in commending this line of travel.

THE UNREVEALED CHURCH.

Behold what manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon us, that we should be called the sons of God: therefore the world knoweth us not, because it knew him not. Beloved, now are we the sons of God, and it doth not yet appear what we shall be: but we know that, when he shall appear, we shall be like him; for we shall see him as he is. 1 John iii. 1, 2.

It is only by the excellencies of its character that the church of God can be manifested in this world. There is no transformation of the outward organization effected by divine power when one becomes a child of God. It is not by any visible personal perfections that the validity of our claims to the endearing divine relation, expressed by son and daughter of the Lord Almighty, can be made manifest. The heavenly transfiguration is internal; and, owing to human imperfection and weakness, the embryonic processes of the new life may be far from being obvious to the world, or even to the heirs of the like precious faith. The living tracery of a new creation, wrought and energized by the Holy Spirit, is only fully discernable to the Omniscient eye. Where mortal eyes, scanning the outward appearance, contemplate only a frail dying child of earth, the divine vision may distinguish an heir of eternal glory as an undeveloped germ. In the wintery day, while the leafless shrub is rooted in the frozen soil, the closed bud, wrapped in its costly integuments, may seem small, even contemptible; but that bud may enwrap a blossom, which, unfolded by spring showers and summer suns, will enchant the eye with its lovely tintings, and fill the air with incense fragrance.

It is only in the summer lands of the Paradise of God that the divinely-human will be seen in heavenly perfection. To possess the angelical loveliness of form and feature, to wear the ineffable beauty that glows on the rapt Seraph's cheeks, we must pass through the sublimating processes of the resurrection of the Just. Beyond death is the immortal—on the other side of the tomb, the incorruptible—in another age the glorified. In this world, it is even among the despised and lowly poor that the rich in faith, and heirs of the Kingdom, are to be found. The royal halls and imperial palaces, rich though they may be in carving, gilding, and tapestry, are not the abodes of the most excellent of the earth. God's own dear Son was homeless and friendless, a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief—without external beauty, form, or comeliness, while in this world, and though the foxes had holes, and the birds of the air had nests, divine Royalty had not where to lay his head. Dens, caves, huts, and hovels, have sheltered, sheepskins, goat-skins, rags, and sackcloths, have clothed; and poverty, lowliness, and obscurity, have hidden the heirs of the future glory, and the heavenly kingdom, from the view of a careless world. And if God's children have been lost to sight amid the humble and abject classes of humanity, while living; how utterly forgotten, while sleeping the death sleep, are those whose honored names shall yet be held in everlasting remembrance. For the heirs of immortality to garnished sepulchres are builded, nor do monumental marbles, or lettered granite tell where the many sleep who shall be equal to the angels of light in the ages to come. While the towering obelisk, the graven pillar, and the polished stone, may mark the place where wealth and honor repose, the wild rose and tangled sweet briar are growing untrained over the forms that are destined for the crowns and the sceptres of the endless futurities. Some prospective denizens of the New Jerusalem are sleeping 'neath the snows in Arctic graves, where the unsetting stars that circle the pole look down through the long night of months on their unmarked resting places. Some, who shall yet follow the Lamb through the groves of the heavenly Paradise, and drink of the founts of living waters whose crystal surface reflects the bordering trees of fire, are now resting beneath the turfy green that their mortal dust enriches. Over dust more precious than gold, over wasted forms that are yet to be reorganized into imperishable beauty, over silent tombs that shall yet sing amid the morning stars of the New Creation, the hot sands of torrid deserts are now drifting. And when the sea shall give up its dead, at the Redeemer's call, many others shall come forth who sleep low down upon the ocean's floor, and above whom the coral insect has built the stony tomb. In life the Church, the Redeemer's Bride, has ever been a forlorn and outcast wanderer—a poor dweller in a wilderness of toils and tears. Over its dead, buried and forgotten dust, the present evil world has reveled in all its glitter, pomp, and display. But the fashion of this world passes away! The day of regeneris will soon dawn upon this chaotic world and the sun-light of redemption break in upon "the night of the grave."

It is then that what is now earthly will bear the Image of the heavenly, weakness be changed to power, corruption be transformed into imperishability, mortality into deathlessness, and all human imperfection be transfigured into the divine perfections of Christ's most glorious body. For this promised redemption a sin-paralyzed creation groans; for this coming day of peerless glorification the martyr's graves are telephoning heaven with the voiceful cry—"How long, O Lord?" For the last lovely morning the left widow of the mutilated Bride in its bowed and broken humanity is, in sorrowful uniting, passing the last gloomy night watches; and for Israel's Hope and Earth's Deliverer a groaning creation is sadly calling—Come! Jesus says, I come!

PERSONALS.

Brother Hugh S. Barnhill, of Argos, Ind., left his home immediately after the Antioch Conference to spend some time in Kansas. In a letter of June 28, he says: "RESTITUTION please publish that I am now at my son's—O. H. Barnhill—near Ingalls, in Kan., and expect to remain three Sundays; and will preach for them that may come. I would be glad to see the brethren of Northern Kansas."

HUGH. S. BARNHILL.

From a long and hallmate acquaintance we can cordially commend Brother Barnhill to our brethren in the West. We hope his visit will be for the advancement of the cause of Christ.

While in Philadelphia we had one or two very short interviews with J. H. Pettingell, A. M., the author of "The Life Everlasting," and other works bearing on man's future existence. In a card just received he writes:

"My Dear Mr. Chaplin: I sail with my daughter tomorrow morning, 28th inst, on the Illinois for Liverpool. Shall be absent about two months. Shall be the guest of Rev. E. White, London, the first week, and after that, for two or three weeks, of Rev. Dr. E. Petavel, Geneva. You have kindly sent me the last two numbers of your excellent paper, but I must leave before the number for this week comes to hand. If it should contain a notice of my book, will you kindly send it to me, care of Rev. E. White, Tufnell Park, London (N.) England; or if the numbers for the next two or three weeks should contain it, or anything of interest to me, please send to the care of Rev. E. Petavel, D. D., Chene Bougerier, Geneva, Switzerland, and very much oblige,

Yours in Christian love.

J. H. PETTINGELL.

Phila. Pa. June 27, '82

As requested we have forwarded last week's paper to London and will send successive numbers for two or three weeks to Geneva, as directed. We hope our brother in the gospel hope will find time to write a communication or two for our paper from Europe. We hereby most heartily invite him to narrate his impressions of men, places, and things generally. We may add that both Mr. White and Mr. Petavel are well known authors, and able advocates of the doctrine of endless life in Christ alone. From the pen of the latter we give, in another column, a short piece, that we have selected, entitled "The Mysterious Side of the Gospel." May God's blessing attend our Brother Pettingell in his travels.

Mrs. A. E. Davis, in her last communication from Jerusalem to the Age to Come Herald, says: "I wish you would mention in the Herald that THE RESTITUTION is received regularly, and passed around among both Jews and Gentiles, and is liked very well." We have been sending our paper to Jerusalem for some months and we are glad to hear that it arrives safely at its distant destination. We now make a proposal to our brethren. Let us raise a remittance for Mrs. Davis by a contribution of small sums from as many of our subscribers as would be glad to assist her, in her new home in the city of the Great King. There is now the sum of $7.35 on hand which was contributed to send a minister to preach and baptize in case a call should come from some isolated individual. As no such call comes how would it do to use this for Mrs. Davis? We leave it for those who have sent the small amounts to say, as we shall be directed only by cards from the donors. By helping Mrs. Davis we could probably secure some contributions from her pen directly to THE RESTITUTION, and also assist her in writing once for the Herald, to which we have been indebted for what we have already published. Small sums from many will soon make a remittance—we will help. Please act at once.

POST MORTEM SLEEP.

Mr. Editor:

With your kind permission a few words of rejoinder to "Truth Seeker's" reply to my objections to the sleep after death theory, of the Rev. Doctor Clarke.

First, I alluded to the teaching of the universal church inculcating a different doctrine. This does not mean that there was not, or that there will not be, objectors, cranks and croakers in the church to the world's end. For Christ says: "When the Son of Man cometh, shall he find faith on the earth? No; but rather division." "T. S." thinks it would be better to appeal to the Scriptures for proof rather than to a "corrupt church," and so thinks "F.," also; and therefore he quotes several passages from the New Testament in support of the position he takes. "T. S." says, "If F." had read the Old Testament he would have found that dead men were made to talk by Isaiah," but objects to Christ doing the very same thing, both proving by the parable or allegory something else as true. Christ, the certainty of reward and punishment in the spirit world, Isaiah, the humiliation of vanity and pride. Just here let me say to "T. S." that I have been a constant reader of both the Old and New Testaments for sixty-five years; for they were my class books according to the Protestant parochial system in Ireland in my school days.

Again, if I had read the fathers. Well, I assure him I have, beginning with Polycarp, disciple of St. John, apostle of Lord. "T. S." will not take my thief on the cross and Christ's reply to him as proof of my position, because it might be made by a little alteration of the punctuation to mean quite a different thing. Admitted; and so might other alterations in punctuation make serious and momentous differences. And notwithstanding the penchant of the late translators of the newly-revised New Testament for altering sentences and words, yet they left this chief question just as they found it, to the great discomfort of the cranks and croakers. Then, "T. S." starts a new theory of dead men appearing alive, and talking without their souls, for he says Moses and Elias' bodies were there, but not their souls. Cannot swallow that, "T. S," too absurd and ridiculous. We pass it.

I cannot go into a discussion about the similarity of heaven and Paradise; that is not the question at issue. I keep to the text. Sleep or no sleep, is what we discuss at present. Heaven, Paradise and immortality of the soul some other time.

"T. S." says that I admit in effect that the Old Testament does not teach that the soul is conscious between death and the resurrection, just because I said that Christ should make known things kept secret since the foundation of the world. How "T. S." can prove from that, that I admit his sleeping theory, passes my comprehension. No prophet or mere man ever did or ever could with any show of authority declare the torments of hell or the bliss of heaven as Christ could, for he saw both places and knew them of old, being the omniscient and omnipresent God. "We speak that we do know and testify that we have seen." "If thy right hand or foot offend thee, or thy right eye, cast them off or pluck it out, and cast it from thee; better for thee to enter into life with one hand or one foot or one eye, than have all these cast into hell, where the worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched." These were some of the things he was to have made known, and the conscious state after death, also.

I am at a loss to know why "T. S." jumps from the sleeping question to the immortality of the soul, when I never said a word about it, although he was good enough to put "mortal spirit" and "immortal" into my mouth. And to help a lame argument, he must appeal, also at any clergyman will admit that St. John saw things in the vision which have not yet been fulfilled or become realities, but will in the future." But the glorified beings that he saw round the throne "crowned and robed," were indeed the spirits of departed saints of God, that had already washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb. Nothing future about that, any way. This appeal to "most any clergyman" is rather soft. They cannot help you "T. S." in the least, to get over the difficulty. And what, in common sense, has the first chapter of Revelations to do with the vision in the 7th. The old dodge of skipping about to avoid the shot, but you cannot escape even behind the twenty plain passages that you think are necessary to prove the immortality of the soul "if it is a Bible doctrine." Out of that hiding place you can be driven not only with twenty but with thirty if necessary. But that is not the question at issue; but the sleepiness of the soul. What made you jump from that without provocation? Did "Frankonia" once mention it? Never.

FRANKONIA.

THE SLEEP OF THE DEAD.

Mr. Editor:

If you will allow me space in your valuable paper I will reply to "Frankonia's" letter in your daily issue of the 29th instant. In the first place, I would ask him if Barnabas, Clemens, Romanus, Hermas, Ignatius Martyr, Theophilus of Antioch, Justin Martyr, Irenæus Martyr, and Clemen's Alexandrinus are some of the "objectors, cranks and croakers" he refers to. These are some of the church fathers, all of which believed in the sleep of the dead, and Polycarp might be included with them in that view: and as they believe in the unconscious state of the dead, they must have been "cranks, croakers, etc.," according to "Frankonia." These all died between 90 and 216 A. D. On the other hand there were three of the church fathers who held the doctrine of eternal life in pain, or the conscious state of the dead, viz., Athenagoras, Tatian and Tertullian, who died A. D. 190, 200 and 236. It will be seen by the foregoing that the fathers three to one were in favor of the sleep of the dead, and they nearly all lived closer to the time of Christ than the three last named who held the opposite view. So I think "F." must admit that the great bulk of the talent of the church immediately after the death of Christ were in favor of the view I advance. I did not object to Christ "doing the very same thing," (see "F.'s" letter) but I objected to the interpretation that "F." gave of the parable, and would like to see him get away with the points I made against his interpretation of it. I admit freely the "certainty of rewards and punishment," but differ with "F." as to their nature. I believe the Scriptures, when they say "the wages of sin is death and the gift of God eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord." As to the thief on the cross, and the translators of the new version of the Testament, I would just say that I suppose they (the translators) looked through the same colored goggles that "Frankonia" does. Will "F." please try and overcome the arguments I advanced on that and other passages, or else own that I have the truth on my side. The facts as I gave them remain untouched. "F." misrepresents me when he says that I started a "new theory of dead men appearing alive and talking without their souls," for I wrote that the record for portion of Scripture referred to said that Moses and Elias were there and not their souls without their bodies, as "F." would have it. If "F." can give one solitary proof that Moses and Elias were on the Mount in a disembodied state I am prepared to believe it. It would look better if "F." would get away with my proofs and arguments on the vision on the Mount rather than to take refuge behind a jeer. He must be hard up for material when he has to resort to such tactics. "F." must be mentally short sighted, if he can't see that the doctrine of the conscious state of the dead stands or falls with the nature of the soul. Therefore if we prove that the soul is not immortal we prove that the dead are asleep or in a state of unconsciousness, between death and resurrection, so he need not quibble on that point but rather tak up his time and space by meeting what I advance if he can.

When I said that "F." admitted in effect that the Old Testament did not teach that the soul was conscious between death and resurrection, it was on account of his own application of the quotation he made. So if I made a point against him there, he must find fault with himself, as he quoted the passage to show that Christ had brought this doctrine of the conscious state of the dead to light, and he admits the same thing in his last letter, for he says plainly "these were some of the things he (Christ) was to make known, and the conscious state after death also." (Now "F." read your own letters over again and perhaps you will be convinced that I understand you right, according to what you wrote.) But I defy "F." to prove that the consciousness of the dead was one of the things referred to in the passage: and I challenge "F.," or any other person to prove logically from the Scriptures that the conscious state of the dead is taught therein.

In 2 Tim. i. 10, we read that "Christ brought immortality to light through the gospel." Therefore Christ did bring immortality to light after all, (but not the conscious state of the dead) and you see "F.," I am in good company. "F." quotes, "if thy right hand or foot offend thee, etc., cast it from thee, for it is better for thee to enter into life with one hand or one foot than have all these to be cast into hell," etc. This is my doctrine "F.," as I believe this portion of Scripture teaches that we will either enter into life or the "unquenchable fire" in a bodily state after resurrection, and judgment, I think even "Frankonia" can see that the language in this passage can refer only to individuals in a material bodily state. The fire although unquenchable no doubt, will go out of itself, when there is no longer any material to feed it. The worm will likewise die when it has nothing to feed on. The passage denotes utter destruction and consumption to the wicked. For another passage says "they shall be burnt up root and branch." If "F." wish I can quote him scores of others to the same effect. When I used the words "immortal soul," etc., I did not wish it to be understood that I was quoting "F." but I quoted them as being common phrases used by those believing in the immortality of the soul. "F." says that the "beings that were seen round the throne were indeed the spirits of departed saints." Now, I demand some proof ("Prove all things"—Paul) that those around the throne were departed spirits. The good book does not say so, and I can't take "Frankonia's" assumption as demonstrating anything. Besides, when he calls it a vision his foundation is gone, as I demonstrated conclusively in my last letter that a vision is not something real, and "F." has not made the least attempt to break down my fortification. And I will just say here that unless "F." can make at least a good attempt to meet my Scripture quotations and arguments I shall not consider it worth while to answer him. His view that what John saw in vision really took place in heaven, involves him in some absurd positions. For instance, with that view an earthquake, lightning and hail were taking place actually in that place of perfection, where God's throne is called heaven. The idea of an earthquake in heaven should make "F." adopt some other theory or mode of interpretation. See Rev. xi. 19.

As "Frankonia" is so anxious to stick to the "Sleep of the Dead," and has been a constant reader of both Old and New Testaments for sixty-five years, let him give his interpretation of the following very plain texts for the instruction of your readers:

Psa. vi. 5; Eccl. ix. 5, 6, 10; Jer. ix. 39; Psa. cxlvi. 3, 4; Isa. xxxviii. 18, 19; Job iii. 13-22; xiv. 10-22; Psa. xxxix. 13; Gen. xv. 15; xxv. 8; xxx. 29, i. 26; Acts xiii. 36; John iii. 13; Acts ii. 29, 34; John xiii. 33; xiv. 2, 3; vii. 34; viii. 21; 1 Cor. xv.

While thanking you, Mr. Editor, for taking up so much of your valuable space, I wish you the compliments of the season.

Yours truly,

The Mysterious Side of the Gospel.

Among the many social and political changes that are taking place in the present day, there is none more noticeable than the decay of the ancient clerical power. Nations have grown weary of authoritative assertions, and of intolerant despotism. They complain that the ministers of religion have abused the mysterious element to be found in the gospel. Too many errors have indeed been introduced under the cloak of Christian mystery; and the pure gospel shuns that superstitious adoration which only endangers and delays the progress of truth. Blessed be God, our glorious gospel asserts itself before mankind as a supremely rational doctrine, and as to the wisdom of God himself. Its only aim is to solve the mystery which, as Paul tells us, "hath been hid from ages and from generations, but now is made manifest to the saints."[1]

Protestantism cannot flourish unless it advances with resolute tread in the path which the Reformers marked out. Let us by all means study and revere ecclesiastical tradition, and cultivate Christian art; it is useful and praiseworthy thus to explore the past; but let us beware substituting sacramental efficacy, vain formulæ, magical ceremonies, and the absolute authority of any man, for the moral power of faith and the word of God. Such a course would bring down upon the Protestant Churches the destruction that threatens more ancient establishments than ours; whose days are numbered, in spite of their grandeur, unless they return to the purity of primitive faith.

If, then, we acknowledge that the evangelical religion does contain some mysteries, we hasten to add that it explains more than it possesses, and that it contains fewer than any other religion, or any system of philosophy. We may go still further and add that we expect a new religious era to result from the freedom of thought that was inaugurated by our fathers of the sixteenth century. The same careful and painstaking study of proofs which has regenerated natural and historic sciences in our day, will also transform our understanding of Christian truth, and will prepare the way for that day when all from the least to the greatest shall be able to give a full and most positive proof in support of "the hope that is in them," and when "they shall teach no more every man his neighbor, and every man his brother saying, Know the Lord;" for the law of the Lord shall be written in every heart.[2] In the crisis through which we are passing, imperfect knowledge is shaking the faith of many, but riper knowledge shall change faith into sight.—E. Petavel, D. D.

JESUS WEPT.

In times of affliction, when our cup of sorrow is full, when tears of sympathy and consoling words from dear friends fail to soothe the deep anguish of our hearts; when in vain we try to check the stifled moan and keep back the scalding tears, and it seems that our burden is more than we can bear, and there is no help in all the world 'tis then the light of divine truth sheds over us a ray of hope and love sublime. We see One caring for us and sharing in our sorrows, One that wept with those who suffered affliction; One too that has promised consolation and a glorious day, where sorrow cannot dwell; a heavenly home for the sweet babes brought back from the land of the enemy. Nothing shall be there to make afraid. O picture of joy! the lion, the lamb, and a little child in a flowery Eden home! What a grand and glorious plan God has laid for his children, peace and plenty for all; a righteous reigning King, who will give us joy for mourning and a balm for every pain.

FRUITION.

W. L. CHUCKETT.

Surely the time for our labor is ending,
Surely the King in his beauty is near;
Hail to the light from heaven descending,
Hail to the glory soon to be here.

We have watched and prayed for the coming of morning,
To greet the first beams of the life-giving Sun,
And now in the East is a glint of the dawning,
Darkness vindictive, soul joy will be won.

Joy that the heart cannot know in this beating
Compassioned by sorrow and stained by her tears;
Joy that shall last, unfolding, unfleeting,
Brightening earth through eternity's years.

Rejoice! O rejoice! for long have we waited
For the beautiful life that knows not decay;
Look up! let your souls with that life be elated,
For night and its shadows are passing away.

MRS. DAVIS AND HER MISSION.

Leaves from My Journal.

JERUSALEM, May 2, 1882.

We have had rain today; an unusual occurrence in this country so late in the season. But we may look for greater things to come.

A recent event among the Jews is of great importance, in my estimation. A company of one hundred and twenty families have arrived here from Arabia. It was hardly known that such people existed, until they were moved upon to come to Jerusalem. I will try and ascertain more about them. The fig-tree is beginning to put forth leaves.

I have received many letters from different parts of America, both from the States and Canada, asking for information. I shall answer as I can under the circumstances, and as many as I can. Those who do not receive answers, may understand that it is beyond my power to answer all; and I am often at a loss to know what ones to leave unanswered.

I must repeat the advice, that I do not consider it wise for single families to commence farming here. There should be six or more families in a company. The customs and language of the inhabitants makes it necessary at this stage of the colonization movement. How it may be hereafter, I cannot say.

Colonies will find plenty of good land at reasonable prices a little way out from Jerusalem; but in the immediate vicinity of the city I think the price of land is nearly as high as in the suburbs of Boston.

I am happy to be able to write today that I have quite recovered my health. But my kind friends, the Americans from Illinois, still care for me. They come often, or send a servant, to see what I need. What a wonderful God we have, and how good he is! It does really seem that Jerusalem is nearer to God than Boston. How glad I am that I am here. It is a good place to learn of God. May I say, it is like entering the High School?

You wish me to tell you how the people live. Well, they eat, drink, sleep, gossip and talk about each other, make love and get angry, smoke, sing, laugh and weep, just about the same as they do in America. If I understand them correctly, I should say that the Arabs are not naturally a revengeful people. I call them kind-hearted and extremely hospitable. We Americans like Mohammedans better than we supposed we should.

Mrs. Brinton, Frank, her son, and myself, went to the top of Mount Scopus last Saturday. Our path was one bed of flowers. We found grain growing quite to the top of the mountain. The day was hot, but we found it too cool for comfort at the summit. We were fortunate enough, however, to find a shelter from the wind on the other side of the mountain, where I made a sketch of the River Jordan and Dead Sea.

The nights are now cool, and I am sitting this evening by a warm fire. It is evident, the seasons are changing and the rains increasing. Does not the floods, sicknesses and troubles in America fill the parabola picture? I should think so.

May 3rd. We have rain again today. Mrs. Brinton and myself have taken a walk over a new road. They do make nice roads here. On our return, we visited the school for Jews. This is a new feature. Rothschild built this house some years ago for the purpose of schooling the Jewish children. But the Jews refused to send their children to school, and the house was closed. But the Jews are getting their eyes open, and now they are filling up this house very nicely to educate their children.

It is now raining smartly, and all are surprised.

American greenbacks are as good here as gold. Send them along.

[We have never understood this to be so but , and fear now that considerable discount must be made.]

Sunday Evening, May 7.—This has been the most glorious day I ever know. The air is so pure, sweet, and delightfully cool and breezy. Mr. Spafford has given us an interesting history of his trip to Tiberius. He spoke of the beautiful plain of Esdrelon, with its lovely fields of waving grain and flowers. He described to us, in the most glowing colors, the beauty and grandeur of the scenery upon which Jesus looked for thirty years of his life at Nazareth. I assure you that the life of Christ has a new interest to us who are so blessed as to behold the identical places where he walked and wrought his wonderful miracles.

Mr. Spafford has a most gentle and kind spirit, and is teachable. He always listens with interest to any new thought presented. He has a fine intellect, is noble by nature, a true Christian. His dear little wife is just the same. We discuss the various questions which arise, just the same as we did in our meetings at Boston. Today we had up the nature of Christ for debate. Of course, my views are new to them on this point. But on the mass of the prophecies they are well posted, and we agree perfectly.

I will pen a bit of important news. There has been found a tribe of Jews in Arabia, hid away, though, of course, the Jewish records show that such a tribe existed, but nothing was known about them. By chance, some merchants from Alexandria were traveling there and met these Jews, and told them they come from near Jerusalem, and that many people had arrived there expecting the Messiah soon to come. These poor souls believing it, at once sold all their possessions and started for Bombay (one hundred and twenty families), where they had to stay in quarantine three months. Then they came to Alexandria; here, also, they were quarantined. At this time, nearly all their means were spent; but a part of them got enough together to come on to Jerusalem, arriving here in a most destitute condition. They were taken into the homes of the poor Jews here and kindly cared for, until their means were exhausted. At this time, our American friends heard about it, and immediately went to their relief. They have fed one hundred and fifty for the last week, and have carried clothes from their beds and backs, and are making clothing for women and children. They say they shall give the last farthing, if God calls for it: and especially in this cause. All here think this the most remarkable circumstance of this century, and we are daily expecting greater things.

There is to be a Jewish settlement near the beautiful town of Ramleh, and I wish all our friends who are expecting to come to farm would come and buy land with these Jews. Our friends here say, "Be sure and bring blacksmith tools, if you have any." A blacksmith is much needed in Jerusalem. Cannot one be sent? Also, a good shoemaker. I hope it will be Brother Libby.

The crops have never been known to be so abundant before. We walked over a hundred acres of wheat today, the ground is nothing but small stones; no soil can be seen; and the heads of wheat are the heaviest I ever say. It is the same as far as the eye can reach. At Jaffa, the wheat has been cut, and now stocks have sprung up, which are expected to bear the second crop. This is owing to the late and hitherto unknown rains. I had this from a reliable source. What do you think of this for my new country? I think somebody will wake up soon to the importance of this land.

These records show that there are two thousand more Jews in Jerusalem than two years ago; there are now nineteen thousand.

We have plenty of peas, new potatoes, cucumbers, and cutters in market. The peaches in my garden are as large as an almond. I saw the largest pear tree this afternoon that I ever saw. It was as large as the largest apple tree in our country, and was loaded with pears. The almond trees are filled full of green almonds, and we eat them green.

ABOUT CYCLONES.

A Nebraska Meteorologist Gives His Views Concerning These "Bosoms of Destruction."

LINCOLN, Neb., June 26.—A local weather prophet, one who enjoys distinction because of his success in predicting the state of the weather at all seasons of the year, was asked by the Journal correspondent, this morning, to explain the nature of a cyclone.

"I cannot explain it philosophically," he said. "I only know that a cyclone is composed of wind, rain, thunder and lightning, and that it moves in a circle and possesses a destructive force which nothing can withstand. An Eastern paper, commenting on the recent Iowa cyclone, contends that such disasters can be averted by building less of wood, and more of stone and brick. This is nonsense. No structure, however solid, no matter of what material it is constructed, if in the direct line of a cyclone, can withstand its force. There is an awful fury and power in the real cyclone—it is the strength of electricity more than anything else. Talk about solid structures of brick and stone withstanding such power. Why, I have seen sixty miles of country covered with large forest trees and immense rocks swept clear by a cyclone. From the Missouri line south to the Arkansas river, some years ago, a clean sweep was made by a cyclone; large trees were uprooted, others snapped in two like pipe-stems, rocks weighing hundreds of tons were rolled over the ground like marbles, and trenches were dug through hills which would have taken hundreds of men years to accomplish."

"In what portion of the country have the most destructive cyclones occurred?"

"Illinois has been visited a number of times by cyclones. Iowa has been terribly unfortunate this year. Wisconsin, Minnesota and Dakota have had their share of terrific storms. In fact, there is no portion of the country entirely safe from such intruders. But it must be borne in mind that such a cyclone is not a tornado. The difference is in the fact one is a straight wind, while the other is a circular storm of wind and rain. The cyclone is of prairie origin, and occurs in prairie countries mostly. It would seem that Dakota and Nebraska should be frequently visited by cyclones, but such has not been the case so far. Nebraska has never had but one real destructive cyclone; that was at Stanton last year, when the whole town was blown to pieces."

"In the event of a cyclone, what is the best thing to do?"

"Seek an underground retreat of some kind. Many Nebraska farmers have cyclone caves or cellars near the house, into which they can go in case of a storm. The only safe place during one of these terrible storms is underground."

"Do you predict other destructive cyclones this summer?"

"Yes; this year will be one of great disaster, and of all agencies of destruction the cyclone will be the worst."—Correspondence of the Chicago Journal.

THE TIDAL WAVE.

The Lake Erie tidal wave which visited Cleveland on Friday morning, June 22, is as great a mystery as ever. The visitation is the third in a period of fifty years. The wave is generally attributed to a cyclone, but no disturbance of the elements adequate to the production of such a wave was noted at the time. A Cleveland investigator believes the wave was produced by a small area of very low atmospheric pressure in other parts of the lake pushing the water up until the equilibrium was restored. The wave once formed repeated itself, rising and falling until it finally broke at Cleveland.

THE FOUNDATION OF ISLAM.

The Koran is believed by Moslems to occupy a unique position, and to stand apart from all other inspired writings. It is held to be an objective revelation of the divine will; that is to say, God did not simply illumine the mind of the prophet and make it the vehicle of the ideas which he wished to convey to men. Every word of the Koran was composed in heaven and dictated to Mohammed, word by word, in the Arab language, by the tongue of the angel Gabriel. Mr. Sell quotes Ibn Khaldoun, an authoritive Mohammedan writer, in support of his statement. "Of all the divine books," says this eminent Mussulman authority, "the Koran is the only one of which the text, words and phrases have been communicated to the prophet by an audible voice. It is otherwise with the Pentateuch, the gospel, and the other divine books; the prophets received them in the form of ideas." "This," adds Mr. Sell, "expresses the universal belief on this point—a belief which reveals the essential mechanical nature of Islam." The Koran thus claims to be a divine revelation in the sense different from all other sacred books. It is the belief of every Mohammedan, that not only the thoughts and the ideas are of divine origin, but the very words and their arrangement were communicated to the prophet as they were, edited and composed in the mind of heaven. It follows, of course, that to ask a Mussulman to alter in the slightest degree anything sanctioned by the Koran is to ask him to commit what would be in his eyes an unpardonable impiety. The Koran, it must be remembered, deals, in contradistinction to the gospel, with precepts rather than with principles. Principles admit of indefinite modification and development, and therefore Christianity can adopt itself to every variety of place and circumstance. But a book which lays down positive rules that are held to be binding in the strictness of the letter to the end of time, is manifestly a perpetual barrier against the progress of civilisation among all who believe in it. The Koran is in fact, the stereotyped expression of the knowledge and notions of the semi-barbarous Arab of the seventh century; and every word of it being considered the last expression of the divine will, the consequence is that the Mussulman world is forever bound hand and foot in the fetters of an unchangeable barbarism.—London Spectator.

The Peace of God.

ISAAC WILLIAMS.

The child Jesus on his parent's breast,
In sweet sleep lies at ease, and is at rest:
The bird sits singing by his nest,
And tells aloud
His trust in God, and so is blest
'Neath every cloud.

He has no store—he owns no seed,
Yet sings aloud, and doth not heed;
By flowing streams or grassy mead
He sings to cheer
Men who forget, in fear of need,
A Father's name.

The heart that trusts for ever sings,
And feels no fight as it had wings:
A well of peace within it springs:
Come good or ill,
What'er young, immortal beings,
It is its will.

Home.

When father and mother have their life and friends quite apart from those of their children, when the boys are in a hurry to scatter in every direction after tea, and the girls prefer any place to their home, the home is in a dangerous state. It should be more than four walls, more than a roof, a shelter from the storm, and a place to eat and sleep in, and if it be only these and nothing more, it has failed in its mission.

The Legend of the Beautiful Hand.

There was a dispute among three ladies as to which had the most beautiful hand. One sat by a stream, and dipped her hand into the water, and held it up; another plucked strawberries, until the ends of her fingers were pink; and another gathered violets until her hands were fragrant. An old, haggard woman passing by, asked, "Who will give me a gift? for I am poor." All three denied her; but another who sat near, unwashed in the stream, unstained with the fruit, unadorned with flowers, gave her a little gift and satisfied the poor woman. And then she asked them what was the dispute; and they told her, and lifted up before her their beautiful hands. "Beautiful indeed," said she when she saw them. But, when they asked her which was the most beautiful, she said: "It is not the hand that is washed clean in the brook; it is not the hand that is tipped with red; it is not the hand that is garlanded with fragrant flowers; but the hand that gives to the poor, is the most beautiful." As she said these words, her wrinkles fled, her staff was thrown away, and she stood before them an angel from heaven with authority to decide the question in dispute. And that decision has stood the test of all time.

The Shepherd King.

MR GOOD—Well, my children, you have had your lessons of late in the Old Testament, and I suppose you can tell me who was the greatest king of God's chosen people Israel?

HENRY—David!

MARY—O yes, David! Do, papa, tell us something about David.

MR GOOD—Most gladly, Mary. If you take your Bible, and turn up the second Book of Samuel, the 23d chapter, and first and second verses, you will find something about David told by himself.

HENRY—O, let's see. 'Now these be the last words of David. David, the son of Jesse said, and the man who was raised up on high, the anointed of the God of Jacob, and the sweet Psalmist of Israel, said, The spirit of the Lord spake by me, and his word was in my tongue.'

MARY—O, David calls himself 'the sweet Psalmist of Israel.' Is that because he made the Psalms? O yes, 'the Psalms of David.'

MR GOOD—Yes, David was a great poet, and also a fine musician; and many of his psalms are beautiful songs, which he sung to the music of the harp, which he played himself.

MARY—Wouldn't that be grand—to hear a great king singing his own psalms to his own music, and playing the harp to it himself?

MR GOOD—And, grander still, to think that all his songs were about the love and goodness of the great Creator, and about the great things God had done for his chosen people Israel. Ay, and about many greater things he had promised to do for them afterwards.

HENRY—But what is the meaning of 'Anointed,' papa? He calls himself 'the Anointed of the God of Jacob.'

MR GOOD—A very interesting and also a very important question, Henry. But you do not need me to tell you what it means; for you have only to look up the 16th chapter of the first Book of Samuel, and you can read all about it for yourself.

HENRY—Its your turn now, Mary. 1 Samuel xvi.—which verse papa?

MR GOOD—Begin at the beginning of the chapter, Mary.

MARY—Yes, papa—(reading)—

1. And the Lord said unto Samuel, How long wilt thou mourn for Saul, seeing I have rejected him from reigning over Israel? fill thine horn with oil, and go, and I will send thee to Jesse the Bethlehemite; for I have provided me a king among his sons.

2. And Samuel said, How can I go? if Saul hear it, he will kill me. And the Lord said, Take an heifer with thee, and say, I come to sacrifice to the Lord.

3. And call Jesse to the sacrifice, and I will show thee what thou shalt do; and shalt anoint unto me him whom I name unto thee.

4. And Samuel did that which the Lord spake, and came to Bethlehem. And the elders of the town trembled at his coming, and said, Comest thou peaceably?

5. And he said, Peaceably: I am come to sacrifice unto the Lord; sanctify yourselves and come with me to the sacrifice. And he sanctified Jesse and his sons, and called them to the sacrifice.

6. And it came to pass, when they were come, he looked on Eliab, and said, Surely the Lord's anointed is before Him.

7. But the Lord said unto Samuel, Look not on his countenance, or on the height of his stature; because I have refused him; for the Lord seeth not as man seeth; for man looketh on the outward appearance, but the Lord looketh on the heart.

MR GOOD—You see here that Bethlehem was the town of David, where Jesse his father and all his family lived. This is the town where Jesus was born, as you read in the second chapter of Luke, where it is called 'the city of David.' But you see also that God sent Samuel to Bethlehem because he had provided a king among the sons of Jesse; and also that Samuel was to take a horn filled with oil, to anoint the one that God had fixed upon.

HENRY—But how would Samuel know which was the right one?

MR GOOD—You see that Samuel puzzled from the countenance and height of Eliab that he must be the right one; but the Lord had a better way of judging; for he can look into the innermost parts of man's mind, and know what he is fit for. And so Eliab was found to be bad-hearted, and set aside.

MARY—And who came next?

MR GOOD—Read other three verses, and you will see.

MARY—(Reading)—

8. Then Jesse called Abinadab, and made him pass before Samuel. And he said, Neither hath the Lord chosen this.

9. Then Jesse made Shammah to pass by. And he said, Neither hath the Lord chosen this.

10. Again, Jesse made seven of his sons to pass before Samuel. And Samuel said unto Jesse, The Lord hath not chosen these.

HENRY—Whole seven sons, and none of them chosen!

MR GOOD—Yes, whole seven. Now, Mary, read three verses more.

MARY—(Reading)—

11. And Samuel said unto Jesse, Are here all thy children? And he said, There remaineth yet the youngest, and behold he keepeth the sheep. And Samuel said unto Jesse, send and fetch him; for we will not sit down till he come hither.

12. And he sent and brought him in. Now he was ruddy, and withal of a beautiful countenance, and goodly to look to. And the Lord said, Arise, anoint him; for this is he.

13. Then Samuel took the horn of oil, and anointed him in the midst of his brethren; and the Spirit of the Lord came upon David from that day forward. So Samuel rose up and went to Ramah.

HENRY—How wonderful!

MARY—O yes—the very youngest; and keeping his father's sheep!

MR GOOD—And he was very young at this time, as he was not brought with the rest of his brothers to the sacrifice. And he never forgot that he had been a shepherd boy, for he compares himself to a lost sheep, and in many of his psalms he sings of Jehovah as the 'Shepherd of Israel.' You remember that beautiful psalm—the 23d—where he sings—

The Lord is my shepherd,
I shall not want.
He maketh me to lie down in green pastures:
He leadeth me beside the still waters.

And the 80th—

Give ear, O Shepherd of Israel,
Thou that leadest Joseph like a flock.

We are his flock. He doth us feed,
And for his sheep He doth us take.

HENRY—Isn't he called the man after God's own heart? He surely must have been a very good man.

MR GOOD—Yes, my dear, he was, although not perfect. He was a man after God's own heart in doing his duty as a king; for he had the respect for the laws which God gave, and did not, like King Saul, who was before him, take upon him to make laws for himself. This is beautifully expressed in Psalm lxxvii. 71, 72, in mentioning that David had been a shepherd: 'He chose David also His servant, and took him from the sheepfolds, to feed Jacob his people, and Israel His inheritance. So he feed them according to the integrity of his heart, and guided them by the skillfulness of his hands.'

MARY—Please, papa, tell us about the horn of oil that Samuel had.

MR GOOD—Well, if you look up the 10th chapter you will see what Samuel did to Saul with a vial of oil.

MARY—O, let us see. Which verse?

MR GOOD—The first verse.

MARY—(Reading)—

Then Samuel took a vial of oil, and poured it upon his head, and kissed him, and said, Is it not because the Lord hath anointed thee to be captain over his inheritance?

MR GOOD—It would be the same with David, for he was anointed with oil for the same purpose as Saul was.

HENRY—But, papa, what could the pouring oil on David's head do?

MR GOOD—It could mark him out for a special purpose. The oil was prepared by the particular directions of God himself. It was mixed with richest perfumes, and was not to be used for common purposes, and was therefore termed holy. You can read these directions in Exodus xxx. 22–33 some other evening. In Psalm lxxxix 20 God says: 'I have found David my servant; with my holy oil have I anointed him.'

MARY—But why was David anointed, papa?

MR GOOD—To show that he was to be the king of Israel in place of Saul. God said to Samuel, 'Fill thine horn with oil, and go, and I will send thee to Jesse the Bethlehemite: for I have provided me a king among his sons.' And a little ago you read that Saul was anointed that he might be 'captain over God's inheritance,' or king over Israel. Saul disobeyed God's commands; and God would not allow any of his family to be king after him. And so, by anointing, God chose David to be king. And he is therefore called 'the Anointed of the God of Jacob.' And although priests were anointed, and sometimes prophets, it is only kings who are honored with 'the Lord's Anointed' as a title. Saul is so called in 1 Sam. xii. 3, 5; xxiv. 6; etc.

HENRY—I must look up in the Concordance all the places where anointed is used.

MR GOOD—You will find a very remarkable one in the second Psalm, where it is applied to him who is both son of David and Son of God.

HENRY—O yes, I remember; here it is: 'The kings of the earth set themselves, and the rulers take counsel together, against the Lord, and against His Anointed.'

MR GOOD—Now read Acts iv. 26.

HARRY—(Reading)—'The kings of the earth stood up, and the rulers were gathered together against the Lord, and against his Christ.'

MR GOOD—Do you see any difference?

MARY—Yes; in one place it is 'Anointed,' and the other it is' Christ.' How is that papa?

MR GOOD—It is easily explained. The word 'Christ' is just the principal part of the Greek word for 'Anointed,' which is Christos. You must understand the New Testament was written in Greek; and in Acts iv. 26 the translators did not think proper to give the English meaning, as they had done in the second Psalm. But the Old Testament was written in Hebrew, and the word for Anointed is 'Messiah.' You will see this in John i. 41: 'We have found the Messiah, which is, being interpreted, the Christ.' And if you look in a Bible with marginal readings, you will observe the words 'Or, the Anointed.'

HENRY—And how was Jesus anointed? Was it with 'holy oil,' like David?

MR GOOD—We have no account of his being anointed with material oil; but he was 'anointed with the Holy Ghost and with power,' and was acknowledged by his followers to be what David was—namely, the king of Israel—(John i. 49.) And you remember he is called in Daniel 'Messiah the Prince,' and that the wise men came to Jerusalem inquiring 'Where is he that was born king of the Jews?' upon which Herod, who was then king, found out from the learned men that the prophets had foretold that the Christ, 'the Governor who should rule God's people Israel,' was to be born at Bethlehem.

HENRY—The very city where David had been anointed by Samuel!

MR GOOD—Yes, more than ten hundred years before. And you remember also how, shortly before his death, when Pilate asked him, 'Art thou a king, then?' that Jesus answered, 'Thou sayest that I am a king. To this end was I born,' etc., and how Pilate wrote out his accusation, and fixed it upon his cross—'This is Jesus of Nazareth, the King of the Jews;' and how the Jews mocked him, saying: 'Let Christ, the king of Israel descend now from the cross, that we may see and believe.' Now we saw from the history of Saul and David that 'the Anointed' was a title belonging to kings; and now you see from the history of Jesus that the Anointed, or 'the Christ,' was applied to him in the very same way, and pointed him out as the last and greatest 'king of the Jews.'

HENRY—But is he not called Jesus Christ as a common name?

MR GOOD—'The Christ' is a title of the office of Governor of Israel; and you may see that it is more than a common name from the two names being reversed. You know he is often called 'Christ Jesus,' as well as 'Jesus Christ.'

HENRY—But, papa, how could Jesus be king of the Jews when they put him to death?

MR GOOD—Just in the same way as he said, 'I am the Good Shepherd, and give my life for the sheep.' You remember in Zechariah it is said: 'Awake, O sword, against my shepherd, and against the man that is my fellow, saith the Lord of hosts; smite the shepherd, and the sheep shall be scattered.' But although smitten to death, and the sheep scattered, Isaiah predicts that in the future 'he shall feed his flock like a shepherd; he shall gather the lambs with his arm, and carry them in his bosom.' He required to die as an offering for the sins of the world. But God raised him to life again, 'to die no more,' and Peter tells us that he was 'raised up to sit on David's throne'—(Acts ii. 30) And he is to come back from heaven for that purpose; for 'the kingdoms of this world shall become the kingdom of our Lord and of His Christ,' or Anointed; and he shall reign for ever and ever.

And now, my dear children, I hope you will study more fully the histories of David and Christ—a peep at which we have had in our evening's conversation.

A Note Too Long Delayed.

Instead of an apology, I begin with the confession of delay, that may have seemed to be a culpable neglect.

Our beloved brother, fellow-laborer and editor of THE RESTITUTION, was met here by the Church of the Blessed Hope with a cordial reception; was heard with edification and will be remembered with a sense of profound gratification—for a lifetime.

More would have been said, had my heart spoken through the press during his absence from the editorial chair. We were comforted concerning our faith, and are thankful for his visit, and his testimony to "the present truth."

My tour of near 1,000 miles since, was made a blessing to myself; and I trust to others in Western Pennsylvania, Spring Creek, East Branch, Meadville, and intermediate family visits. I was overruled and disappointed as to my intended meeting near Brother Wheeler's, Lincolnville.

THERE SHALL BE NO NIGHT THERE.
Revelation xxii. 5.

In the realms of bliss to come
All is perfect joy and love;
Jesus is Himself the light
In that age that knows no night.

No night shadows linger there,
All is pure, and bright, and fair,
There the Day star is the field.
In that age that knows no night.

No dark clouds of death are there.
Passed is every mortal care;
There no tears o'er dim the sight,
In that age that knows no night.

Love and joy ne'er pass away,
But are endless as the day;
And new beauties meet the sight
In that age that knows no night.

Near His Throne each has a place,
And forever see His face,
Gazing on His crowns so bright,
In that age that knows no night.

There for ever in His Throne,
Endless songs of praise are known.
Sung by saints all robed in white,
In that age that knows no night.

There upon that Heavenly shore,
Those that sleep in death no more,
We shall meet with fond delight
In that age that knows no night.

In that age that knows no night
Faith and hope we lost in sight
Prayer gives place to songs of praise
To the Lamb through endless days.

The Sign of the Son of Man---Again.

Observing in THE RESTITUTION of May 3, the suggestion of Brother Wilcox that the saints may expect a certain, "specific sign" of our Lord's (second) coming in the appearance of a certain star in the physical heavens, before he appears to his saints and that this star-sign "will attract universal attention" (to seen by all nations) and "convey to the thoughtful and pious the intelligence that the Master has come," I ask for a little space to submit to our beloved and intelligent brother, some opposing difficulties which seem to me to stand in the way of his conclusion. I do this the more more readily in the interest of the truth because he seems to invite his notice, by the brethren, of the new suggestion.

1. If there be such "a specific sign," will not its manifestation be confined to the land of Israel and not to all nations? True Matt. xxiv. 30 reads in the common version—"all the tribes of the earth shall mourn," but the Diaglott and other modern versions read, "all the tribes of the land (of Israel) mourn," both as to this passage and the corresponding ones in Zech. xii. and Rev. i. 7, the use of the word "tribes" seems to refer to Israel.

2. If the sign of the coming and the coming itself be so close as to be contemporaneous, can it be said that one is a sign of the other?

3. But perhaps the most serious difficulty arises from the Bible teaching of the rapture or taking up of the saints, both dead and living, before the Lord comes "in power and great glory," even to the land of Israel. If the "good and pious" are already "caught up" or away to "meet the Lord in the air and to be ever with him," how is it that this star-sign is to teach them that "the Master has come?"

To me it seems, with present light, the sign" referred to has no connection with any new or particular star, but is represented by the numerous events of fulfilling prophecy which, in the aggregate, are in these last days, forming to intelligent and observant saints, the sign or indications, like the budding fig-tree, of the near coming of the Son of Man.

Faithfully submitted.

Precept and Practice---A Contrast.

Mr. Editor:

I see your paper sometimes and from it I learn that your people insist on the rule to "speak as the oracles of God" and to use "sound speech which cannot be condemned." I have before me a recent copy of THE RESTITUTION which contains all in a row, four notices of religious meetings and events—all in the future—and advertized positively to come off without any qualification whatever. One writes: "Quarterly meeting will commence on May 20;"—another, "I will be at ——— Saturday before third Sunday in May;"—another, "Annual Conference of the State of Michigan will be held June 1st;"—and yet another, "My book will go the binder by 20th inst., and will be ready for distribution by June 10th."

Now let me ask if these brethren of yours remember or have they forgotten what one of the apostles, whose precept and practice they undertake to follow, has said as to this bold license of dealing with the future, which does not belong to man, but to God? Let them turn to James iv. 13–17 and read and profit by what is there written. No offence, I hope.

Q IN A CORNER.

THE WORD MADE FLESH; OR, JESUS CHRIST, WHO IS HE?

BY J. H. THOMAS, M. D.

In the first chapter of John we are told that, "In the beginning the word (Logos) was with God (Theos), and the word was God, and the word was made flesh, and dwelt among us, and we beheld his glory, the glory as of the only begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth."

In the consideration of this subject we wish to notice first, that the Greek word "logos," translated "word," means mind, reason, speech, or word, and hence wisdom;—therefore the logos that was with God, and was God, was the mind, reason, or wisdom of God, expressed in his word of promise. But as it is contended by some that God has "neither body nor parts," but is simply "primal energy" or "creative power," we will, before considering how the word was made flesh, endeavor to show the unscripturalness of such a contention. The very passage before us is a sufficient answer in itself; for the logos was with God as well as God. If there had been no God or Theos, there could have been no word or logos; there could have been no mind, reason, speech, or word, without a thinker, reasoner, and speaker; pertinent to this thought, is the passage in Isa. i. 18, "Come now and let us reason together, saith the Lord!" In all creation, wherever we discover reason or intelligence we find living form or organism. The intelligence, reason, and wisdom of every man or woman is the result of living brain formation; as you lower the scale of this brain formation you weaken the intelligence, reason and wisdom. Therefore, as we are told that man was made in the image of God we are logically bound to believe that God is a personal being. We being in the image of God, we can understand that, as our words are with us, and are us, so the logos, word, or wisdom was with God and was God. It is a common thing to speak of a man's words as himself. How often when we hear another repeating what some dear friend had said, we remark that's Robert, or that's James, as the case may be, because we at once recognize our friend in his words.

That it is in this sense that the word or wisdom was with God and was God is very clearly revealed in Prov. viii. Speaking of wisdom it is said: "The Lord possessed me in the beginning of his way, before his works of old. I was set up from everlasting, from the beginning, or ever the earth was * * * * When he prepared the heavens I was there, when he gave to the sea his decree that the waters should not pass his commandment, when he appointed the foundations of the earth then I was by him as one brought up with him, and I was daily his delight, rejoicing always before him.

As is here spoken of wisdom, as John speaks of the logos, or word, and says it was in the beginning with God. Peter says, "by the word of God the heavens were of old;" while Solomon says, "The Lord by wisdom hath founded the earth, by understanding hath he established the heavens." Prov. iii. 19. It is clear, therefore, that the word, which in the beginning was with God and was God, was not a person—the second person in that conceit called trinity, nor yet the person of God, but was that which the word logos signifies, mind, reason, speech, hence the wisdom or purpose of God which was with him as our words or purposes are with us.

But, further, this divine person or God that John says in the beginning the word was with, is called Theos, a word signifying position, or place, hence to dispose a place in order, therefore a very appropriate designation for the Divine Being as the disposer or former of all things, as saith Isaiah, "I am the Lord that maketh all things; that stretcheth forth the heavens alone; that spreadeth abroad the earth by myself." We learn, therefore, that the eternal, uncreated, self-existent Deity is more than a mere idea—more than "primal energy," or "creative force;" he is divine substance from which all things emanate. We are told that "God is a spirit," but we are not to understand by that, that God is a mere phantom, or creation of every man's brain, but the very reverse; for Paul tells us that the last Adam, Christ, was made a Spirit—a life-giving Spirit; yet we know he was substance. If Christ, after he was made Spirit through a resurrection, was divine substance, then God, who is a Spirit, is divine substance.

Jesus says, "As the Father hath life in himself so hath he given to the Son to have life in himself." When did the Son have life in himself? I answer, when he became, through a resurrection from the dead, "a life-giving Spirit," or divine substance like his Father, who is a fountain of life. Thus we reason, and thus saith the Scriptures—Heb. i. 3. Paul says of Jesus, that he was an effulgence of God's glory, and an exact impress of his substance; and again, in Rom. i. 3, Paul speaks of him as the "incorruptible God," or Theos; again, he is said to dwell in light unapproachable. Hence light, incorruptibility, life, wisdom and power, concentrated in one divine substance, is the great self-existing and controlling power of the universe, called a Spirit—the Creator and Upholder of all things; in whom we, and all things live, move and exist, and "out of whom are all things," whose Spirit radiates the boundless universe and pervades all space—its center Divine Substance, or Deity, its circumference, who can tell! Hence says Paul to the Athenians, "He is not far from every one of us;" and David exclaims, "Whither shall I go from thy presence? If I ascend up into heaven thou art there, and if I make my bed in sheol, behold thou art there."

Such is the Scripture teaching concerning God the Father of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ, who only hath immortality, whom no man hath seen nor can see; whose radiant spirit pervades all things as the ruach, or spirit of life, and is the substratum of every existing thing, from the star of the greatest magnitude to the minutest insect of the air. By his spirit he garnished the heavens with glittering orbs, and spread out the earth beneath with lofty mountains and wide-spread plains, with rippling streams and broad oceans; he clothed the earth with beautiful flora and fitted it for the abode of man.

Such, then, was Deity before the appearance of Jesus, when the word was with God and was God. But we are told that the word was made flesh, and for a moment we may enquire, for what purpose? The answer comes, "To bruise the serpent's head;" "deliver those in bondage," bring many sons into glory," and "make all things new." Gen. iii. 15; Heb. ii. 9, 10, 14, 15; Rev. xxi. 4, 5. But how was the word made flesh? I answer by the logos, word, wisdom, or purpose of Deity being fulfilled, and thus manifesting Deity in the flesh. This "word" made flesh Paul calls the "mystery of godliness"—God manifested in flesh; justified (or perfected) in spirit, seen of messengers, preached unto the nations, believed on in the world, received up in glory. Thus God was manifested in flesh by his word of promise being fulfilled, or his purpose to manifest himself being accomplished.

As an illustration of how the word, wisdom or purpose of Deity became flesh, we have but to consider how our words take form or are corporealized. Every man's words take form who builds for himself a residence if he be his own architect. The residence he builds is first in his brain as thought. Having perfected in his mind the kind of structure he will build in every particular he puts his thoughts into words, which are then an expression of his purpose, and which in the hands of the builder take form, and the structure is his words corporealized, and as we look at the structure we see the wisdom and peculiarities of the architect.

So the word, or logos, that was made flesh, in the beginning was with God and was God, being his wisdom and purpose to manifest himself in the woman's seed, or flesh, and when the wisdom and purpose of God was made known it was then his word, which in due time became corporealized in the person of the Son of Mary by the Holy Spirit vivifying the life principle in the womb of the Handmaid of God, and in set time was born, the child Jesus, as recorded by John. The word was made flesh, and dwelt among us, and we beheld his glory, (when he was transfigured on the mount) the glory of the only begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth.

That Deity would manifest himself in flesh had been the word and purpose of God from the beginning expressed in the promise that the "woman's seed should bruise the serpent's seed in the head," Gen. iii. 15; in the promise of Shiloh from Judah, Gen. xlix. 10; in the promise of the scepired star out of Jacob, Num. xxiv. 17; in the promise of a seed to Abraham who should possess the gate of his enemies, Gen. xxii. 17; in the promise of the divine Son assured to David, 2 Sam. vii. 14, to be born of a virgin to rule on David's throne, Isa. ix. 6, 7: and lastly in the promise to Mary that she should bring forth a son who should be called the Son of the Highest, to whom God would give the throne of David, and that he should reign over the house of Jacob forever. Luke, i. 32–34.

Not only so, but when God would send Moses down to Egypt to bring up Israel, Moses asked what name he should give to Israel. Ex. iii. 13–15. As rendered in King James' version it reads, "God said, I am that I am. Thus shalt thou say unto the children of Israel, I am hath sent me unto you." The Hebrew words rendered "I am that I am," are Yahweh asher yahweh, and according to the best critics is very improperly rendered. The passage should read, "I will be who I will be. Thus shalt thou say unto the children of Israel, I will be hath sent me unto you." He further tells them in verse 15, "This is my name forever, and this is my memorial unto all generations." We see then that Israel was to remember that God would from that time be known as Yahweh, or "I will be" again in Ex. vi. 3, God tells Moses that he appeared unto Abraham, Isaac and Jacob by the name of Ail Shaddai—Hebrew—rendered in our version "God Almighty," but a better rendering would read, "the strength of the Mighty Ones, but by my name Yahweh, or I will be, I was not known unto them." It appears then that before God appeared unto Moses at the bush he was not known by the name of Yahweh, I will be; but by his name Ail Shaddai, the strength of the Mighty Ones; but after that time he was to be known by his name I will be. It was to be a memorial name unto all generations.

In the consideration of this memorial name given to Israel the question very naturally arises, I will be who? or what? The answer is given in Ex. vi. 6: I will take you to me for a people, and I will be to you Elohim, or Mighty Ones, and ye shall know I am Yahweh your Elohim—literally I am he who will be your Mighty Ones.

This promise or word of Deity commenced to be fulfilled by the "word" becoming flesh in the person or substance of Jesus as the Captain, Head, Chief, or first born of the Mighty Ones of Israel, in whom Deity has declared he will be manifested, and being justified or made perfect in spirit, or exalted to the high and heavenly estate of incorruptibility and life, they will constitute the rulers and governors of that new heaven and earth, or creation, of which Jesus is the Alpha and Omega.

We discover then that Jesus was not the eternal self-existent uncreated God in person, but the Son of God—the logos, or word made flesh in fulfillment of the promise made to Israel that he who was known to Abraham, Isaac and Jacob as, "Ail Shaddai"—"Strength of the Mighty Ones," would become Israel's Saviors. Though God made known his memorial name to Israel through Moses at the bush, yet it was to be a long time after before the Yahweh name would be manifested. Now as Jesus was the first to manifest the name, (see John xvii. 6) and as he was born of the Virgin Mary he could not have pre-existed as a person. Mark, it was the eternal, and self-existent God that was to become Israel's Mighty Ones, and not a pre-existent Son. It is clear then that when the logos that was with God and was God became flesh in the person of Jesus as the Savior of Israel, the promise had commenced to be fulfilled, and the Yahweh name was made manifest by him who is the first born among many brethren; and being immersed by John in the waters of the Jordan, and anointed by the Spirit descending upon him he became Jesus Christ, that is Jesus the Anointed, and God declared him to be his only begotten Son in whom he was well pleased. Thus Jesus in his flesh bore the nature of man, in his mind the character of God; in other words he was human in nature but divine in character. Therefore Paul says, (Gal. iv. 4) "When the fullness of time was come, God sent forth his Son, made of a woman, and under the law." He was begotten not of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God. "No man," says John, "hath seen God at time, the only begotten Son who is in the bosom of the Father, he hath declared him."

It being the purpose of the Deity to be manifested in persons of Adam's race, who shall be his name bearers—a multitude of Mighty Ones of whom Jesus is Chief, it follows, that whoever believes that Jesus was begotten by Joseph, or that he was a pre-existed Son, or second person in the Trinity, makes void the purpose of God, and virtually sets aside the only name under heaven whereby man can be saved—the Yahweh name, which is "the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit;" whereas those having a comprehensive knowledge of the things of the kingdom and name, and evidencing a hearty belief of the same by being immersed for the remission of sins, are thereby introduced into the all-saving name, and become like Christ their Chief, and name-bearers of Deity.

From what we have written it will, we think, appear clear that Jesus was not mere son of man, nor the self-existent Deity, but the product of Deity—the Son of God. In the flesh he manifested the name and character of Yahweh, and being justified or perfected in spirit through a resurrection of the dead to the high and exalted estate of incorruptibility and life, or Spirit substance, he was the Yahweh or "I will be" manifestation of him whom no man hath seen nor can see, both in character and in nature. Being as says Paul, (Heb. i. 3—Diaglott) "An effulgence of his glory and an exact impress of his substance."

By the power of the Father Spirit the body which was of Mary's substance was transformed to Spirit. Being born of Spirit according to the words spoken to Nicodemus, he became Spirit—like his Father a life imparting Spirit, in fulfillment of his own words, as recorded by John v. 26; "As the Father hath life in himself, so hath he given to the Son to have life in himself."

Such then is the Scripture teaching concerning Jesus the seed of the woman and Son of God, in whom was manifested the moral attributes of Deity, and of whom John says: "He dwelt among us, and we beheld his Glory, the Glory as of the only begotten of the Father full of grace and truth."

But as we have already seen, it was not only the purpose of Deity to manifest himself in the person of Jesus Christ but in members of Adam's race; all those who become conformed to the image of his Son, and so become sons of God, and hence bear the name of their Father, and are therefore "gods," or "mighty ones." Jesus Christ is the God-designed pattern, or image, sent forth of God, to which all must conform who would be one of the Elohim of Deity—that great company of kings and priests—called by Peter, "a royal priesthood, an holy nation," to be established at Jerusalem in fulfillment of the words of Yahweh that he will place his name there. See 1 Kings viii. 20–29.

David also says (Psa. cxxxii.) "The Lord hath chosen Zion; he hath desired it for his habitation. This is my rest forever; here will I dwell, for I have desired it." This company of Mighty Ones established at Jerusalem will be the bearers of the name of Deity—that name called by Moses in Deut. xxviii. 58; "This glorious and fearful name—YAHWEH ELOHIM"—the glorious among the nations, God with man.

As Jesus was begotten by the Spirit and manifested the character of God in the flesh, so every one who would become a constituent of this all-saving name must also be begotten of the Spirit and manifest the character of God in the flesh by continuing in the apostle's doctrine and teaching that eventually he may be transformed to Spirit substance and become as Jesus is HOLY SPIRIT NATURE—the exact impress of the nature or substance of the Father's person.

To be begotten of the Spirit, one must give a willing ear to the Spirit word, or words of the Spirit which are the words of Jesus the Anointed, for Peter says: "Thou hast the words of eternal life;" and Jesus himself says, "The words I speak unto you they are Spirit and they are life." Again he says, "If ye continue in my word ye are my disciples indeed."

It is important then to know what are the Spirit begetting words of Jesus. Matt. vi. 33, will lead us in the right direction. "Seek ye first the Kingdom of God and his righteousness," then in accordance with this general instruction he commenced to announce the Kingdom of God, or glad tidings thereof as something to be believed. Mark informs us that, "After John was imprisoned, Jesus came into Galilee publishing the glad tidings of God, and saying, The time has been accomplished, and God's Royal Majesty has approached; reform and believe the good message" Mark i. 14, 15—Diaglott. Again Luke viii. 1, we are informed that Jesus "Went throughout every city and village preaching and showing the glad tidings of the Kingdom of God." Afterwards he called his twelve disciples together, and "Sent them to preach the Kingdom of God." When the people of Nazareth constrained him to remain with them he said, "I must preach the Kingdom of God to other cities also, for therefore am I sent." From the above citations it is evident that the Gospel, or things relating to the Kingdom of God, himself as God's Royal Majesty, or King thereof, were the Spirit begetting words of Jesus, which, if a man understand and believe begets within him a new mind or character, and having complied with God's formula or way of remission of sins, he is regarded as having been begotten of the Spirit and God is manifest in him by the Godly character which results. This is still more evident from Peter's words (1 Peter i. 23–25;) "Being begotten again, not of corruptible seed, but incorruptible by the word of God which liveth and abideth forever * * * and this is the word which has been announced as glad tidings to you."—Diaglott. It is then the gospel, or glad tidings, which is the incorruptible seed by which a man is begotten. This agrees perfectly with the teaching of the Master himself. He tells his disciples, Matt. 13th chapter, that the Son of Man is the sower and the word of the Kingdom the seed sown. If it falls in good ground, which Luke informs us is good and honest hearts, it brings forth fruit, or produces children of the kingdom. An individual being thus begotten of the Spirit and being immersed for the remission of sins, is introduced into the all-saving name—the name of the Father and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit—the one name of the one self-existent and uncreated God in multitudinous manifestation.

All such are a Yahweh manifestation in the flesh—"a new creation in Christ Jesus." When the hour of exaltation shall come and the Father Spirit that dwelleth in them shall transform their vile bodies of flesh, or if dead raise them to incorruptibility and life, they will then have been perfected in Spirit and are therefore the manifestation of Yahweh in Spirit substance, and with Christ Jesus as their head, are the beginning of the new creation of Deity, that new heavens and earth or constitution of things of which the Mosaic was a type. That having served its purpose has been abolished. The time came when according to Paul (Heb. xii. 26) the promise that God would shake not only the earth but the heaven also was fulfilled, and the heavens and earth of that constitution of things which was founded when the Mount burned with fire and the sound of the trumpet and the voice of God caused the people to tremble and Moses to fear and quake, were shaken "once more" and passed away with a great noise, and the elements thereof melted with the fervent heat of God's judgement; "for," says Paul, "our God is a consuming fire." "Nevertheless," says Peter, "we according to his promise look for new heavens and earth wherein dwelleth righteousness." And now that the long and dreary night of Gentile darkness and Jewish stumbling has nearly passed away, we may look for the new creation of Deity to appear; then will Zion awake and put on her strength, and Jerusalem her beautiful garments; then will that great city, the New Jerusalem, the bride, the Lamb's wife—that great multitude, the same bearers of Yahweh, who being a manifestation of Deity, having been born from above, are said to descend from God out of heaven, will be established at Jerusalem, the "City of the great King," as the "new heavens," or ruling power of the new constitution of things or kingdom which Paul says "cannot be moved." Heb. xii. 28.

Then will be fulfilled the prophecy of Isaiah, (li. 11, 16.) "The redeemed of the Lord shall return and come with singing unto Zion * * * I have put my words in thy mouth, I have covered thee in the shadow of my hand, that I may plant the heavens, and lay the foundations of the earth (new heavens and new earth) and say unto Zion, Thou art my people." This having been accomplished, Isa. lxv. 17, 18, will have been fulfilled; "Behold I create new heavens and a new earth; and the former (Mosaic) shall not be remembered nor come into mind. But be ye glad and rejoice forever in that which I create, for behold I create Jerusalem a rejoicing and her people a joy.

Then will be accomplished the work of the Eternal in elaborating by his Spirit from Adam's race a nation of Mighty Ones—Jesus and his bride, who as the New Jerusalem, have descended from God out of Heaven, a body corporate of God's kings and priests, a habitation of eternal wisdom and power. They will be the Abrahamic seed who is to possess the gate of his enemies and give the world a righteous government by which all nations of the earth will be blessed.

To this brief but Scriptural exposition of the word made flesh, and multitudinous manifestation of Deity as the beginning of the new creation, there are a few passages which by some are thought to teach otherwise by implying the pre-existence of Christ as a person. That mode of interpretation that makes a few isolated texts antagonize so prominently expressed doctrine as the "word made flesh," should have no countenance whatever. That the self-existent Eternal All, power or God should be manifested in the woman's seed by the Spirit word becoming flesh is a doctrine underlying the whole plan and purpose of God. An examination of a few of the seemingly antagonistic texts will show the harmony of the whole with the Scriptural exposition we have given.

In John we are told that Christ said to Peter, "He that hath seen me hath seen the Father also, and how sayest thou then show us the Father?" We cannot suppose for a moment that Jesus gave Peter to understand that by looking at him with his eyes he would see the Father, for in that case it would be equal to saying that the flesh born of Mary was the person of the uncreated God, whom no man hath seen nor can see; which would be absurd in the extreme; besides the context would not admit of such a silly conceit. The word "see" in the passage is used in the sense of discerning or seeing with the understanding, a sense in which it frequently occurs. For example John vi. 40, "And this is the will of him that sent me, that every one which seeth (discerneth) the Son and believeth into him may have everlasting life, and I will raise him up at the last day."

So in the passage before us, he that had discerned or understood the Son, had discerned or understood the Father also. A similar passage occurs in Chap. xii. 45: "He that seeth me seeth him that sent me." That is, he that had discerned, understood or known the one had the same. This is made very plain in the xvii. 3: "This is eternal life, that they might know thee, the only true God and Jesus Christ whom he hath sent." The context shows the same sense. "If ye had known me, ye should have known my Father also." Verse 7. "Believest thou not that I am in the Father and the Father in me." Verse 10.

As the disciples were on the day of Pentecost filled with Holy Spirit which spoke through them as he had through the prophets, so Jesus, filled with the Father-Spirit without measure, so that the words he spoke were not simply the words of the child born of Mary, but of the Father which by his Spirit dwelt in him. Hence he said, "The words that I speak unto you, I speak not of myself, but the Father that dwelleth in me, he doeth the works."

Understanding this and the few otherwise obscure passages are made plain. The passage so often cited to prove the pre-existence of Christ—"Before Abraham was I am"—loses all its force to sustain that fleshly conceit. The Father-Spirit speaking through Jesus could well say, before Abraham was I am; or the child Jesus, knowing that he was the logos, word, or wisdom, in the purpose of God, made flesh, and that all things were on account of him, could well say, that before Abraham was I am; that is, I am in the purpose of God before Abraham was. So of all kindred passages.

If it be remembered that the Son said, "I can of mine own self do nothing," but affirms all the doctrine taught, and all the miracles performed of the Father, whose effluence or Spirit rested upon and filled him, it will make many of his "hard sayings" easily understood.

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

There will be a three days meeting of the One Faith, if the Lord is willing, at Pleasant Hill school house, in the southeast corner of Montague Co., Tex., four miles south of Forestburg, and thirty miles west of Gainsville, on the Gainsville & Jacksboro road, and one-half mile west of the old conference ground. Meeting to commence Friday evening, July 21, at 4 o'clock. A general invitation is extended to all. Bro. J. S. Lawyer of Missouri is expected to be present.

B. F. HOLMES.

The Piedmont A. C. C. will hold its fourth annual session with the church at Beaver Creek, N. C., commencing Friday, Aug. 25, and holding over Sunday. Persons traveling by rail will leave the train at Hickory, N. C., and go via Lenoir.

J. J. HARRELSON.

Notice.

The time for Grove Meetings having arrived, I would inform brethren desiring such and wishing my assistance, that I am ready once more to render it. Brethren in any of the Western or Northwestern states who desire can have a tent meeting by making arrangements soon. I can furnish the tent. Address

J. F. WILCOX,
86 Evergreen Place, Chicago.

Soldiers of the Cross Reunion.

It has been decided by the brethren of the One Faith in the South-West to have a Soldier's Reunion at Prugel's Ford, on the Rail Road, eight miles east of Parsons, Kansas, not far from Brother Phillip John. (P. O. Parsons, Kan.) to whom any can write who desire to. Meeting to commence on Friday night, July 14, 1882, and continue over Sunday in camp.

I expect to be there —on my way to Texas—commencing a meeting in Texas 80 miles west of Denniston on the 21st of July, and then through North-Western Texas; I can be addressed at Bethany, Mo.

JOHN S. LAWYER.

The Restitution.

"THE RESTITUTION OF ALL THINGS WHICH GOD HATH SPOKEN BY THE MOUTH OF ALL HIS HOLY PROPHETS SINCE THE WORLD BEGAN."

VOL. XXXI. PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, JULY 12, 1882. NO. 26.

THE RESTITUTION.

TERMS—TWO DOLLARS PER YEAR, Payable in advance. Three and Six Months at the same rate.

Address all Letters and Communications to THE RESTITUTION, Plymouth, Indiana.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

THE RESTITUTION advocates the Gospel restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christian King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked: eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief of the gospel, repentance, and immersion, as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as a result for final salvation.

J. P. WEXTHER.

We have now traced the principal events on the Divine Chart to the "Hour of God's Judgment." Dan. vii. 9, 10; Rev. xix. 7. We have to do, in our future numbers, with the near past, the present, and the near future. May the Ruler of nations give us ability to see the truth, and courage to utter it clearly, and with power. There is a terrible wrong somewhere, God is not worshipped as he demands, and we propose to search out and expose some of the reasons. Christ declared a great truth, when he said, "Ye cannot serve God and Mammon." Great offences, whether individual or national, will wake up terrible retributions. It is true of nations, as well as of persons, "Whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he reap." Who, but the Almighty, could have foreseen, that such a system as the Papacy would shoot up out of the church of Primitive Christianity? It can be accounted for in no other way than this, that it was the proud, Diotrephean (3 John verses 9–12) Scion, engrafted into the old Pagan Roman stock, partaking of its "root and fatness." It finally drew all the nourishment, leaving the old trunk to decay and rot. Though twelve hundred and sixty years it elevated its immense body, and spread out its branches. "The tree grew, and was strong, and the height thereof reached unto heaven, and the sight thereof to the end of all the earth: The leaves thereof (were) fair, and the fruits thereof much, and in it (was) meat for all: the beasts of the field had shadow under it, and the fowls of heaven dwelt in the boughs thereof, and all flesh was fed of it."

Such was literal Babylon under Nebuchadnezzar. Dan. iv. And such was Mystic Babylon in the days of Papal supremacy. And, as was the fate of the literal, under Cyrus, such shall be the utter desolations of the Mystic Babylon under the anti-typical Cyrus—Jesus, the King of kings, and Lord of lords. We are now concerned with one special act of her executive judgment, and the causes which led to her fall. She originated her own downfall. She sowed the seeds of her own destruction. She caused her children, even her officiary, to grow up in ignorance. She banished the Bible; and with it all knowledge, both human and Divine. Show, place, pomp and show were substituted. Every species of vice grew up luxuriantly, and filled the world with pollution. These corruptions produced a reaction, and resulted in the Protestant Reformation. The reformation, after it became powerful, exhibited a spirit that demonstrated her relationship to the mother church. The same proud, worldly, and persecuting spirit: the same love for the nations, and the same political aspirations. Men of the world could not discern any radical difference between National Protestantism and National Catholicism; God's word made the distinction, where any existed. One was the mother church: the others were her daughters. These churches gave birth to a new family—a race of infidels. Protestantism had given only sufficient light to show its own deformities, and those of Romanism. It cast a lurid glare over the institutions and practices of the two churches, without restoring either to Apostolic simplicity. People that read the popular church rather than the Bible called the Christian system priestcraft, and Jesus an impostor.

Following out their own corrupt notions, they began their secret workings against Christianity. They used the press, and their sciences as their most potent armory, from which they cast their deadly shafts.

France, the first of the ten kingdoms that was converted to Papal Christianity, was one of the parts of the empire of Charlemagne, since he reigned over France, Spain, Italy, Germany, and Hungry when, at the Christmas festival, A. D. 800, he was crowned emperor of the Romans; it was, therefore, at times, one of the ruling elements of the restored Romano-German, or Latin empire, and, during the French Revolution, deserved the title of Imperial head. In that nation the Roman Pontiff had always found his most efficient aid. It had been the field of martyrdom. Every acre of her soil had been saturated with their blood. Its people had been more oppressively taxed to sustain the Papal hierarchy than any other subjects of the ten kingdoms. At the time of the commencement of that Revolution, the masses were in a deplorable state. One half the population were serfs or peasants; exceedingly ignorant, and morally degraded. The priesthood had robbed and corrupted them. The inhabitants had, by the force of circumstances, been divided into three classes: (a.) the high; (b.) the middle; (c.) and the low;—the nobility: the clergy; and tiers etat—the third estate. The third estate consisted of two parts: (a.) all professional men not of the nobility, or clergy; (b.) the sans culottes. This last division included the depraved masses. The higher orders were exempt from general taxation, while the lower classes were groaning under the oppressive weight of the national debt. This state of things had commenced under Louis XIV.; had grown rapidly under the reign of Louis XV.; and had come to the full under the commencement of the reign of Louis XVI. Who were the educators of all the downtrodden masses during these corrupt administrations? Three orders of sentiment were drawing out, developing, and moulding a new empire—a power destined by the Divine will soon to attack and overthrow the national altar, and, with it the throne. Who were these great teachers—these three faculties in this French University? The Nobility, the Clergy and the Infidel. Our information is gathered from Thiers, Mignet, Alison, Carlyle, Bourrienne's Memoirs of Napoleon, L. Scott's Life of Napoleon, and from others. Our aim is to place before the reader a clear view of the origin, nature, and Divine purpose of the French Revolution. Its prophetic and historic records will be compared and their identity distinctly noted, in every element.

Keep in mind the following:—(1.) France was one of the ten kingdoms; (2.) In every kingdom the Pope had a church and its hierarchy; (3.) The ten formed the Mystic Babylon; each being a tenth; (4.) In each of the ten kingdoms the church was sustained, at first, by the civil power; the Altar was behind the Throne; (5.) The Altar could not be overthrown, without first pulling down the Throne; civil regal authority had to be removed; (6.) The Throne could not be overturned without bringing some external force; for, in France, especially, regal power was sustained by the Nobility and the Clergy; both classes constituting, as a titled body, one-fifth of the entire population; (7.) A new element had to be developed, of sufficient strength itself to accomplish this superhuman work. (8.) The time had come (Dan. vii. 9–26) when God's executive judgments were to begin on the harlot—Mystic Babylon. (9.) Since the French division (first ward) first filled her cup (Rev. xvi. 9) as she had shed the most of martyrs' blood, it was proper that she should be the first to drink her doubled cup. (10.) As Cyrus, a heathen, had to be educated to accomplish the overthrow of literal Babylon, (Isa. xliv. 28; xlv. 1–5), so, in like manner, an executioner of Divine wrath, had to be reared up and educated for a similar work on Mystic Babylon.

These ten particulars must be kept in mind as we progress. Where could such a body be found in France? The elements of that power existed in the tiers etat; and of that class the sans culottes, was, by nature, the best adapted to that work. We shall now proceed to trace their education, progress. And, this is the least out of the abyss. Rev. xi. 7.

History—French Revolution.—This terrible politico-ecclesiastical convulsion ("earthquake") was unlike any that the world had ever seen. It was the uprising of the lowest strata of society to dislocate and destroy the upper strata. It was the people—sans culottes against the Altar and the Throne; an effort to annihilate all title of distinction; to reduce society to one homogeneous mass. As we have before stated, their education was peculiarly adapted to the accomplishment of such an end. The nobles, by their example had taught the people the most corrupt principles. By their treatment, they had waked up the latterest hatred, and an unquenchable thirst for revenge.

The clergy, in addition, had taught them, in heart, to hate the Roman church; and, therefore, to despise its instruction. These two classes had prepared the masses to receive into willing minds the teachings of a third class, the school of infidels. This school was governed by such men as Rousseau and Voltaire. It was afterwards the school of French Encyclopedists. These writings circulated through France, producing their fruits among all classes.

The tiers etat, borne down by the Court, and harassed by the noblesse, was itself separated into corporations, which retaliated upon each other the evils and oppressions that they suffered from their superiors. They possessed scarcely a third part of the soil, upon which they were compelled to pay feudal services to their lords, tithes to their priests, and imposts to the king. In compensation for so much sacrifice they enjoyed no rights; had no share in the administration; and were admitted to no public employments.

Elements were gathering for a terrible outburst. The people had been driven to madness. They saw no reasons for such oppression. Among the three classes, especially among the tiers etat, sects of philosophers, such as Voltaire, Rousseau, Diderot, Raynal, and the Encyclopedists, started investigations on all subjects, civil and ecclesiastical. They originated in the abuses of the Roman priesthood. In those free discussions they investigated the social equality of the human race. Even young nobles became interested. These investigations elicited very general interest and worked, like leaven, among the masses.

Voltaire aimed, in politics, to bring about Republicanism; in ethics, to subvert the entire frame-work of society, and introduce universal license; in religion, to do away with faith grounded on convictions of reason, and to substitute in its stead the cant of instinct and sensibility. These investigations gave rise to the Girondins, and Jacobins, and the worship of the Goddess of Reason. The corruptions of the court of Louis XV. helped the revolutionary principles. The corrupt practices of the noblesse and the clergy increased the convulsions. Everywhere corruption stalked abroad with unblushing front. It wore the general's uniform, the judge's robe, the bishop's hood. It had the privilege of the entree at court, and sat next the monarch at the royal banquet. The most important functions of government were carried on in the boudoirs of mistresses; the petticoat decided questions of war or peace. The tiers etat were then intelligent enough to see the state of France. The peasantry were oppressed by the game laws; could not carry on agriculture. Their houses dark, comfortless; almost destitute of furniture; their dress, ragged and miserable—their food the coarsest, and the most humble fare; terrible feudal burdens. Pride and insolence of the old aristocratic families—slaves to conventional etiquette. They built up a wall of demarkation between themselves and the rest of community, as if they were fashioned of more "precious porcelain;" held all the useful arts in lofty contempt; and, were jealous of even the slightest whisper of opposition to their caprices.

Her life is not a desert who treasureth the love of her helpmate; for the tears she lets drop at his sorrows shall spring up at her feet in fountains of living water, cooler than the snows of the mountains.

ISRAEL IN EXILE.

I am glad to observe that some interest is taken in this subject because it is well to hear both sides. Mr. Reeve seeks to show that during the exile, Israel has increased in numbers. I expected, however, that besides adducing Scripture passages and arguments thereon, to prove a diffidency in exile, some more special notice would be taken of the positive testimonies quoted of no threatening decrease.

I quite agree in the axiom "that when the Lord comes and unites the twelve tribes of Israel they will be more than two nations." Mr. R. applies this axiom to Ephraim and Manasseh: the two sons of Joseph. His argument seems to be that Jacob in his blessing, and Moses in his prophecy regarding Ephraim and Manasseh, predict great increase of numbers in both tribes, and that seeing that one is to exceed the other in numbers, this must be realized before the gathering by the Lord; because after that event, distinction of tribes will cease. But while the twelve tribes will constitute only one nation after the gathering, I see no evidence that they will cease to exist as separate tribes; and unless this can be proved, there will be ample scope for any degree of difference in point of numbers in the various tribes. And there is some indication that each tribe will have a separate existence as well as a separate territory.

In the closing chapter of Ezekiel's prophecy, which is generally allowed to refer to some time still future, all the tribes are enumerated (including Ephraim and Manasseh as distinct tribes) with the portion of the Holy Land to be allotted to each. It seems to me, therefore, that there will be no lack of opportunity, after the restoration of the twelve tribes, and their union as one nation, for great increase of numbers, as well as for one tribe exceeding another numerically. There is therefore no necessity for placing increase in the period of exile.

I may also here refer to the former possession of the land of promise by the twelve tribes as affording scope for the excess of Ephraim over Manasseh his elder brother, in point of numbers. Mr. Reeve says "they were not a separate people at that time," and that "at the time when Israel drove out the inhabitants from Canaan Manasseh exceeded Ephraim in numbers by nearly 20,000." But we require to bear in mind that at the giving of the law nearly forty years before the entrance into Canaan, Ephraim exceeded Manasseh by 8,300. See Num. i. 33, 35; ii. 18, 21.

We have no information as to the cause of the falling off in the tribe of Ephraim during the forty years' wandering in the wilderness, and can only surmise that it may have been due to exceptional circumstances, not likely to obtain in the settled condition of matters to be enjoyed in the land of promise, and that during a period of over 700 years. And let it be noted here that the tribes of Ephraim and Manasseh were, during this long period, perfectly distinct the one from the other, with territory allocated to each by Joshua acting under the authority of Jehovah. The disruption of the nation into two kingdoms in the reign of Rehoboam, did not affect the distinct existence of each tribe.

The superiority of Ephraim was also shown during the sojourn in the wilderness, in the allocation of the twelve tribes in four camps, one toward each of the four cardinal points with the tabernacle in the center. The directions given were: "On the west side shall be the standard of the camp of Ephraim," and then the tribes of Manasseh and Benjamin were to be ranged under his standard.

While I am not aware that we have any information as to the numbers of the various tribes after their possession of Canaan, it seems worthy of note that several circumstances combined to favor the prosperity of Ephraim

1. His territory occupied the central portion of the land, a little to the north of Jerusalem, and extending from the Mediterranean Sea to the Jordan.

2. The capital of the kingdom of the ten tribes was always within the territory of Ephraim—possibly a principal reason why the name Ephraim was sometimes applied to the kingdom of the ten tribes.

3. The Tabernacle, which was the center of worship for the whole nation in their united condition prior to the erection of the Temple, remained at Shiloh in the territory of Ephraim for 350 years.

4. Both Joshua and Jeroboam (the first king of the ten tribes) belonged to the tribe of Ephraim.

To these favorable circumstances may be added the fact that the portion of Ephraim is one of the most fertile districts of the country. Even in modern times it is so spoken of. Dr. Russell in his work on Palestine, thus refers to it, "The ancient Shechem is one of the most prosperous towns in the Holy Land, being still the metropolis of a rich and extensive country, and abounding in great agricultural wealth."

In this period also, therefore, it must be admitted there was no lack of the conditions necessary for great increase of the tribe of Ephraim, and abundance of favorable circumstances far over outstripping Manasseh in regard to numbers. There can therefore be no need to find any fulfillment of the predictions of Jacob and Moses in the time of exile.

Besides this argument, which I take to be his principal one, Mr. R. cites several other passages of Scripture, which I shall briefly notice.

But let it not be lost sight of that my position is that as a punishment for disobedience, exile from the land of promise, and during that exile, diminution of numbers, and that as regards the whole twelve tribes, was threatened by Jehovah. The words are plain—"The Lord shall scatter you among the nations, and ye shall be left few in number among the heathen, whither the Lord shall lead you." Deut. iv. 27. There is no exception here in favor of any of the twelve tribes over any of the others; diminution of numbers is, therefore, the doom of all the tribes during exile from the land of their fathers.

It is farther to be noted that although the name Ephraim was given to the kingdom of the ten tribes, this was owing to the influence possessed by the tribe in virtue of the various circumstances mentioned above, as well as others perhaps; and not by any means in virtue of any relationship of Ephraim to the ten tribes such as that sustained by Jacob to the twelve. From this it is evident that predictions regarding Ephraim are not necessarily to be extended beyond himself or the tribe descended from him, so as to apply to the ten tribes, although sometimes called by his name.

It may be well here to note two expressions in the blessing of Jacob that are liable to be misunderstood. These are: "Let them (Manasseh and Ephraim) grow into a multitude in the midst of the earth"—and "his seed (Ephraim's) shall become a multitude of nations." Regarding the first, the word rendered "earth" is often and properly rendered "land." We have instance of this use by Jacob himself in xlviii. 5, and also in xlix. 16. Dr. Samuel Lee, in his Hebraw Lexicon, under this word (Aretz) gives—

1. "The earth, generally, as opposed to the heaven."

2. "Any land or country, as land of the Havilah."

The other phrase, "multitude of nations" is given in the margin "fulness of nations." The first was literally fulfilled in the land of Israel when the tribes of Manasseh and Ephraim were located "in the midst of the land." These two tribes occupied a central position in Palestine, the one contiguous to the other, and both extending from the Mediterranean to the Jordan. Together their number exceeded that of any other tribe, being 85,200; while Judah, the next largest, numbered 76,500, and Simeon, the smallest, but 22,200. Num. xxvi.

These numbers only represent men twenty years old and upward, able to bear arms, the actual population being estimated at three or four fold the numbers mentioned. Ephraim and Manasseh must thus have numbered not less than a quarter of a million.

The second blessing—"Ephraim's seed shall become a multitude of nations," has another reading in the margin—"a fulness of nations." I presume our Anglo Israel friends would have a difficulty in finding anything like a literal fulfilment of the phrase "multitude of nations" in the history of the Anglo-Saxon race. I have seen no attempt to show this. On the other hand "fulness of nations," or if we take the first meaning of Dr. Lee's Hebrew Lexicon, "a filling of nations," we may find a fulfilment in the past history of Ephraim in the land of promise.

The Israelites were to "drive out the nations of Canaan" and occupy or fill their place. Though as a general rule they failed to do this, there is some evidence that Ephraim succeeded.

The following historical fact shows at once the greatness of both Ephraim and Manasseh, and the necessity they were under to have more territory as well as to drive out their predecessors.

"And the children of Joseph spake unto Joshua, saying, Why hast thou given me but one lot and one portion to inherit, seeing I am a great people, forasmuch as the Lord hath blessed me hitherto? And Joshua answered them, If thou be a great people, then get thee up to the wood country, and cut down for thyself there in the land of the Perizzites and of the giants, if mount Ephraim be too narrow for thee. And the children of Joseph said, The hill is not enough for us; and all the Canaanites that dwell in the land of the valley have chariots of iron, both they who are of Beth-shean and her towns, and they who are of the valley of Jezreel. And Joshua spoke unto the house of Joseph, even to Ephraim and to Manasseh, saying, Thou art a great people, and hast great power; thou shalt not have one lot only; but the mountain shall be thine; for it is a wood, and thou shalt cut it down; and the outgoings of it shall be thine; for thou shalt drive out the Canaanites, though they have iron chariots, and though they be strong." Joshua xvii. 14–18.

These remarks seem to me to be necessary to clear up a little obscurity that our translation throws over the words of Jacob, and to render it unnecessary to seek a fulfilment of blessings during the time of the infliction of curses denounced upon the people for disobedience.

Mr. Reeve next cites Hosea i. 8–11, which he says "sets forth a multiplicity of seed in this age." In order to sustain this interpretation, however, he requires to assume that "the place where it was said ye are not my people," etc., is the land of their dispersion. But why could this not have taken place in their own land and before their dispersion? Observe it is God who is the speaker. But where has God so spoken to them while in exile? Did he not, on the contrary, so speak to them in their own land by this very prophet, as recorded in this passage? Hosea lived in Samaria and prophesied to the ten tribes in particular and that during a period when their sins had brought upon them impending judgments. They had ceased to be the people, or rather nation, of, God, but when they should be gathered and united again with Judah, then it should be said to them in the same place, Ye are the sons of the living God. See also Ezek. xxxvii. 27. Observe here too a marginal reading in verse 10. Where it reads in the text "in the place" it is in the margin "instead of that"—so that there is no necessity for the idea of the same locality for the two opposite sayings, I understand the word "land" in verse 11, to refer to the land of their dispersion—Assyria.

As to Jer. xxxi. 7, 8, and Isa. iv. 1–7, I do not see anything calling for remark; the restoration and subsequent increase covers all the statements in these passages.

Isa. xlix. 19–21, is said to support the idea of "children being given in their desolate condition." There is here a slight but very important divergence from the words of the prophet, which are "thy waste and desolate PLACES and the LAND of thy destruction." Surely "the waste and desolate places" of Israel are too well known to students of the prophetic word to need any explanation. See Isaiah lxi. etc.

Jer. iii. 12–18: Jeremiah prophesied long after the captivity of the ten tribes, and if this passage teaches anything clearly it shows that the restoration of the ten tribes shall be in small numbers—"one of a city and two of a family"—which is followed by the statement, "And it shall come to pass when ye be multiplied and increased in the land."

Quoting Jer. xxxi. 35–37, Mr. Reeve says, "We learn the perpetuity of a nation of Israel, that is, some of the seed of Israel would continually exist as a nation." But supposing some portion of Israel at present exists as a nation (which I do not admit) the passage quoted does not predict any such existence. It simply says that Israel shall not "cease from being a nation, FOR EVER"—that is, shall not forever cease. Their future national existence in their own land shall amply realize this prediction.

Mr. Reeve maintains that Deut. iv. 27–31, shows multiplicity of seed of the ten tribes and females in numbers of Judah at the return. The only reason I can find stated by him for this is that Judah did not worship idols after the return from Babylon. But such a reason as this should tell the other way. If Judah was cursed of his idolatry why should he be subjected to the curse of decrease, and Israel, of whose curse nothing is known, enjoy the blessing of increase? Their "seeking the Lord with all their heart in the latter days, and being thereby blessed, is fully explained by the same writer, Moses, in Deut. xxx. 1–11, partly quoted by Mr. Reeve. In this passage it is distinctly said that their "returning to the Lord and obeying his voice is to be according to all that I command thee this day; and again, as keeping his commandments and his statutes which are written in this book of the law."

It cannot be maintained that any portion of the Anglo-Saxon race is fulfilling these conditions. And the consequent blessing is no less plainly declared: "And the Lord thy God will bring thee into the LAND WHICH THY FATHERS POSSESSED, and thou shalt possess it, and he will do thee good and MULTIPLY THEE ABOVE THY FATHERS." Observe the order here—restoration first, multiplication afterwards.

I am sorry to occupy so much space with these remarks; but it is not easy to condense when so many points require to be noticed, and explanations and reasons given. Besides, objections must be reproduced in some form, so that the reader may follow the argument, and be able to judge how far objections have been met. I trust the readers will now be better able to see the bearings of the subject from a Scripture point of view, and also that our Anglo-Israel friends may be prepared to reconsider the evidence adduced in my former papers, that both exile and decrease of numbers were threatened to the whole twelve tribes without exception, and that consequently increase of the Anglo-Saxons cannot be a valid proof of English identity with Israel.

Soldiers of the Cross Reunion.

It has been decided by the brethren of the One Faith in the South-West to have a Soldier's Reunion at Pringel's Ford, on the Rail Road, eight miles east of Parsons, Kansas, not far from Brother Phillip John, (P. O. Parsons, Kan.) to whom any can write who desire to. Meeting to commence on Friday night, July 14, 1882, and continue over Sunday in camp.

I expect to be there—on my way to Texas—commencing a meeting in Texas 80 miles west of Denison on the 21st of July, and then through North-Western Texas; I can be addressed at Bethany, Mo.

JOHN S. LAWYER.

Notice.

The time for Grove Meetings having arrived, I would inform brethren desiring such and wishing my assistance, that I am ready once more to render it. Brethren in any of the Western or Northwestern states who desire can have a tent meeting by making arrangements soon. I can furnish the tent. Address

J. F. WILCOX,

THE RESTITUTION.

S. A. CHAPLIN, EDITOR.

Plymouth, Indiana, July 12, 1882.

BROTHER SIMONS' article will appear next week.

THANKS to Brother Hayes for late English papers.

OF the work "The Life Everlasting" the July number of the Rainbow says: "An exhaustive work on this important subject."

THE first number of a new paper—The Millennarian—published by G. M. Myers, Lanark, Ill., has come to hand. Terms $1 per year.

WE have not written all the local sketches connected with our late visit East that we intended. Will try to give some more hereafter.

WE have on hand three nicely printed and instructive tracts by Silas Bean, an English author, that we will more fully notice hereafter.

THE Eastern question is opened up once more. At seven o'clock this morning, July 11, the British cannon commenced hurling the missiles of destruction into Alexandria in Egypt. The war that was begun this morning may effect great changes in the Orient before it closes. Prophecy is now rapidly fulfilling.

Selections.

"THE SLEEP OF THE DEAD."

Editor Ontario:

DEAR SIR—With reference to the above subject, there is one passage which, if carefully considered, ought to settle the question. Take Eccl. xii. 7—"Then shall the dust return to the earth as it was, and the spirit shall return to God who gave it" (as it was). First, is this a truthful statement of man's end, and if so, is it an end of all men? Then this being the case, the spirits of the wicked as well as the spirits of the righteous "return to God who gave it." This being true, if the spirits of the righteous enter heaven, so do the wicked. If, then, we assume (for in the absence of proof it is only assumption) that the spirits of the righteous enter upon the active engagements of the glorified, (imagine being glorified before resurrected!), then we must admit that the spirits of the wicked also enter upon the same enjoyments; for, according to the passage quoted, there is no difference. "The spirit shall return to God who gave it." This ought also to settle the question as to the soul. What is the soul, and where is it after death? If any one desires an answer to this question, I have no objection to giving what I understand to be the answer. It sounds strange, however, to hear men talk of the soul and the spirit as though they were one and the same, and mixing them up in utter confusion. Surely, the Bible does not so confound them. When it declares that "they (the disciples) thought they had seen a spirit," it does not say "they thought they had seen a soul;" and so with other passages where spirit is mentioned, there is no allusion to souls in any of them.

In conclusion, Mr. Editor, I regret that men cannot discuss these solemn subjects in a more lovely and loving temper. I refer more particularly to "Frankonia," who, in his last communication, uses language not at all in accord with the Sacred Truth, which he discusses. I hope that in future, for the good of all concerned, they may be avoided; and if we can learn anything, one from another, let us learn it in a spirit of meekness, (for we are none of us too wise), and not as though everything depended on whether "my views are right."

Very truly yours,
LEARNER.

Editor Ontario:

DEAR SIR—I would like to give utterance to a few thoughts in connection with the discussion which has been conducted by certain parties, through the medium of your paper, on the subject of "The sleep after death."

I desire as a co-laborer in the vineyard of the Master, to give a few words of loving advice to my brethren, who have so freely been giving vent to their views on this subject.

With that man of God, D. L. Moody, I hold it wiser on the part of Christians, to confine the arguing of these non-essential questions to their own circles. I think such discussions conducted publicly, and in such a manner that he who runs may read—often by those incompetent to the task—are harmful. Harmful not only to the young believer, who has been walking but a few weeks, months or years in the "way of life," but also to the unquickened soul seeking after peace. To the young Christian it is decidedly unsettling to see older and more experienced brothers so utterly at variance and exercising (but too frequently) so little charity in the discussion of this or her pet theory. And to the sinner, seeking after Christ, it is extremely discouraging to see those calling themselves by the name of Christ holding such widely different views as to the correct interpretation of the Scripture. Arguing in his own mind that no one at least if not both must be holding a false doctrine, that they are likely to be in error with regard to material issues. I cannot but think that it was some like subject that St. Paul had in mind, when in his second epistle to Timothy he warned him to avoid "vain and foolish" questions, knowing that they "gendered strife." My own experience has been that those Christians who spend most time and material (but very little charity) in arguing these immaterial points, are those who are doing least—both in the church and out of it—towards winning souls for Christ.

Brethren, life at best is short. Let us, then, who have been made nigh by the blood of Christ, direct all our best forces to the ingathering of precious souls, that in the day when we see the "King in his beauty," we may each and all be able with great joy to present unto him our crown sparkling with many bright jewels whose lustre will never fade or grow dim.

CHRISTIAN.

"THE SLEEP OF THE DEAD."

Editor Ontario:

DEAR SIR—Although my last communication was mutilated almost beyond recognition, and so as to be scarcely readable, yet as I cannot accept of the "light" which my friend "Truth Seeker" has thrown upon my "text," I am driven in self-defence to trouble you again.

Now, as to the word sheol, and any and all other Hebrew and Greek words. I have nothing whatever to do with them, not being acquainted with those languages. I am contented to take my English Bible as I find it (not ignoring its defects) believing that it has been translated in the English, in a manner to convey to the English mind just what it conveyed to the Hebrew mind, as perfectly as a thorough knowledge of both languages could translate it. But apart from this idea, it is my practice to endeavor to gather the spirit of the truth, and not the letter. ("For the letter killeth, but the spirit giveth life"). But let us look at a few passages in the "light" which my friend "Truth Seeker" throws upon the word "spirit," and see if it will make sense or meaning of it. "Who knoweth the spirit of man that goeth upward, or the spirit of the beast that goeth downward;" or who knoweth the breath of man that goeth upward, or the breath of the beast that goeth downward. Now, if breath is meant, the passage is not true, because we do know the breath, and can feel it, and comprehend its nature and effects, but the spirit can no man comprehend.

Again, "The spirits of just men made perfect," or the "breath" of just men made perfect. The meaning of this passage, I take it, is, that the "spirits of just men," when clothed with God-given, glorified undying bodies, will then be "made perfect," ("showing that the spirit waiteth for the adoption, to-wit, the redemption of the body"). That will be the consummation of the Christian's hope, when the undying spirit (not breath) shall be clothed with an undying body, ("for God giveth it a body as it pleaseth him"). "Then shall be brought to light the saying, (and not till then), death is swallowed up in victory." For then, and then only, will the victory be complete, and the spirit made perfect."

But again, "They thought they had seen a spirit," or "they thought they had seen a breath." Whether right or wrong, the disciples evidently believed that spirits were something more than breath, and Christ says (Luke xxiv. 39), "for a spirit hath not flesh and bones as ye see we have." Now, here is a living force, which presents itself to the mind in the form of a person (for Christ does not dispel that idea, further than as to the materiality of spirit.)

Again, (John iv. 24), "God is a spirit," hence all spirit hath life, and not only so, but all spirit giveth life. That is its essential element. And so with these and hundreds of other evidences of the spirit life. I cannot (with all due deference to "Truth Seeker's" views) accept the theory of "the death of the dead" (spirit and all), but must still occupy the "middle chamber" between total death and perfect life, until my Lord comes, when he shall say "come up higher."

Yours.
LEARNER.

THE ISRAELITES IN EGYPT.

Mr. R. S. Poole has been lecturing in London on the "Explorations in the Delta of the Nile," with special reference to the residence of the Hebrews in Egypt and the Exodus. The Academy says: "The starting-point of reckoning was the date of the Exodus, which the Biblical genealogies, counting back from David, placed at about B. C. 1300, a date consistent with Egyptian chronology. The period of the sojourn was reckoned at 430 years and the administration of Joseph would thus fall in the time of the Shepherd Kings, while their successors of the XVIIIth Dynasty would mark the beginning of the period of oppression. All Egyptologists now hold Ramses II. and his son Menephtah to be the great oppressor and the Pharoah of the Exodus respectively. Their combined reigns correspond with the length of the persecution in the Bible, and their characters in their own records are the counterparts of the Biblical portraits of the inflexible tyrant and his vacillating successor. The evidence of Manetho and the researches of Lepsius and Brugsch have placed this beyond doubt. The Egyptian evidence of the sojourn is very scanty, because excavation in the Hebrew territory has been neglected, and as yet not a single historical inscription of the Shepherd Kings has come to light. Dr. Brugsch's researches have reconstructed the map of Egypt, but a number of names remain to be indentified with existing sites, which cannot be accomplished until these sites can be explored. The town of Goshen, the capital of the Arabian nome, has been discovered in the ancient Kesem, and still survives in the village of Tele-Fakous. The field of Zoan is the adjacent Tanite nome. The only other site mentioned in the Pentateuch which has been indentified is Migdol. Mr. Poole referred to the various theories as to the route of the Exodus, and said that the one proposed by Dr. Schleiden in 1858, and defined on new evidence by Brugsch, was no doubt correct, except as to the passage of the sea. The starting-place, Rameses, was indentified with Zoan, and Magdalon was certainly the place marked by the mound called Tell-es-Samoot, north-east of Lake Balish."

Restoration of the Jews.

That the Jews hope for restoration to their own land is often denied, and it is true that a portion of the race have no desire to return; but it is no less true that the majority of the Jews still look towards Palestine with longing eyes. An illustration of this fact occurs in a sermon preached in December in the Nineteenth Street Synagogue, New York, by the rabbi, Rev. H. P. Mendes. He said: "The restoration which our prophets emphatically declare is to be forever, and the gathering of the scattered of Jacob, which is to be from the east and the west, shall yet come to pass. The ancient Abrahamic blessing is yet to be fulfilled. We are not only to be a 'blessing to all nations of the earth,' but we are to have power 'in their gates.' As the American abroad respects the laws of the land of his residence, and can become a respected and valued member of society, but yet looks upon his own land with undiminished love, so the Jew in another land than his own will respect its laws, but yet shall his heart beat with affection when he thinks of Zion. Restoration! How potent a word! Changed shall be his sorrowful path, changed to a triumphal progress; the heart torn with agony to a heart at last consoled; the winds of hatred forever hushed; the clouds of persecution forever dispersed; and the martyr nation of history at last with a country of its own." Dr. Mendes also believes that the restoration is close at hand. On this point he said: "When the disintegration of the Turkish Empire reaches its final stage, and the European powers responsible for the great divide, the same clashing interests which before prevented European harmony in dealing with the moribund Sultan, will be intensified when they have to consider Palestine, by geographical position, of supreme importance in preserving the balance of power, and whose neutrality must be secured. If the restoration of our people were the solution of the difficulty, what would it be but the fulfillment of prophecy, 'Behold, I will lift up mine hand to the Gentiles, and set up my standard to the peoples.' This is but a human interpretation; but if even a human perception discloses one so feasible, why shall we hesitate to believe that Heaven can work its own way?"—Christian Herald.

Report of the Free Bible Meeting at Millbrook, June 15 to 18, 1882.

Elder O. R. L. Crozier, Pastor of the Millbrook church, elected chairman, who delivered a very able address of welcome in behalf of the church, which made all feel at home, and that the meeting was just what it claimed to be, i. e., free.

The programme was carried out according to previous notice as near as possible. The able manner in which the following subjects were handled is worthy of special praise. The Restitution, what does it include, by H. R. Kendall. Israel in the next age, and the nations in the next age, by B. Woodward, and Rulership by O. R. L. Crozier. The Bible class meetings, in which free discussion took place on the following subjects and many others, were very profitable and instructive. Viz: Abraham; What is the difference between eternal life and immortality? When will probation end? If there is probation after the advent who will have it? Who is to judge the world? Who will reign with Christ in the next age? What is the horn spoken of in Dan. viii. 9–11 to represent? Who took away the daily sacrifice and cast down the sanctuary? What is the woman spoken of in Rev. xii. 1 to represent? Explain Rev. xx. 10. How shall we study the Scriptures? Is the Holy City spoken of in Rev. xxi. a literal city or not, etc.

The prayer and social meetings in which many participated were rich feasts, as the fruits of the spirit were there in abundance. Sacrament at the close.

This meeting was a perfect success for the object for which it was called, demonstrating the fact that people of different opinions can come together day after day and discuss different subjects in the Bible, without manifesting any unkind or unchristian feelings. Love and good will pervaded throughout the entire meeting without a single exception. Praise the Lord.

O. T. WHITE,
Secretary, Pro Tem.

North Western Michigan Conference.

It may be interesting to some of the brethren to know that on the last session of this conference the following business was transacted, to-wit:

Resolved, That we reconsider the vote of the conference approving the action of the Forreston convention. The chair decided that it was not parliamentary. The decision of the chair was lost by a vote of 10 to 7. Moved that the resolution approving the action of the Forreston convention be laid on the table and that the chairman produce the report of said convention. Motion prevailed. Brother O. R. L. Crozier introduced the following resolution, to-wit:

Whereas, Considerable dissatisfaction is expressed in regard to the action of the Forreston convention, and,

Whereas Another similar convention is to be held the coming season, therefore

Resolved, That we request the convention at its next session to revise its action of last season and remove all appearances of injustice and creed-making, and all assumption of authority over local churches.

The foregoing was omitted by the secretary pro tem in previous report.

R. BAILEY, Sec.

To the Brethren of Like Precious Faith.

I am very destitute at this time, and if any of you can help me a little it will be very acceptable, and if you do not feel like donating I will preach for the amount sent me. I have spent all my money and have got nothing raised to live on yet. My address is St. Joseph, Berrien Co., Michigan.

Brevities.

Rev. Thomas Bridges, missionary to the islands of Terra del Fuego, lives in an iron house, sent by his friends in England;—so violent are tempests in that far-off land. The only quadruped on the islands is the dog.

The British and Foreign Bible Society continues to be remarkably prosperous. Since its organization it has circulated 94,000,000 copies of the Scriptures in 246 languages and dialects. The Earl of Shaftesbury is President of the Society.

The Silesian Gazette reports a hail storm in villages of that province that was of amazing destructiveness. Stones of the size of hens' eggs were showered throughout a whole night upon the unfortunate hamlets, and they fell with such force that they crushed through roofs, killed horses and cattle, destroyed barns and dwellings, and broke down trees. At the same time a brook that ran near by rose until it became a rushing torrent and burst over the adjoining lands. In the morning it was found that eleven persons had lost their lives, their bodies being found bruised and disfigured beyond recognition; horses and cattle were killed, and many buildings destroyed, or so badly injured that they had to be torn down.

At a recent meeting of the San Francisco Academy of Sciences, Dr. Harkness exhibited a quantity of "red snow," brought by him in blankets from the summit of the Sierras, and containing the plant which produces the deep red color sometimes observed in snow at high altitudes. This snow, he said, had been found in the Apennines, the first record of it being made about 800 years ago. The early Arctic navigators also had observed it, notably Scoresby, who, in 1818, brought some with him, which is yet preserved. The plant is a unicellular one, and is not far remote from the green mold on garden stops and walls, seen after every shower. Its appearance in former times created great consternation, being viewed in the light of an omen of evil.

CAST UP A HIGHWAY.

A correspondent, residing at present at Constantinople, writes: There is a proposal now on foot, and likely to be carried out, to make a railway from Tripoli, on the coast of Syria, eastward nearly to the Euphrates, and to plant colonies of Jews near all the railway stations. This is quite a different scheme from the various Euphrates Valley schemes, which have all failed. The line, if it succeeds, may afterwards extend further. Persecuted Jews formerly emigrated from Spain to Turkey, and it is not unlikely that they might do so now from Russia, Poland, Roumania, Siberia, and Pomerania to Syria, if only a settlement is assured them. The country proposed to be traversed is very rich, but it needs a railway to open it up; while, on the other hand, a railway, in order to pay, would need to have colonies of people planted along it, to work it, for the transporting of goods, etc., to the coast. It will be curious if the problem of the restoration of the Jews to the "Promised Land" should be in part solved in this prosaic way.—Watchword.

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

There will be a three days meeting of the One Faith, if the Lord is willing, at Pleasant Hill school house, in the southeast corner of Montague Co., Tex., four miles south of Forestburg, and thirty miles west of Gainesville, on the Jansville & Jacksboro road, and one-half mile west of the old conference ground. Meeting to commence Friday evening, July 21, at 4 o'clock. A general invitation is extended to all. Bro. J. S. Lauver of Missouri is expected to be present.

B. F. HOSMER.

The Piedmont A. C. C. will hold its fourth annual session with the church at Beaver Creek, N. C., commencing Friday, Aug. 25, and holding over Sunday. Persons traveling by rail will leave the train at Hickory, N. C., and go via Lenoir.

J. J. HANSHAW.

The annual assembly of the Church of God will (the Lord willing) commence on Friday before the first Sunday in August, at the house of the brethren, in Winchester, Va., and will continue for several days, including the first and second Sundays. As quite a number of able speaking brethren are expected to be in attendance, the brethren of the one faith are respectfully invited to attend. All coming by rail will please inform the writer in time what day they will be at the depot, and he will meet them there and conduct them to the house of the brethren, where they will be cared for as long as it will suit them to stay.

THE FALSE PROPHET DEFEATING 30,000 EGYPTIANS.

ALEXANDRIA, July 7.—Three thousand Egyptians under Gen. Yusef have attacked the False Prophet and been defeated. They lost 2,000 men, 4 guns, and 3,000 rifles. The False Prophet, with 7,000 men, is marching on Sennaar.

THE EGYPTIAN DEFEAT IN SOUDAN.

The news of the great defeat of Egyptian troops in Soudan is confirmed.

IT IS WAR. THE BOMBARDMENT BEGUN.

LONDON, July 11—6 p. m.—A correspondent on board the Bittern telegraphs the following:

"ALEXANDRIA July 17—7 a. m.—The bombardment has commenced!"

IN THE LORDS.

LONDON, July 10.—In the House of Lords this afternoon Lord Granville, Foreign Secretary, confirmed the news that unless the Alexandria forts temporarily surrendered Admiral Seymour would bombard them at daybreak to-morrow. It was painful he said, to be obliged to use force against the weak, but hostile preparations had been proceeding in defiance of the orders both of the Khedive and the Sultan. The action now taken was in simple self-defence.

IN THE COMMONS.

The Under Foreign Secretary made a statement regarding events in Egypt similar to that of Lord Granville in the Lords. It was received with cheers. The fact is that public opinion favors the seizure of Egypt by England, although this intention is not openly advocated, and the bombardment of Alexandria may therefore be regarded as merely the first step to a military occupation, which is intended to separate Egypt from the Government of the Sultan turning it into an English province. No doubt some share of power will be reserved for France, in order not to wound too deeply her susceptibilities. It is hoped that France will feel compelled to acquiesce to this solution, in view of the danger to which she might be exposed from an Anglo-German coalition, to which Austria and Italy might be made parties, in exchange for England's help in bringing about the solution of the European Eastern question favorably to a German Power. The Germanic Powers seem inclined to ally themselves with England as against France. It is among the possibilities that, when they discover that England aims not so much at the suppression of Arabi as at the practical annexation of Egypt, they will show themselves equally ready to ally themselves with France for the purpose of preventing the firm establishment of England on the Nile.

LONDON, July 11.—The Daily News has the following:

"ALEXANDRIA, July 10. — Arabi Pasha has again declared he will not yield an inch. A perfect panic prevails among the Arabs."

TWO MILES OUTSIDE THE GOVERNMENT PIER.

LONDON, July 11—The Times' correspondent on board the Helicon telegraphs as follows: "The American, Austrian, Russian, and Italian men-of-war are anchored two miles outside of the breakwater. Admiral Seymour has deputed an officer to supervise all telegrams."

THE PACIFIC.

SAN FRANCISCO, July 10.—A terrible hurricane visited the Friendly Islands April 25. At Vanvan the bark Don Guillomo, Capt. Johnston, went down at her anchors. The Captain, officers, and six seamen were lost with her. Five boys were saved. The hurricane was accompanied by a tidal wave fifteen feet high, which swept over the island and did terrible damage. The storehouse of Messrs. McArthur & Co., of Auckland, which contained over 3,000 tons of copra, was destroyed. All the natives' houses and many of the Europeans' were carried away. Cocoanut trees were snapped off like pipe-stems, and the island presents a scene of widespread desolation. At Tongatea all the churches were destroyed, 2,000 houses leveled, stores and copra houses with their contents, and everything near, swept away. A schooner was carried inland, and the German bark Castol foundered.

MEXICO.

TUCSON, Ari., July 10.—The Star's Mexican advices say that the black small-pox is raging with great violence at Mazatlan, and that Hermosillo and Guaymas are quarantining against it. There have been fifty deaths in Mazatlan.

Francis Quarles, Emblems.

Both wit and understanding are trifles without integrity. The ignorant peasant without fault is greater than the philosopher with many. What is genius or courage without a heart!—Oliver Goldsmith.

Distance has the same effect on the mind that it has on the eye; and while we gaze on the stream of time, whatever we leave behind us is always lessening, and that which we approach increasing in magnitude.—Samuel Johnson.

The life we are,
The sacrifice of motion deep and long,
The dark outgrowth of germinal unrest
Because the race is so,
This struggle and world to hurt our Father's school;
All chance and change his love shall grandly override.
What though today,
Thou could not trace all the bitter wrong
For his strange dealings through the trial years,
Trust on; always
In after life and ever all shall be plain and clear.

The one essential truth to accept about the gospel is, that no money can buy our salvation, no suffering merit it, no repentance procure it, no holiness produce it. The utmost that our own moral action can do for us, and this too is by the grace of God, is to create and enlarge the receptive faculty in us. If we will not take salvation as a gift, we cannot have it at all.—Thorold.

MARRIED.

KIRKPATRICK—CORBALEY—At the residence of the bride's parents, in Crescent township, Thursday, June 8, 1882, Mr. E. S. Kirkpatrick, of Council Bluffs, to Miss Jennie, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. J. B. Corbaley, Rev. J. B. Corbaley officiating.

The marriage notice was communicated by her mother, Sister P. S. Corbaley. Speaking of the young couple the Crescent City Nonpareil says: "The groom is in the employ of D. H. McDaniel, of this city, and is a promising young business man. His bride is one of the estimable young ladies of Pottawattamie county, and enjoys an extensive acquaintance. To those of other admiring friends, The Nonpareil desires to add its congratulations and hearty well wishes. The happy couple depart this morning over the Union Pacific for California, accompanied by Mr. Corbaley, who goes on a visit to relatives." Sister Corbaley adds: "My husband, John Corbaley, has been having a severe attack of asthma since his arrival at Oakland, Cal., but he has now gone to visit friends at Healdsburg, where the climate is dryer, and we hope to hear that he is benefitted by the change." We hope Brother Corbaley may regain his health, and tender our best wishes to the bride and groom.

DIED.

SIMONS—At Monroe, Wis., June 7, 1882, John Simons.

The funeral, or memorial services, by request of Sr. Simons, were held at Lanark, Ill. June 20, 1882.

G. M. MYERS.

CUFFEL—At Argos, Ind. July 6, 1882. Nancy M., daughter of Br. Wm Railsback, and wife of Wm. H. Cuffel, to whom she was married by the writer March 30, 1880.

Her age was 22 years, 3 months, and 20 days. She died in the full assurance of a glorious resurrection from the dead to eternal life at the second coming of her Redeemer. Funeral discourse also by the writer.

A PSALM OF NIGHT.

W. H. BURLEIGH.

Fades from the west the farewell light
Flung backward by the setting sun,
And silence deepens, as the night
Steals with its solemn shadows on!
Gathers the cool, refreshing dew,
The opening flow'rets drink and breathe—
And lo! the everlasting blue
Is radiant with a thousand gems!

Not only doth the voice of day
Thy loving kindness, Lord, proclaim—
But night, with its sublime array
Of worlds, doth magnify thy name!
Yea, while adoring seraphim
Before thee bend the willing knee,
From every star a choral hymn
Goes up unceasingly to thee!

Day unto day doth utter speech,
And night to night thy voice makes known;
Through all the earth where'er man may search,
Is heard the glad and solemn tone:
And worlds beyond the farthest star
Whose light hath reached the human eye,
Catch the high anthem from afar
That rolls along immensity!

Oh, holy Father! hold the calm
And stillness of this evening hour,
We, too, would lift our voices in psalm
To praise thy goodness and thy power!
For over us, as over all,
Thy tender mercies shall extend,
Nor vainly shall the contrite call
On thee, our Father and our friend.

Kept by thy goodness through the day,
Thankfulness to thy name we pour;
Night o'er us, with its tears—we pray
Thy face to guard us evermore.
In grief, convicts: in gladness, blest;
In darkness, public; in sickness, cheer!
Till, in the Savior's righteousness,
Before thy throne we all appear.

OUR PLATFORM.—No. 6.

ONE LORD, ONE FAITH, ONE BAPTISM.

One Lord—we have written quite at length already upon this part of our platform. It opens into a large field for cultivation. The more we contemplate the character, attributes, and work of the Son of God, the more we are awed into deep and profound reverence for the love, goodness, and wisdom of God in the gift of his well-beloved Son to redeem and save a perishing world.

A few thoughts in the negative. We begin at home and pen a few reflections this Sunday morning. Under the dome of the Capitol of our Nation—as beautiful a city as is to be found on the continent, if not in the world—all is quiet. Many high hopes of a good time to be enjoyed at the sea-side, at the hills, or on the mountains; yea, we hope it may be even so, but there is an under-current that moves silently but steadily forward, accomplishing the purposes of God. His special judgments are abroad in the world, but only in a mild form, to inaugurate the opening scenes of the great day of God Almighty.

The lion is come up from his thicket and the destroyer of the Gentiles is on his way; he is gone forth from his place to make the land desolate; and the cities shall be laid waste, without an inhabitant. Jer. iv. 7. We reason of the future from the past; yea and we have the positive declaration of the Son of God that the end of this age will be as the last days of the first age of the world—fearful indeed is the thought what fearfulness will suprise the hypocrite. No interest in Christ, no covert from the stormy blasts; they have sown to the wind, and they must reap the whirlwind.

It is with hesitancy we write our solemn convictions of the immediate future; the signs of the times, the fulfilment of prophecy, have brought us to the conclusion that the end of the age, or of the times of the Gentiles, is upon us. Was there ever a time since the fall of man that we needed a Savior as now? It is wise, it is safe, it is profitable and blessed beyond calculation or expression to be in Christ, and to be borne above and beyond the execution of the judgments which are to purify and cleanse the earth, and make it a fit residence for the redeemed.

To fully and clearly understand the work of Christ, or the one Lord, we must be in him, and one with him; associated with him in the great work of restitution. How magnificently grand and glorious will they shine forth when fully unfolded and developed in the age of millennial glory; when he shall sit upon the throne of his father David and reign over the house of Jacob forever; when there will be one Lord and his name one; when he will have dominion from sea to sea, and from the river to the end of the earth.

In order for the saints to participate in the great work of restoring the earth to its Eden state they must be prepared and qualified in this the gospel age. We must come in through the strait gate and narrow way—the open door, which Christ passed through and left it ajar for his followers. We do not expect to be literally crucified on a Roman cross, but we must be crucified unto the world and the world unto us. How poorly do we understand the last quoted Scripture, and how poorly do we comprehend the necessary qualifications for a joint rulorship with the Christ.

There is therefore now no condemnation to them that are in Christ Jesus, who walk not after the flesh, but after the spirit. "How do we get into Christ? There is but the one way—by faith, repentance and obedience. This the record plainly shows in every place named in the New Testament. "Living epistles known and read of all men."

A branch may belong to a vine and yet yield no fruit. By their fruits ye shall know them; to such Christ will say, "I never knew you." It were better that they had never been born. How blessed it is to be fruit-bearing branches. To such the Master will say, "Well done, good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord; thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will make thee ruler over many things."

Knowledge and conscience, wisdom and folly; we know what is right and what is wrong. Conscience is a faithful monitor; we know when we have done wrong. Take the two kings of Israel for a sample, Saul and David. The one would say when confronted by God's prophet, I have sinned, let me fall into the hand of God; he is merciful. The other like the guilty pair in Eden. The people have saved the best of the spoils to sacrifice to the Lord, but confessed I have played the fool. It is painfully distressing to see to what strategy men will resort, and to what lengths they will go to justify themselves in wrong doing.

There are many more Sauls now than in David's time, and we are often reminded of the saying of Orange Scott of the lamented ——, "that he could make a lie look just like the truth," or like another, "that he had repeated a lie so many times that he really believed it was true." It is possible we may blind our eyes and deceive ourselves, especially in the item of gold and silver, and sear our consciences as with a hot iron; yet the truth of God standeth sure. Of the truth we have a full embodiment in the one Lord, his precepts and example, his holy spotless life, his perfect obedience to his Father.

Many valuable lessons may be drawn from our blessed Lord's teaching and example, but we must forbear and commend the reader to a careful study of the word of God, which is able to make us wise unto salvation through faith.

You call for short articles, we try to comply with your request, not only write but pray for God's blessing upon what is written and the paper that heralds forth the truth to a perishing world. Do we realize our true position? that we have reached the borderline that divides the gospel from the millennial age? The rapture of the saints is in order, and may occur at any moment. The all-important question is: Am I ready? is my hand clean? is my heart pure? Behold I come as a thief; blessed is he that watcheth and keepeth his garments lest he walk naked and they see his shame.

NEWELL BOND.

AN AFTERNOON'S THOUGHTS.

Some time when it is opportune, I would like to compare two great works, to-wit: Creation and Redemption, and two great days also: the rest day of the Creator, and the resurrection day of the Redeemer. These are two great days—and I need hardly ask in so many words—"which is the greatest?" But I might ask which is the greatest rest day, the best and most blessed?

God made the heavens and the earth, made them with enormous labor, made them with his fingers. He made the earth without any such thing as exhaustion or weariness. There is never a hint of such a thing. "The Creator of the ends of the earth fainteth not, neither is weary." Yet God rested on the seventh day—whatever period of time that may mean—though we may for the moment take it for a literal day. God rested. An important work was finished. Had this great work of creation a reference to a future work of redemption? Undoubtedly. There was a forecast of redemption. How do these two great works compare in magnitude and importance? Which work excites the greatest interest? Which inspires the liveliest raptures of joy? Which enlists the study of angels, and arouses their penetrative inquiry? Which work is destined to be most memorable? Which is most peculiar and difficult? Which is celebrated by grand anthems of praise, more pathetically than another? Which is the work of greater costliness and elaborateness? Which is pre-ominently a work of wisdom and wonder, a work of the Divine heart, a work of God's almighty arm? This is worth dwelling on and talking about. Which cost earth and suffering and trouble? And which will be most truly celebrated in story?

The answer is not far away. Many are God's works of creation, but of redemption we have not the faintest idea of more than one work. I am struck with the picture of Jesus, the Son of God, closeted with Nicodemus and telling him calmly those great things which astonished the learned Jew. I see John pointing to Jesus as he walked, and exclaiming, "Behold the Lamb of God." I am struck with the majesty of the Missionary, the Messiah, the Supernatural Son. What wonder is this? What dignity of origin, what greatness of nature, what grandeur of character, what majesty of person, what loveliness and wonderfulness in all things!

Now when Jesus died, the earth felt the pang of her mighty Lord, and shook. Even the light trembled and hid itself. It was made a day of pain and despair. The disciples were frightened and astonished, and the women whom we could not drive away, yet hung on the spectacle with silence and tears and despair. Thus with agony slowly passed the crucifixion day—the day before the Sabbath—creation's rest day. And that Sabbath! Was there ever such a Sabbath before? The Lord of glory lay in the grave. Hope in loving and loyal human hearts, was dead. It was a day of mourning and paralysis, of defeat and half stupefaction. In vain Mary's tenderness, or Peter's zeal; hope was dead, faith fallen, love astonished, expectation ended. What a Sabbath day that was! Was it a day of rest for the loyal and good, or was it a day of gloom and death, without rest or light? On that day death was triumphant and the tomb conqueror. It enclosed and held the world's Deliverer, a prisoner. It was the day when captivity was king, when darkness was at the front, when ungodly violence was victor, and conspiracy against goodness a success. This was that Sabbath day, and on that day, the Mosaic dispensation was about to die, or dead. Did Mosaism die with Jesus? And if it did, did it rise with him?

On the next day after this most mournful Sabbath day the world ever saw, there was a great power of God, and Jesus rose from the dead. The day Jesus died was a day of most tremendous toil, a day of suffering and struggle, a day of darkness and difficulty, a day of anguish extreme and protracted, of bitterness intensified, and of terror great even to astonishment. It was the day appointed before the foundation of the world, for a work of magnitude and difficulty which the human mind can not comprehend, the great day of the Divine Tragedy of Love, so to speak; a day of days.

And if it was so, what was the first day of the week, when Jesus rose from the dead? Was it, and how was it a day of rest?. Was it a great day of rest? If the sweetest rest follows the acutest pain, and the most desperate weariness, what was that day break to Jesus, who woke and rose a conqueror? If the hours following an inconceivable torture be sweet, what was that day to Jesus who to the last moment of consciousness suffered as he only knows, and the next conscious moment stepped forth free and clear of all fatigue and agony, the raised restored, and immortal new Adam, with life and light and joy, and victory and peace, all crowning him, and conquering in him and with him, and doubtless with the congratulations of ten thousand of unseen angels. And what must have been the congratulation of earth and nature to him! And what were the sweet joys of women and disciples, thrilled and wondering, as they beheld their chief, restored to them!

This, then, was the greatest day of rest that love had ever had. How Jesus must have rested in himself, rested in his ease of body, and joy of conscious conquest, rested in the new experience of unutterable sweetness after such a toil and terror as he had just been through. What a rest to set and love his own, who were so happy in his company and restoration! Did he not greatly rest, and was it not the most perfect day of rest earth ever saw?

I simply and honestly ask these questions. I do not call this the Sabbath day, but what is its true place and power among God's great days? Is there, has there ever been a greater day? Has there ever been so great a day? Who ever rested as Jesus rested on that day? What is the magnitude and majesty of that day among all days that ever had a rising and a setting sun? It was the day without which, death would have surely been an eternal king. It was the day without which, the grave would have been a universal and unvanquishable master, without which, Satan would have blood and hell would have yawned exultant, a day without which no rest but that of defeat and silence and death eternal and universal would have prevailed. Hence I stand for the resurrection of Jesus Christ, as a day of blessing, of life, and rest, of joy, of restoration, and unequalled magnitude in all the relations of earth, in all the divisions of time.

Hail to the resurrection day! A day of brightness and promise, of the grandest issues and assurances, a birth-day without pain, after a death day of pain most intolerable. This day began the new dispensation. If God's rest day, after six days creation work, was a beginning of new things, how also is Christ's rest day, after wrestling with potentates and powers of evil, with sickness and pain and difficulty, a beginning of new things! May I not rest on it also? May I not rest with him in sympathy and in fact? May I not share in his rapture and in his rest? May I magnify him, and make him honorable by whatever means justified by the sentiment of gratitude and loyalty, and by a sense of the imperative and imperial greatness of his work?

My feeling and faith both are that Jesus is not honored enough. I believe his redemptive work is not measured and praised with that grateful appreciation and admiration it deserves. The majesty of Jesus is not carefully and profoundly enough conceived. Too many come short in their ideas of his stupendous greatness. There is not enough rapture of awe, not enough imagination of Divinity, not enough sense and assurance and understanding of his holiness, and the sweetness and wonderfulness of his personality. Jesus is the greatest and most lovely and most inviting mystery. He is the most perfect sublimity. He is, save the Father, the most exalted object of homage and topic of reflection, and inspiration of faith and enthusiasm. He is at the head and front of all things. We need him, we need to know him better and severe and love him more. We need him now, need him to do a wonderful work in us and for us, and for all the world, and for himself and for his Father, and for benevolence and goodness and joy forever. Lord arise in majesty.

HOW WILL THE GOSPEL END?

To Elders J. C. and E. A. S., Editors of "The World's Crisis," Boston, Mass.:

As many devout believers read more than one of our papers, that herald the coming of "the Great King," it seems due to them, and to him, who will be our Judge, that the Bible answer should not be suppressed. I rejoice in all the truth that your articles embrace. It would be first-rate if consistent even with itself. You teach the reality of the birth and life—the ministry and miracles—the death and the resurrection—the ascension; and now the intercession of the Lord Jesus, the Messiah, "within the veil," to which "all the people should say amen."

Please reflect on the fact, that earnest students find that while this image of truth is fulfilled, it is what remains (of promise and prophecy) to become a corresponding reality (a matter-of-fact fulfilment) is as one to ten. If so, or nearly, you fail to reach the core of the question—and much less to answer it. You ignore or reject some nine-tenths of the gospel. "The gospel" is "the gospel of the kingdom." Hence it must end in the kingdom, the reign of which it is the herald. As "John the Baptist" was God's "messenger to prepare the way" for Jesus' manifestation, at his actual first advent, so much more gloriously will "the gospel" end up in "the kingdom." To this great end it was given, and for this, it is the preparation—the messenger.

1. You allow Jesus, "the manger"—the bloody sweat of Gethsemane—and the agony of "the cross," in all their awful realities. But the crown and the throne, as David's Lord in Zion—"the times of the blessedness and potentate, as the King of kings"—the crowning theme of the psalms and prophets—the fundamental doctrine of the kingdom in the Great Teacher's parables; and all apostolic ministries pertaining to "the times of restitution;" and God's abounding blessing by "the seed" of promise, (Gen. xxii. 17, 18; Psa. lxxii.; Gal. iii. 24, 29) are absorbed, and lost by you in vague notions.

2. You allow Israel's "seven times punishment" (Lev. xxvi. 28–44)—his 2300 years of Gentile subjection and dispersion; with the desolation of their city, sanctuary and land. Zech. i. 18–22; Matt. xxiii. 37–39 to chap. xxv.; Luke xxi. 24; Rom. xi. 12–29. While yet you deny that people the God-given hope of his oath-confirmed covenant to Abraham, to David (Psa. lxxxix.); and by Gabriel to the Lord Jesus. Matt. i. 21; Luke i. 32, 33; John xi. 51, 52; xvii. 23.

Of course you (in some vague way) assume to absorb "the times of restitution" in eternity; and place "the body of Christ—the temple of God," in Israel's room as subjects to appropriate all their unfulfilled promises, after they (Israel) have had the curses. Deut. xxviii.

3. You surely know that Moses and the princes of Israel, were their "king in Jeruasalem," and rulers over that nation. So Christ will reign; and those standing in his name, can not be made subjects nor less than "kings and priests." Matt. ix. 28. Judah forfeited the birth-right. Matt. xxi. 43. You well say, "all are not Israel of Israel;" and you know all are not Christian of the church; yet both Israel and the church will fill their proper sphere in "the kingdom." "Let God be true." Amen.

Please observe that "the saints take the kingdom (the sovereignty with Christ) for the age even the age of ages" (Dan. vii. 14; xviii. 27; Matt. xii. 32; Mark x. 30; Luke xviii. 30,) received from the lips of the Lord Messiah. "This age (world) and that to come." Eph. ii. 7, and iii. 21, has the word translated, in plural, "ages." "To him be glory in the church by Christ Jesus throughout all the generations of the age of the ages." (Literally in agreement with Dan. vii, 18). Are you not kicking against the pricks?

The fact is, that this denial (however subtle or to you plausible) applies to the general letter and spirit of Revelation. Nay more, it seems far worse than the popular rejection of the second coming of Jesus; because it is against the greater light of your profession and advanced position.

In your issue of June 28, you express the "solemn conclusion"—in varied language; and the deliberate denial, or wilful ignorance, of "the times of restitution of all things spoken" (Acts iii. 21); and all like portions of truth pertaining to the objects of Jesus' coming to reign. His salvation is deliverance. Rom. viii. 14–23; xi. 25–29; Psa. lxvii.

This fact is too important—too vital—to be suppressed. With trumpet tongue we should proclaim the glorious reign of Christ in Zion and over the house of Jacob, and the Gentiles. Rom. xv. 8–13; Luke xxiv. 25–44.; Psa. lxxii.

As the leading Jews died in their sins by rejecting Jesus the Christ, John viii. 21–24, so it is indeed a "solemn (awful) conclusion" that rejects his reign—his Lordship—and the abounding blessings that he is ordained to dispense. Gen. xxii. 16, 18; Psa. xcviii.; Isa. xi.; Jer. xxxiii.; Dan. vii. 14; Matt. xix. 28; Rev. xv. 4; xx. 3–7. Amen.

Thy Will, Not Mine Be Done.

In exhorting a young friend not long since to abstain from forbidden things in her course of life, it flashed over me as never before, that this was what was meant by "Thy will, not mine." It is the natural man that craves the things that gratify the appetite, please the eyes, and minister to pride, things that are of the world and not from the Father. "Love not the world," is the will of the Father. In this we are to say "thy will, not mine be done." The world and its desire are passing away, and we, being not of the world, are to set our affections on things that will endure. We may say, what harm is there in doing this or that? Is not God wiser than we? Does he not know what will best fit us for his heavenly kingdom? Would he have said, "do not do this or that," if death had not been in the doing of it to you?

And again, you may say "why must I pray? Why must I take such long tedious rides to church? I do not see the need of always being upon ones' knees. I can be just as good without; just as good and stay away from the house of prayer." What is it that makes you good in God's eyes? Is it taking your own course in direct disobedience to his commands? Most assuredly not. He has said, "pray," and "pray without ceasing." He has said, "assemble yourselves together." Take heed that you do his will, no matter how much it may conflict with your own.

S. ROXANA WING.

There are forty-five missionaries resident in Asiatic Turkey, including Constantinople, and they have distributed, within the last twenty-three years 888,000 copies of Bibles and Testaments, receiving some £48,000 in cash, payments for the same. The translations of the Scripture used are mostly in Arabic, Turkish, Bulgarian, and Armenian. Thousands of Armenian women are now able to read and think, whereas twenty years ago but few could do so. This produces a great effect on the rising generation.

MRS. DAVIS AND HER MISSION.

Leaves from My Journal.

JERUSALEM, May 8, 1882.

Yesterday was a great feast day with the Jews. The place of prayer is the Prophet's Tomb. I went in company with Jews; but as so many were crowding in, I did not attempt to enter. This tomb is situated in a deep valley in the east; really a valley of tombs and caves. We visited one which the Jews told us was an ancient synagogue, cut out of the solid rock.

It is very noticeable that all the Jews are walking about with their heads uplifted; they have indeed a new spirit, not knowing that their redemption is drawing near. If you ask them what it means, they answer, "We don't know; we think king David is coming." I tell them, "Yes, so he is, soon; lift up your head, and rejoice."

Three hundred French pilgrims arrived this morning, and twelve hundred more are expected tomorrow. They are strangers here, and seem wild with excitement.

I saw the finest new potatoes in the market this morning that I ever saw, and cheap, too. Eggs are only six cents a dozen, and there are plenty. Hens cost very little.

I have ascertained that fifteen hundred dollars will buy a good farm and build a good farm-house. I wish it to be understood that farming is all done during the months of autumn, winter and spring. Frank says, any one coming must bring barbed wire for fencing. Where there are no stones, wire is the thing for fences.

I have just had a visit from Mr. Steinhart, the Jewish teacher here. He came for some clothing for these poor Jews. He has done so much for them, dividing all his living with them, fully trusting in God. I was able to give ten frances which had been given me; also some clothing. I told him it was the "widow's mite."

He tells me that Mr. Oliphant will be here in two weeks with means to purchase farms for one hundred and fifty families. They will settle in a colony one hour from Jerusalem, on the Jaffa road.

A friend said to me that I had written a different view of Jerusalem from any one else. I told him I had described it as I saw it. He said it reminded him of a story he once heard of two men who travelled the same road. One had heard that the road was very dirty and full of ghosts and many evil things, and he found it just as his preconceived idea had led him to believe, and was frightened by shadows. The other, who had not listened to these tales, found much beauty and smooth travelling along the way, but no ghosts.

I wish you would mention in the Herald that THE RESTITUTION is received regularly, and passed round among both Jews and Gentiles, and is liked very well.

Since talking with Mr. Steinhart, I think the truth about these Jews is, that they were persecuted and obliged to leave Arabia and return here. It was God's way, whatever the cause might have been. I wish there could be some interest raised in Boston for these poor Jews. Will not Mr. Markus send Mr. Steinhart some money? He has done much good.

I am sending four letters by the mail today.

May 14. It is Sunday evening, 9 o'clock in Jerusalem, about 8 in Boston. I can look with the eye of imagination into your meeting, and think I would like to be there for an hour and see what you are talking about; perhaps you are at this moment talking about Jerusalem. I think so.

Five hundred French pilgrims came over-land from Beyrout. The five hundred who came by sea arrived early in the week, and they came out to meet this new arrival with banners and songs. I stood in an elevated position overlooking the Jaffa road for a distance of half a mile from the Jaffa gate. The sight was grand and very solemn. I wish I could describe the scene. I looked at these people who had come from a distant land to pay homage to the Holy City. The sun was sinking beneath the hills, while its soft rays lit up the scene: and as the voices of fifteen hundred people sang the sweet anthem of "Peace to Jerusalem," I looked upon the Holy City with feelings of reverential awe that I had never before felt. Beautiful young maidens with banners, old men with heads bare, and bowed, as they gazed for the first time on Jerusalem. I wept, as I saw by faith the nations coming up to keep the feast of tabernacles. Everyone says, nothing like this has ever occurred since the Crusaders. What shall we see next?

Our hearts and hands are full, trying to care for our poor little Arabian Jews. These poor people are diminutive in stature; as Mr. Steinhart says, they have suffered such long and severe persecution that they are really reduced in size; but they are bright, active and cheerful, and some are very beautiful. They already have a synagogue fitted up, and Frank has today made a little folding bed for the Rabbi. They think it is quite wonderful that this tribe have so soon got a place of worship. We are trying to feed them until they get to work. Some of the men who are stonemasons are employed, but many goldsmiths find it hard to get employment. We must divide with them. The Jews here think it so strange that these Americans come to help feed their brethren.

I will tell you what I think is the true cause of their coming to Jerusalem. They have been terribly persecuted, and found life to be almost a burden, and not knowing what to do, when suddenly they saw written on a column in their synagogue something like this, in Hebrew, "The time has come, the time to have mercy on Zion." No one knew how this came to be there, but it had the effect to hasten their departure, as they believe it was from God, and it seems they had no idea previous to this that they should ever see Jerusalem. It certainly is one of the remarkable events of the age. What I have written is reliable.

It is thought by men of understanding that the events of the next few months will startle the world. An aged Jew prophecies that some great events will occur this fall. We have much to do and much to think of. Our hands are full.

May 16. Received the Herald today, but no letters. I think my journal will make the people all laugh, seeing they all wept on reading number 81. I laughed myself.

What strange things I do see! You would laugh, or weep, to see us dividing our poor stock of clothes and provisions with these poor Jews. Today I divided my clocks with Mr. Steinhart. He had none, and was obliged to sell his watch; and as he is a teacher, he needed a time-piece very much. Today I met poor friend Kaunstrone, and he said, "O, Mrs. Davis, what shall I do? these poor people come to my house for food, coal, and everything, and they are just like little children! They think Jerusalem must be heaven, and refuse to believe that any one is poor here!" "Well," said I, "what shall we do? We can't refuse them." "No," said he. Poor man! he is poor himself, with a large family. I said to him, "We did not bring them here. God brought them, you know." "Yes," he said; "I know it." Said I, "We will pray God to help us. If God would only send the Pentecost Spirit now, how glorious it would be. Let us pray earnestly for it, we are so helpless." There is a great work before us. Who is competent for these things? The rich here seem to have no part in it.

Thursday, the 18th, is Ascension Day, and the French will spend the day on the Mount of Olives in singing and prayer. I shall go and make sketches.

The sun is in an eclipse. It will be fully eclipsed for three hours. The poor Arabs are much frightened and are coming to me and saying, "Mish tieb." I answer, "No; tieb good." This assures them, and they go about their business. These people think when any strange event occurs, that the world is to be destroyed. In this they are not far behind New England ideas!

Neglect of private duties is the great reason why the hearts of many are so dead and dull, so formal and carnal, so barren and unfruitful, under public ordinances. Of that Christians would lay this seriously to heart. Certainly that man's heart is best in public duties who is most frequently in private exercised.

NEARER HOME.

O'er the hill the sun is setting,
And the eve is drawing on;
Slowly droops the gentle twilight,
For another day is gone.
Gone for aye—its race is o'er;
Soon the darker shades will come:
Still it's sweet to know at even
We are one day nearer home.

One day nearer, sings the mariner,
As he glides the waters o'er,
While the light is softly dying
On his distant native shore.
Thus the Christian on life's ocean,
As his life boat cuts the foam,
In the evening cries with rapture—
I am one day nearer home.

Worn and weary, oft the pilgrim
Hails the setting of the sun,
For his goal is one day nearer,
And his journey nearly done.
Thus we feel when o'er life's desert,
Heart and sandal-sore we roam,
As the twilight gathers o'er us,
We are one day nearer home.

Nearer home! Yes, one day nearer
To our Eden home so bright—
To the green fields and the fountains
In the land of pure delight;
For the heavens grow brighter o'er us,
And the lamps hang in the dome,
And our tents are pitched still closer,
For we're one day nearer home.

ISRAEL'S PROMISED FUTURE.—No. 1.

Unto thy seed have I given this land, from the river of Egypt unto the great river, the river Euphrates: The Kenites, and the Kenizzites, and the Kadmonites, and the Hittites, and the Perizzites, and the Rephaims, and the Amorites, and the Canaanites, and the Jebusites. Gen. xv. 18-21.

God has taught us that his word is intelligible. He said by the prophet Isaiah, I have not spoken in a dark place of the earth. Isa. xlv. 19. The declaration was made in connection with a prophecy respecting the future prosperity of the land of Jacob. The Bible contains many passages in which we are taught that God has revealed himself in language which is easily understood. Deut. xxix. 29. The secret things belongs unto the Lord our God; but those things which are revealed belong unto us and to our children for ever. The truths which God has been pleased to reveal are given in the language of our mouth in the words by which we converse with each other, and are addressed in a clear unambiguous manner to the heart. The unlearned persons are under no absolute necessity of depending upon preachers or philosophers to make known the meaning of the messages by which Jehovah communicates to his people what he would have them to know respecting himself and their relations to him. Such is most conspicuously the fact also with Irenæus of the early expounders on theological topics; there probably is not one in which the question debated is treated more directly as a question of revelation, and the doctrine advocated founded more explicitly and entirely on the word of God than the doctrine respecting the millennium. He refers his arguments to Isaiah, Ezekiel, Daniel, and John for the grounds of his faith in the second coming of Christ at the period of the destruction of the fourth monarchy, his reign on earth and the resurrection of the saints and reign with him during the thousand years, and alleges the same passages that are quoted by Millenarians now as revealing these events.

Christ's kingdom is a new and different dispensation, and that he is to receive the dominion of the earth and reign over it, as the king in a new manner, is abundantly taught in the sacred oracles. Thus, in Daniel's vision, it was after the destruction of the fourth wild beast that the Son of Man came in the clouds of heaven to the Ancient of Days.

Let us turn now to the perpetuity of the nation of the Jews, for the prophetic record of its future, viewing it from this advanced standpoint of the Gentile ages, is not less wonderful than the accomplished record of the past. It has by no means reached as yet the shining zenith of its greatness and power. The dread signals of that great tribulation which is to follow upon the national reinstatement of the tribes in their own possessions, and to precede the millennial glory, fall not as yet upon our ears.

The title of the Jews to the land of Canaan, carefully considered in the terms in which it is so simply and concisely expressed, places before the world the highest of all Scriptural evidences, of the destined perpetuity of their nation, and brings us directly to the consideration of the covenants, from which its title is derived.

Let us then consider first the circumstances of their origin. God called Abraham forth from a little village of tents, lying in a pastoral country, famous for its flocks, in the northeastern part of Mesopotamia, not distant from the river Tigris. Obedient to the divine command, gathering his flocks and a little company of faithful friends around him, and leaving his country, his kindred, and his father's house behind him, he set forth towards the land of Canaan. There arriving, after some delays, he pitched his tent upon a fertile and well watered plain, interspersed with the lofty heights of Ebal and Gerizim, the earth teeming with verdure for his flocks beneath his foot, the purest and most lustrous of skies smiling, as with a heavenly benediction upon his mission, above his head.

Building there a rude altar of stones; after the custom of the East, and sacrificing upon it, from the fatlings of his flocks, a thankoffering to the Lord, the venerable patriarch dedicated himself, his family, and his possessions to him who had brought him, with faith so unfaltering and serene, thus far upon his pilgrimage.

Not many days after, God called him forth from the curtains of his tent in the watches of the night, and bade him lift his eyes heavenward, and count the stars, if he were able to tell their number. The aged and childish pilgrim, now no longer likely, in the order of nature, to be the possessor of an heir, lifted his eyes to the innumerable heavenly host, and God said, "So shall thy seed be." The divine author of the gift, and its recipients, whose number could be estimated only by the hosts of heaven, are here recorded.

The Lord again appeared to Abraham upon a site adjacent to the plains of Morch, so elevated, that even in those clearest of skies, not a spot could be discerned within the entire range of view that encircled him, except the peak of a distant mountain, that belonged not to the land of Canaan. And the Lord said unto him: "Lift up now thine eyes, and look from the place where thou art northward and southward, and eastward and westward: for all the lands which thou now seest, to thee will I give it, and thy seed forever. Arise, walk through the land in the length of it, and the breadth of it; for I will give unto thee." Gen. xiii. 14-17.

Here the author of the gift, its recipients, its local extent, its freeness, fulness, and perpetuity, and its tenure as a landed estate in fee, are all plainly and positively affirmed.

Again God subsequently ratifies the gift to Abraham and his seed in a final covenant. Observe carefully the greater fulness in which its terms are now expressed; "I will establish my covenant between me and thee, and thy seed after thee, in their generations for an everlasting covenant, to be a God unto thee and to thy seed after thee, and I will give unto thee, and to thy seed after thee, the land wherein thou art a stranger," all the land of Canaan, for an everlasting possession, and will be their god. Gen. xvii. 7, 8.

Not only is the title, in all its constituent elements, here expressly recorded and reaffirmed, but a name is given to the land—"The land of Canaan." Its linear boundaries are afterwards described with rigorous accuracy, thrice by Moses, again by Joshua, and yet again, centuries after in the time of the Babylonian Captivity, by the prophet Ezekiel. Such is the covenanted title of the Jews to the land of Canaan.

A possession that is everlasting must, in the nature of things, be future as well as past, and if their possession has, in point of fact, been a literal one, in the past, not less must it be literal in the future, or if in the future, it is, according to a refined hypothesis, to be a spiritual possession only, with equal reason must the inference lie that it has been spiritual, and spiritual only, in the past, which would be against fact, and therefore absurd.

Future possession of the land of Canaan by the Jewish nation, without a precedent restoration of the twelve dispersed tribes, would be a part of the same absurdity. They will therefore, return, and having returned, will form a distinct and separate people and nationality in the future even as in the past. This reasoning can be disputed only upon the ground that the covenants upon which the title rests have been superseded or reversed, which would be the greatest absurdity of all, for to reverse these covenants is to reverse the whole Divine economy of Revelation; for the New Testament Revelation stands not less upon the Abrahamic covenants than the old, the prophetic future of God's government of this world, not less than its recorded past.

Such we repeat, so unique and beautiful in its simplicity, so concise in its terms, so comprehensive in its import, so divine in its authority, so inevitable in its fulfilment, is the title of the Jews to the Land of Canaan. Conceived in infinite wisdom, founded in sovereign will, clothed with Divine investiture and sanctions, no approach of infidelity, no speculative conceits, no methods of a false theology, can disturb its deep foundations, or shake its solid muniments, or ruffle its secure repose. It is the centre of the only saving faith and hope of a fallen world, certainly the richest of all earthly triumphs of sovereign and redeeming grace.

Such we repeat yet again, is the covenanted title of the Jews to the land of Canaan, as an actual as yet to be reinstated, and renationalized, and everlasting possession. No claims of prescription, no intervals of adverse and interrupted possession, no periods of dispersion, though they drag out their slow length, as now for centuries upon centuries; no tenancy of inferior by the sufferance of superior powers, as at present by the Turks, and in part by the Moslem descendants of Abraham in another line; no interferences of diplomacy as France and England, and Prussia in 1841, no downtreading by the Gentiles; though it last, as the Messiah assures us it will "Till the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled," can divest so sacred a title, or impair its heavenly obligations. The title of the Jewish nation, of the twelve tribes of Israel, to the land of Canaan, is a heavenly primogeniture, a celestial entail, embracing within its everlasting folds the house of Israel in all its tribes and all its generations. It is so proclaimed in the Abrahamic covenant. It is so regarded in the registry of the skies. What though the ten tribes of Israel be outcast; and the two tribes of Judah and Benjamin be dispersed.

The terms of the inheritance remain the same. Four hundred years in Egypt, seventy years at Babylon; eighteen hundred years and more among the Gentiles, is of no adverse account to the house of Israel in the mind of him to whom a thousand years are as one day, and one day as a thousand years. He who waits with unlimited long-suffering for one lost sheep, can wait indefinite ages for a scattered flock; and he has promised that he will.

The Lord's Prayer.

Our Father in heaven,
We honour thy name;
May thy kingdom holy
On earth be begun!
O give to us daily
Our portion of bread;
It is from thy bounty
That all must be fed.

Remove our trespasses,
And teach us to know
That humble compassion
Which pardons each foe;
Keep us from temptation,
From sorrow and sin,
And thine be the glory
Forever—Amen.

All Clean Inside.

I was talking one evening with some dear little boys on the coming of Jesus. The sermon had been on "The Signs of the Times." I had been wishing we could have sung "Are you ready? Are you ready? Should the Master come to-day?" and then asking them, "how we could be ready for the Savior." I said, "When our friends are coming we clean up the house and have everything nice; but it is ourselves that must be ready when Jesus comes. Must little Omar wash his face and comb his hair?" "No," he said, "we must be all clean inside."

Oh, I thought, "out of the mouths of babes," truly "thou hast perfected praise." These little ones teach us many a needed lesson. From their lips come reproofs that fall with scathing force. God bless the children and help us all to be "all clean inside."

A Thousand Boys Wanted.

There are always boys enough in the market, but some of them are of little use. The kind that are always wanted, are:— Honest, pure, intelligent, active, industrious, obedient, steady, obliging, polite and neat.

One thousand first-rate places are open for a thousand boys who come up to this standard. Each boy can suit his taste as to the kind of business he would prefer. The places are ready in every kind of occupation. Many of these places of trade and art are already filled up by boys who lack some of the most important points, but will soon be vacant. One has an office where the lad who has the situation is losing his first point. He likes to attend the singing saloon and the theatre. This costs more money than he can afford, but somehow he manages to be there frequently. His employers are constantly watching to learn how he gets so much spending money; they will soon discover a leak in the money drawer, detect the dishonest boy, and his place will be ready for some one who is now getting ready for it by observing point No. 1, and being truthful in all his ways.

Some situations will soon be vacant because the boys have been poisoned by reading bad books, such as they would not dare to show their fathers, and would be ashamed to have their mothers see. The impure thoughts suggested by these books will lead to vicious acts; the boys will be ruined, and their places must be filled. Who will be ready for one of these vacancies?

Distinguished lawyers, useful ministers, skillful physicians, successful merchants, must soon leave their places for somebody else to fill. One by one they are removed by death.

Mind your ten points, boys; they will prepare you to step into vacancies in the front rank. Every man who is worthy to employ a boy is looking for you if you have these points. Do not fear that you will be overlooked. A young person having these qualities will shine as plain as a star at night.

We have named ten points that go towards making up the character of a successful boy, so that they can be very easily remembered. You can imagine one on each finger, and so keep them in mind; they will be worth more than diamond rings, and then you will never be ashamed to "show your hand."

Abraham. The Friend of God. His Life and Mission.

Mr Good. Well, children, you remember our conversation about David, King of Israel. Do you know anything about David's country and David's people?

Henry. There were twelve tribes of Israel, and they lived in Canaan, where Jerusalem is, and the River Jordan and the Sea of Galilee.

Mr Good. You have been learning geography at school; can you tell me in what quarter of the world Canaan is situated?

Henry. In Asia; but in the western part, where the continents of Europe, Africa, and Asia meet. It is bounded on the west by the Mediterranean Sea.

Mr Good. Yes; and you observe that, besides occupying so central a position, it has communication by sea with the east, by the Red Sea, and with the west by the Mediterranean. But I will tell you more about this by and by. What patriarch was it who had twelve sons, who became the fathers of the twelve tribes?

Henry. Jacob; and he was the son of Isaac, and Isaac was the son of Abraham.

Mr Good. Were these all natives of Canaan?

Henry. No; Abraham came from Ur of the Chaldees.

Mr Good. Now, Mary, if you would read the eighth and ninth verses of the eleventh chapter of Hebrews, we shall hear what the apostle says about this.

Mary. (Reading) By faith Abraham, when he was called to go out into a place which he should after receive for an inheritance, obeyed; and he went out, not knowing whither he went. By faith he sojourned in the land of promise, as in a strange country, dwelling in tabernacles with Isaac and Jacob, the heirs with him of the same promise.

Mr Good. Now read the second, third and fourth verses of the seventh chapter of Acts.

Mary. (Reading) And he said, Men, brethren, and fathers, hearken. The God of glory appeared unto our father Abraham, when he was in Mesopotamia, before he dwelt in Charran, and said unto him, Get thee out of thy country, and from thy kindred, and come into the land which I will shew thee. Then came he out of the land of the Chaldeans, and dwelt in Charran; and from thence when his father was dead, he removed him into this land, wherein ye now dwell.

Mr Good. You see from this that Abraham was required by God to leave his country and his friends, and to go away into a strange land among strange people.

Mary. Would Abraham not be sorry to leave all his friends?

Mr Good. Very likely he would. But, he had some of his friends with him—Sarah his wife; his nephew Lot, with probably herdsmen and servants. Besides, God had great purposes to fulfill, and Arabam was ready to obey him. You will see this by reading the passage in Genesis, where, besides the call to leave his country and friends, God made to Arabam many exceeding great and precious promises concerning the purpose he had in choosing him. Read now, Mary, Gen. xii. 1, 2, 3.

Mary. (Reading) Now the Lord had said unto Abram, Get thee out of thy country, and from thy kindred, and from thy father's house, unto a land that I will shew thee. And I will make for thee a great nation, and I will bless thee, and make thy name great, and thou shalt be a blessing: and I will bless them that bless thee, and curse him that curseth thee: and in thee shall all families of the earth be blessed.

Mr Good. Abraham had to travel about 400 miles. He arrived first at the plain of Moreh in Shechem, afterward called Samaria, about 40 miles to the north of Jerusalem. Here he received distinct intimation that this was the land God had intended to give him. 'Unto thy seed will I give this land;' and here he built an altar to God. After this he removed a little farther southwards, to the neighborhood of Bethel, as you will find by reading the 8th verse.

Mary. (Reading) And he removed from thence into a mountain on the east of Beth-el, and pitched his tent, having Beth-el on the west and Hai on the east: and there he builded an altar unto the Lord, and called upon the name of the Lord.

Mr Good. Abraham still journeyed southwards until a famine, or scarcity of food, drove him to Egypt—a journey nearly as long as the former. He afterwards returned to Bethel, where it was found necessary to separate from his nephew Lot, owing to the great increase of their flocks and herds, and the quarrels between their herdsmen. Abraham showed his generosity by giving Lot his choice to go either to the right or left. Lot chose good ground but bad neighbors, which he found afterwards to his sad experience. Abraham's generosity was rewarded by a remarkable repetition of the promise of the land, both to his seed and to himself personally. Read chapter xiii. 14-17.

Mary. (Reading) And the Lord said unto Abram, after that Lot was separated from him, Lift up now thine eyes, and look from the place where thou art northward, and southward, and eastward, and westward. For all the land which thou seest, to thee will I give it, and to thy seed for ever. And I will make thy seed as the dust of the earth: so that if a man can number the dust of the earth, then shall thy seed also be numbered. Arise, walk through the land in the length of it and in the breadth of it; for I will give it unto thee.

Mr Good. You will see from the last verse of that chapter, that Abraham removed to Hebron (marked H), a place about 18 miles south of Jerusalem, where he seems afterwards to have spent the greater part of his life. And here again he built an altar to the Lord.

Mary. But, papa, were there any people in Canaan when Abraham came to live there?

Mr Good. Oh, yes; we are twice told in the narrative (Gen. xii. 6; xiii. 7) that the Canaanite was then in the land; that is, that the descendants of Canaan, grandson of Noah, had increased sufficiently to occupy the country. But there seems to be no word of their objecting to Abraham, as there would be plenty of room. He lived on good terms with them.

Mary. Were the Canaanites good people, papa?

Mr Good. Very far from it. They had by this time become very wicked especially in that part where Lot took up his abode. 'The men of Sodom were wicked, and sinned before the Lord exceedingly'—Gen. xiii. 13.—and were at last destroyed with their cities by fire from heaven, the locality becoming a deep lake called the Salt Sea, which you will see towards the lower part of the map. These people had also become worshippers of false gods; and so had even Abraham's relations in Chaldee (Josh. xxiv. 2.) And it was to preserve the knowledge of the true God, and to communicate his will to future generations, that Abraham was chosen.

Henry. It was surely not a very nice place for Abraham to come to.

Mr Good. Certainly not. But you must remember that while Abraham was a pilgrim and a stranger among those bad people, he was led to look forward to a future time, when he should, along with his seed, the Christ, become the proprietor of the land, and be the means of blessing to all the nations of the earth. You would notice that, in the Hebrews, it is said that Abraham 'was called to go out into a place which he should after receive for an inheritance,' and that, during his lifetime, he sojourned in the land of promise as in a strange country, and even 'died in faith not having received the promises (in fulfilment), but having seen them afar off.'

Henry. But, papa, don't many people think that Abraham is now inheriting the promises in heaven?

Mr Good. Yes. I am sorry to say that many do think so; and they probably understand 'seeing them afar off' to apply to distance in space, and that the distant locality is the 'better country, which is an heavenly,' spoken of in verse 16. But those people forget that 'afar off' refers to distance in time as well as in space; and also that Abraham really looked to a then distant future; for he 'rejoiced to see Christ's day, and he saw it and was glad.' They also forget that it is not a better country than Canaan, but a better country than Chaldea, that the apostle is speaking of. Mary will read verses 14-16, and you will see this.

Mary. (Reading) For they that say such things declare plainly that seek a country. And truly, if they had been mindful of that country from which they came out, they might have had opportunity to have returned. But now they desire a better country, that is, an heavenly: wherefore God is not ashamed to be called their God: for he had prepared for them a city.

Henry. But how can the earthly Canaan be called a heavenly country?

Mr Good. You might as well ask how any country in any part of the universe could be called a heavenly country? The planet Jupiter is in the heavens, but surely that circumstance does not entitle any district upon its surface to be called a heavenly country. It is not locality, but character, that is described by the term 'heavenly.' 'Thy will be done in earth as it is in heaven,' is a prayer that shall one day be answered; and surely 'the holy land' will then be worthy to be called a heavenly country.

Henry. Yes; that seems beyond question; is it not somewhere said Abraham is now inheriting the promises?

Mr Good. I am not aware of any such saying in the Bible. But if you would turn to Heb. vi. 12, you will find a verse which seems to say something like it, but it only seems.

Henry. (Reading) That ye be not slothful, followers of them who through faith and patience inherit the promises.

Mr Good. You see the word 'now' is not in that verse. But we must also remember that certain promises had a partial, and one in particular a complete fulfilment in the life of Abraham. The promise of the birth of Isaac was through faith and patience inherited in actual fact by Abraham and Sarah. This is plainly declared in Rom. iv. 18-21 and in Heb. xi. 11-13. And it is this event which is specially alluded to in Heb. vi., as you will see by reading the whole passage. And the word inherit is just as applicable to unfulfilled promises as to those which are fulfilled, just as the disciples are exhorted to 'hope to the end for the grace to be brought to them'—not during their lifetime, or at the moment of death—but 'at the revelation of Jesus Christ.'

Henry. Besides, the apostle so plainly says Abraham 'died in faith, not having received the promises, but having seen them afar off.'

Mr Good. Decidedly; and he even puts it still more strongly; for at the close of the chapter he declares that some did not die, but were taken from the earth—such as Enoch and Elijah, having obtained a good report through faith, received not the promise, God having provided (margin, foreseen) some better thing for us, that they without us should not be made perfect.'

Henry. And will Enoch and Elijah come back to the earth to inherit the promises?

Mr Good. Undoubtedly; for even Christ himself is to come back to the earth to receive the promised inheritance. This was foretold by a remarkable vision shown to the prophet Daniel, which Mary can read in the 7th chapter and 13th and 14th verses.

Mary. (Reading) I saw in the night visions, and, behold, one like the Son of man came with the clouds of heaven, and came to the Ancient of days, and they brought him near before him. And there was given him dominion, and glory, and a kingdom, that all people, nations, and languages, should serve him: his dominion is an everlasting dominion, which shall not pass away, and his kingdom that which shall not be destroyed.

Mr. Good. Now, the only kingdom promised to Christ is the kingdom of his father David—which, you know, was established in the land promised to Abraham—over the twelve tribes of Israel. When this kingdom was overturned by God for the wickedness of the people and their rulers, who were taken captive to Babylon, God said: 'I will overturn till be come whose right it is, and I will give it him.' And before Jesus was born, an angel said to the Virgin Mary: 'The Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David, and he shall reign over the house of Jacob for ever, and of his kingdom there shall be no end.' And Jesus himself told his disciples that they should 'in his kingdom sit on thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel.'

Henry. But how do we know that Abraham will have anything to do with that kingdom? Wasn't he only promised the land?

Mr. Good. Well, Jesus said to the Jews: 'Many shall come from the east and west, and shall sit down with Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob, in the kingdom of heaven,' a 'heavenly kingdom' established in the 'heavenly country' promised to Abraham, in which the prayer of Jesus shall be answered—'Thy kingdom come, thy will be done in earth as it is heaven.' And Paul tells us that Abraham received a 'promise that he should be the heir of the world;' and we know that the world, and all its kingdoms, are to become the kingdom of our Lord and of his Christ, and that Abraham is to have a part in that kingdom.

Henry. What is the meaning of Abraham dying in faith?

Mr. Good. It simply means that he believed that, although he should die, the promises should nevertheless be fulfilled in his own proper person; for the apostle tells us (Rom. iv. 21) that Abraham believed that 'what God had promised he was able to perform;' and in Heb. xi. 19, that he believed in God's power even to raise the dead to life again.

Henry. And so the promises shall be fulfilled after the resurrection?

Mr. Good. Clearly so; when Christ comes, to whom, with Abraham as his seed, the promises were made. And this is what makes the coming of the Christ an event of so much importance to all who understand the Bible in a simple, natural way. But we must now leave off our conversation on this very important subject, hoping to take up some other points connected with it at another time.

The Restitution.

"THE RESTITUTION OF ALL THINGS WHICH GOD HATH SPOKEN BY THE MOUTH OF ALL HIS HOLY PROPHETS SINCE THE WORLD BEGAN."

VOL. XXXI. PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, JULY 19, 1882. NO. 27.

THE RESTITUTION.

TERMS—TWO DOLLARS PER YEAR, Payable in advance. Three and Six Months at the same rate.

Address all Letters and Communications to THE RESTITUTION, Plymouth, Indiana.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortalized saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

COMING AGE—ITS PROXIMITY. No. III.

Rise of the Beast from the Abyss. French Revolution Traced to the First Outbreak. Mob of July 14, 1789. Taking of the Bastille. Constituent Assembly. Church Property Taken. Second Mob. Struggles Between the Various Orders.

J. P. WESTHER.

These families of nobility continued to oppress the lower orders. They scorned the idea of any middle class, and all the claims of the modern nobility. The nobles and clergy owned two-thirds of the landed estates in France; and resided in Paris, and wasted their substance in luxury and dissipation.

The ecclesiastical state of France was in a similar condition. All persons of plebeian birth were diligently excluded from its dignities. However splendid might be their talents, and unsullied their character, they were doomed to labor at the oar for life. "They withered beneath the cold shade of aristocracy."—Col. Napier.

The humbler clergy (curates) and peasants belonged to the same class. An army officer was required to have one hundred years of nobility before the office would entitle its holder to rank among the notables. The struggle of the American Revolution advanced the work of the French Revolution. Such was the political and ecclesiastical ferment in France, that Louis XVI. called an assembly of the people. The body, composed of nobles, clergy, and the tiers etat (third estate), gave the visible start to the Revolution. It called into national existence a power from the lower class, that soon gathered strength sufficient to attack; and finally to pull down the politico-ecclesiastical fabric that had stood for nearly thirteen centuries.

The Constituent Assembly met at Versailles on the 25th of May, 1789. It was composed of three bodies, distinct in all particulars. The nobles were secular, and wholly interested in sustaining the throne: the clergy, whose first duty was to work for the power and perpetuity of the altar, and in a secondary sense, to defend the throne, only as it protected the altar; and the tiers etat, the third estate, whose number (as they represented the people) equalled the number in the other two branches. These represented the taxpayers, and they were degraded in the eyes of the nobles and the clergy. The nobility and clergy, at first, refused to meet with the tiers etat; but these representatives of the nation being joined by members from the other two bodies, formed the majority, and soon declared themselves to be the nation. They were the supreme representatives of the three great functions of power, legislative, judicial, and executive. Up to this time the nobility and clergy were exempted from every species of taxation, except capitation tax, and that in a very unequal proportion.

As the sittings of the assembly progressed, and their views were printed and circulated among the masses, all the thinking people saw that the nation was on the rim of a volcanic crater, whose deep rumblings could be distinctly heard, and whose pent-up forces were felt very sensibly. All classes were musing as to when and where would be the first shock. In which class its effects would first be felt.

The first outbreak was a mob, July 12, 1789. The sans culottes were in motion—the volcanic powers, forced up from the "abyss," mire and filth. The lower classes: vulgar obscene women headed the mob. On the 14th, the mob took possession of the Bastille, a noted state's prison; they demolished it and liberated its prisoners. One of the inmates deserves special note since it exposes the tyranny of those times. His offence was the uttering of some expressions of disrespect toward Louis XV.

"He had been in confinement for forty-seven years, and had borne up against the horrors of his prison-house with a manly spirit. His thin, white, and scattered hairs, had acquired an almost iron rigidity. On the day of his liberation, his door was flung wide open, and a strange voice announced to him his freedom. Hardly comprehending the meaning of the words, he rose and tottered through the courts and halls of the prison, which appeared to him interminable. His eyes by degrees became accustomed to the light of day, but the motion of the carriage which was to convey him to his former abode appeared unendurable. At length, supported by a friendly arm, he reached the street in which he had once resided, but on the spot formerly occupied by his house, stood a public building, and nothing remained in that quarter that he recognized. None of the living beings of the vast city knew him; his liberty was a worthless gift, and he wept for the solitude of his dungeon. Accident brought in his way an old domestic, a superannuated porter, who had barely strength sufficient to discharge the duties of his office. He did not recognize his master, but told him that his wife had died of grief thirty years before, that his children had gone abroad, and that not one of his relations remained. Overcome by this intelligence, the captive supplicated the minister to take him back to the dungeon from which he had been liberated, and the man of office was moved to tears by his misery. The old porter became his companion, as he was the only person who could converse to him of the friends he had lost, but so wretched was the isolated condition of the victim of the Bastile, that he died not long after his liberation."—Cottage Encyclopedia.

On the 4th of August, feudal, and manorial rights were abrogated by the National Assembly, at which time they published a declaration of the equality of human rights. Titles of count, marquis, and baron; all hereditary titles were abolished.

The prince royal and all the nobles who could escape sought safety in flight. The royal family attempted flight, but were apprehended, and brought back. The period of the Constituent Assembly was noted for its low mobs composed of the rabble of both sexes. On the sixth of October, 1790, when the king was taken, a mob of the lowest class of women followed him. "A troop of women, ugly as crime itself, swarming like insects, and wearing grenadiers' hairy caps, went continually to and fro, howling barbarous songs, embracing and insulting the life-guards; this they continued for eight hours." What a degraded and corrupt state of morals in the lower classes is here exhibited; and yet these were the elements that shook down the Altar and the Throne.

The assembly soon made an attack upon the church property. (They began to eat her flesh—Rev. xvii. 16). This property was of immense value. Its aggregate revenues amounted to 130,000,000 livres, and the landed estate of the clergy was nearly one-fifth of that of all other proprietors. Their depravity also was equal to that of the nobles, and their pride vastly superior. By the aid of this property the revolution was sustained for a long time. Talleyrand, Bishop of Autun, made the motion in the assembly that the property of the church should be at the disposal of the nation. Protestants, expatriated at the edict of Nantes, had their property confiscated. Only a part of that property was ever restored. They were treated with other indignities. The nobility and clergy were against the admission of Jews and Protestants to the enjoyment of the common rights. The property of the crown and clergy sold to the amount of 400,000,000 francs. These acts of the assembly joined to their infidel movements, brought down the Papal Anathemas. The Pope was filled with horror, and had preached a crusade against it; and raised all the monks and priests against the infidel uprising. He anathematized France, and had suffered the French ambassadore to be assassinated. Such acts excited relentless hatred in the assembly against the Papal Hierarchy, and as the papacy was sustained by the king and the nobility, they made war against the throne, and against all that sustained it. "They wanted to strangle the last of kings with the intestines of the last of priests." A mob of 30,000 passed through the hall of the assembly. Enormous tables upon which lay the declaration of rights headed the procession. Around these tables danced women and children, bearing olive branches and pikes; other women came. Ragged breeches were held up in the air with shouts of "Vivent les sans culottes!" On the point of a pike was borne a calf's head, with this inscription, "Heart of an aristocrat." A tree, called Feudalism, was erected. On its branches were crowns, blue ribbons, tiaras, cardinal's hats, St. Peter's keys, ermine mantles, doctor's caps, bags of law proceedings, titles of nobility, escutcheons, coats of arms, and other insignia. The king was invited to set fire to it. He refused, saying, "There is no longer any such thing as feudalism." The tree was consumed amid the shouts of the low, vulgar rabble.

This act illustrates very clearly the ruling spirit of those times. On the 13th of February, 1790, a decree was passed, abolishing all monastic orders; another, suppressing all religious orders. It was evident that the assembly was aiming to overthrow Christianity. All her decrees tended to such a result, and to accomplish that end they were aided by the lowest strata of society. On the 19th of June, Nobility was abolished.

On the 30th of September, 1791, was the last sitting of the Constituent Assembly. This assembly during the three years of its existence, enacted 1309 laws and decrees relative to legislation, or to the general administration of the State. They held supreme power, though there was a king. He was stripped of all power, and was insulted by the vile rabble.

The Legislative Assembly met Oct. 1, 1791. It was simply a change of name, having the infidel heart. It was the same deep, bloody, desolating river in its onward flow. They took hold of the car of revolution, on the very spot where the Constituent Assembly had been uncoupled from it. Fresh from the people they pushed the new order with untiring vigor.

On the 6th of April, 1792, a decree passed, suppressing all religious communities. Ecclesiastical costumes were also prohibited. The French monarchy, the oldest in Europe, and which had always been feudal, was overthrown on the 10th of August of the same year. The Legislative Assembly closed its sessions September 21, having passed in all, 2140 decrees. Their sittings had been turbulent and exceedingly bloody.

On the 21st of September, 1792, the National Convention was opened. One of their first acts was the abolition of Royalty. At the same time the Republic was proclaimed. On the next day, 22nd, began the Republican era. All the old administration was renewed, being suspected of having some taint of royalism. The reign of the National Convention opened up by terrible slaughter of priests, and the nobility, when they could be found. They declared war against nearly all Europe. On the 23rd of October, a law was passed, banishing in mass, and forever, the emigrants (nobles that had left their country), and decreeing the penalty of death against all, without distinction of age or sex, who should return to France. A terrible riot soon followed, the destruction of the royal tombs of St. Denis.

"The royal tombs at St. Denis, near Paris, the ancient cemetery of the Bourbons, the Valois, and all the long line of French monarchs, were not only defaced on the outside, but utterly broken down, the bodies exposed, and the bones dispersed. The first vault opened was that of Turenne. The body was found dry like a mummy, and the features perfectly resembling the portrait of that distinguished general. Relics were sought after with eagerness, and Camille Desmoulins cut off one of the little fingers. The features of Henry IV. were also perfect. A soldier cut off a lock of the beard with his sabre. The body was placed upright on a stone for the rabble to divert themselves with it; and a woman, reproaching the dead Henry with the crime of having been a king, knocked down the corpse by giving it a blow in the face. Two large pits had been dug in front of the north entrance of the church, and quick lime laid in them. Into those pits the bodies were thrown promiscuously; the leaden coffins were then carried to a furnace, which had been erected in the cemetery, and cast into balls destined to punish the enemies of the Republic."—Scott's Life of Napoleon.

"THE WATERS OF NOAH."

Our beloved brother, C. Boardman, asks for a discourse on Isa. liv. 9. "For this is as the waters of Noah unto me; for as I have sworn that the waters of Noah should no more go over the earth; so have I sworn that I would not be wroth with thee .... For the mountains shall depart and the hills be removed; but my kindness.... the covenant of my peace—shall not be removed, saith the Lord, that hath mercy on thee."

The point lies in the second clause. Verse 9. As he had "sworn that those waters should no more go over the earth," so he had "sworn that he would not be wroth with his people," (after "the reproach of their widowhood," verse 4, and after their having been "as a woman forsaken, grieved and refused;" but) when again taken into favor, Verses 5–8. The wrath and forsaking had been very brief—"a moment;" but the gathering (restoring) should be in "great mercies and everlasting kindness."

"The covenant of peace" with them will be "the everlasting covenant." The phrase "everlasting" occurs near twenty times in this relation to "the covenant with Noah, with Abraham, with Israel and with David." "The old covenant" by Moses (permitting apostacy and wrath) was temporary: "till the seed should come, to whom (in whom) the promises were made" (Gal. iii. 8-29); and by whom "the new, everlasting covenant" will be made and administered forever. Rom. xi. 26-29; Heb. viii. 8-12; xiii. 20; Luke i. 32, 33; Ezek. xxxvii. 14-28; Psa. lxxxix. 33, 34.

The "little wrath" (verse 8) falls into "the times" of Gentile oppression. Isa. x. 12-27; Zech. i. 18-22; Matt. xxiii. 37-39; Luke xxi. 24. It is short and small, when contrasted with "the great mercies and everlasting kindness," which are to succeed.

Our gospel age is intermediate; and parenthetical, to "take from the Gentiles a people for his name—(to be) the seed—and sons according to promise," (Gal. iii. 24-29; Acts xv. 14), after which he will return and build again the tabernacle and throne of David (Isa. xvi. 5; Luke i. 33; xxii. 29, 30,) in Zion—Jerusalem the metropolis of the land of promise.

The times of the blessed and only Potentate; the reign of Christ and his saints, to restore, to bless and fill out "the great mercies," and dispense the infinite, endless fulness of all the promises, belong here.

Israel and kindred terms occur over three thousand times; before their captivity; through their captivity; and now it belongs to them many times after it. Amen. Shall we accept Israel in all the realities of the two parts; and then doubt and deny eternal truth, as embraced in the irreversible covenant with Noah? with all flesh and the earth? Gen. ix. 8–17. No, no. This unchanging covenant with Noah is here employed to confirm the promises to Israel in this prophecy. Nay, its seal is also seen to encircle the Divine throne in the future. Rev. iv. The beautiful bow of promise is also made to adorn the herald angel in proclaiming his message. Rev. x. 1–7.

As Isaiah used it to assure and console the heart of Israel, so the revealing angel in heralding the coming kingdom, employs it to win upon the faith of all "who have ears to hear." Its import is that God is gracious in his purpose, that he has purposed in the earth.

He says, "I will remember my covenant with Jacob, and my covenant with Isaac; and my covenant with Abraham will I remember; and I will remember the land." Lev. xxvi. 28–42. Thus the prophet is inspired to refer to the covenant with Noah after the flood; to awaken hope for Israel, "according to promise." The range of our text is commensurate with Revelation; but so much in brief.

Fraternally, in glorious hope,
J. B. COOK.

Out of free religion has grown free irreligion; and out of infidel liberality, immorality. —Joseph Cook.

BAPTISM AND THE REMISSION OF SINS.

In RESTITUTION for April 26th, I observe an article by Brother Wm. Laing copied from the Messenger, on the passage in Acts ii. 38. "Repent and be baptized every one of you in the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins." Brother Laing says "for the main idea in the foregoing he is indebted to Mr. J. M. Denniston, M. A., of Jamaica, in his work 'The Sacrifice for Sin.'" It is said "instead of 'in the name' read 'on the name' of Jesus Christ." Also that "'on' is not related to the word baptized but to the name of Jesus Christ;" and that "'baptized on' does not make sense, and we require to supply a word, thus—'Repent and be baptized every one of you (resting or believing) on the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins.'" Certain passages are then quoted to show that "epi, (upon) refers to the name of any one as the foundation upon which the act rests." This seems to be directed towards disconnecting the remission of sins from baptism, and to connect remission of sins exclusively with resting or believing on the name of Jesus Christ, apart from being baptized. Leaving out of view in the meantime the bearing of the proposition * επι* (epi) on the question, I would observe there is enough in the passage apart from it to render any supplement unnecessary. The act of baptism is intimately associated by the apostle in the words under notice with the act of repentance by the conjunction "and." It will not be doubted that repentance is essentially connected with the remission of sins. It would, therefore, be just as reasonable to sever remission of sins from repentance as to sever it from baptism, in the connection in which it stands here. John's baptism of repentance for the remission of sins," shows this relation at least as far as repentance is concerned; and it would certainly be unsafe, to say the least, to sever baptism from repentance as an essential condition of remission of sins.

If Peter prescribed repentance as a condition of remission, how can this be admitted, and baptism, which is so inseparably combined with it by the copulative conjunction "and," be struck out? Or take the reverse of this question—How can baptism be here dissociated from the remission of sins, without also dissociating repentance from remission?

Taking along with this the fact that the direction given by Peter was in reply to a most urgent inquiry by men who had just been cut to the heart by "the demonstration of the spirit" from the mouth of the apostle, of the Lordship and Messiahship of Jesus, and that his first and only prescription was —"Repent and be baptized," for the words that followed were merely giving the authority and mentioning the consequences, as we shall see anon.

A few words now as to the proposition epi. Mr. Denniston's idea seems to be based on the circumstance that επι (epi) and not εν (en) is the preposition used by Peter. This is said to be "very remarkable seeing that the words baptize and baptized are elsewhere followed, for obvious reasons by the preposition in or into." This is quite true: but there is one case where the word "baptized" is followed by in which affords a clue to the use and meaning of epi in Acts ii. 38. I refer to the words of the historian Luke in Acts x. 48., in which he describes what took place at the close of Peter's address in the house of Cornelius—"He commanded them to be baptized in (εν) the name of the Lord." There can be no doubt that the sense here is not into the name but by the authority of the Lord.

Several instances in which the phrase "in (εν) the name" can bear no other meaning, can be given; but what I especially wish to point out is the fact that the phrase "in or on (επι) the name" has precisely the same signification. I cite a few of each which I place in parallel columns to show more distinctly the identity of meaning, the first instance given of each being evidently used on the same occasion reported by different writers, while within a space of two verses (Mark ix. 38, 39) both εν and επι are used in exactly the same sense:—

| εν | επι |
|---|---|
| We saw one casting out devils in (εν) thy name.—Mark ix. 38. | We saw one casting out devils in (επι) my name.—Luke ix. 49. |

In (εν) my name shall do a miracle, that can lightly speak evil of me.—Mark ix. 39.

In (εν) my name shall they cast out devils.—Mark xvi. 17.

Preached boldly in the name of Jesus.—Acts ix. 27.

Speak boldly in the name of Jesus.—Acts iv. 17, also 18.

Ye should not teach in (επι) this name.—Acts v. 28, also 40.

In (εν) the name of Jesus.—Acts ix. 29.

When Peter and John were brought before the Jewish authorities for healing the lame man, they were asked—"By what power or by what name have ye done this?" The apostles answered —"By the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth." The power or authority is here expressed in the phrase "by the name." Acts iv. 7, 10. See also 1 Cor. v. 4; 2 Thess. iii. 6. The text quoted in the article (Luke xxiv. 47) is evidently to the same effect—"that repentance and remission of sins should be preached in his name (by his authority) among all nations." Should it still be held that this passage, and others of a similar import, refer to remission of sins through the name as a medium, it avails nothing against the instrumentality of baptism, seeing that in Acts ii. 38 it is prescribed in immediate connection with repentance; and that in other passages—such as Acts viii. 16 disciples are said to be "baptized into (εις) the name of the Lord Jesus." But I do not see that Luke xxiv. 47, teaches remission through the name as a medium simply because "repentance" is conjoined with remission, as an element of the preaching—both being preached by the authority of the Lord.

It is remarkable that the only two instances of persons being commanded to be baptized upon the name and in the name of the Lord, respectively, are the Jews on the day of Pentecost, and the Gentiles in the house of Cornelius. There was a fitness in the peculiar circumstances of each occasion for the authority of the Lord being asserted in unmistakable terms. The position of the apostles as the ambassadors of Christ was thus indicated at the very outset; and we have seen that they spoke, preached, taught, baptized, and wrought miracles, in the name, upon the name, or by the authority of their Master.

This paper is longer than I contemplated, although I have confined myself to the one passage regarding the province of baptism. I hope I have made myself intelligible and shall gladly consider any remarks that may be offered by any one on the subject.

Inclosed find $2.00 to apply on subscription to THE RESTITUTION, realizing as I now do that our time is short, and that I cannot express in words my gratitude for the loving kindness of our dear Lord in leading me by his spirit in the way of truth.

By the grace of God I shall not soon forget the dawn of my future hope. THE RESTITUTION sent messenger of light, took me by the hand and led me a sinner, yet a professed Christian, out of the darkness into the light, and awakened me from that slumber into which I had willingly fallen a victim of Satan, ignoring the fact that I with other Orthodox professors of profession only were being swept onward by the mighty tide of time, to be awakened at last to an utter contempt and a consciousness of inability to see the truth. And while I now hold fast to the anchor of hope which is restored to me by the knowledge and truth of THE RESTITUTION whose beacon light the reader cannot fail to recommend to the seeker for that beautiful haven beyond, where the wanderer shall behold the darkness no more, where there is no need of the sun to give her light, for Jesus is the light thereof.

I wish to say that I can see a vitality in your paper that cannot die, for, death comes only from inward disease. And I can see the sentinels of truth bearing the mighty sword of the Spirit as they walk to and fro upon their posts of honor, guarding this beautiful Restorer of Eden, and I can hear its great heart beat, and do believe it will continue to beat when thousands of others with their advocates are buried in the dust.

As now I assure you I cannot forget your favor for continuing my paper while I was in your debt, and as you have an additional prayer for the guidance of the Holy Spirit in the superintending of this Pilgrim Guide, I hope to ever be awake to Christian duty, and watching for the Bright and Morning Star.

Editor Restitution:

We have been much pleased and benefitted by the most excellent matter brought us every week by THE RESTITUTION. The spirit now pervading it seems to become more and more Christlike. Surely this is as it should be, for we see on every hand that the signs are being fulfilled, the way-marks passed by and thereby do we know the day of our redemption hasteth greatly. I sometimes think I am too impatient for the Master to appear and put an end to all this cruel wickedness which stalks abroad in the land making the heart sick to read and the weary soul to cry out, "How long O Lord."

I still continue to lend THE RESTITUTION and tracts, and hope I see now one faint ray of light reflected therefrom. Surely God's ancient people are being hunted, and fished out of all lands, and my daily prayers is, Lord hasten the time of their full deliverance.

Mrs. Davis' letters are to me very interesting, and I hope are long if all is well to send something towards that fund mentioned in the last number of the paper.

May God abundantly bless you in your arduous labors and more closely bind all his servants in the bonds of Christian fellowship.

Editor Restitution:

I send one dollar for our much loved paper, THE RESTITUTION, for another six months. I think the reading is more and more interesting, it is like an oasis in the desert, its blessed truths cheer and refresh and strengthen my weak and unfaithful heart, and my heart leaps for joy as I near that day which is to usher my Savior's blessed coming. The world sees no signs or beauty in his blessed word. The more we study the Scriptures the more we see the signs of his near coming. I see no safety only to live watching and praying and clinging close to Jesus. It is sad to see men of talent and learning, and who once preached the unsearchable riches of Christ, living in open rebellion against Jesus and his word, leading the simple in by and forbidden paths. O, how I long for the peaceful reign of Christ.

Brethren and sisters of the one faith, let us be faithful to the end that we may receive the welcome well done, and have an entrance into his near kingdom. Hoping to meet you with all the redeemed, where pain and death will never come. From your unworthy sister in Christ.

HARRIET COVEY.

The most intelligent hearers are those who enjoy most heartily the simplest preaching. It is not they who clamor for superlatively intellectual or esthetic sermons. Daniel Webster used to complain of some of the preaching to which he listened. "In the house of God" he wanted to meditate "upon the simple verities, and the undoubted facts of religion;" not upon mysteries and abstractions.—Austin Phelps.

THE RESTITUTION.

S. A. CRANDALL, EDITOR.

Plymouth, Indiana, July 19, 1882.

An editorial of our own and some other articles must be deferred.

We tender our thanks to Brother H. Heyes, of England, to Brother G. W. Young, of New York, and to Sister Stephenson, of Chicago, for late papers.

While in Philadelphia we had the pleasure of meeting Dr. E. G. Welch, editor of the Christian Chitiast. He has removed from Wilmington, Del., to the former city. In the interpretation of prophecy the Doctor advocates the views of the Futurists.

Thanks to some kind friends for extra help for our paper, and to others for sending new subscribers. We hope to see THE RESTITUTION self-supporting before long. Hitherto God has helped us, and we believe he will continue his blessing. Brethren, pray for us.

Our Rest, for July, has a remarkable article on The Measure of the New Jerusalem, illustrating the expression, "The measure of the city is the measure of a man." Modern discoveries are pointing out the harmonies of science and revelation—showing both to be in accord.

From the tenor of our news items it would seem that the war in the East, so far from being ended by the capture of Alexandria, may be only just begun. It now looks as though it might turn out to be a war of races and religions. Should the wild savage hordes of the desert marshal under the lead of the mysterious prophet who is battling in the south, and should the conflict assume the character of a holy war, enlisting the fanaticism of the Moslem millions, the conflict may become one of the most sanguinary struggles in the annals of the world. We shall watch the progress of the bloody contest with more than ordinary interest, and await the denouement with anxious solicitude. That it will have a bearing on the fulfilment of prophecy we have no doubt.

Some few have responded to our request to contribute something for Mrs. A. E. Davis in Jerusalem. We wish all who feel an interest in news from the city of the Great King, would send something for her. Her letters that we have republished from the Age to Come Herald have been more than welcome to our readers. Small amounts from many will make a sum in the aggregate that will benefit her. It is true that our paper, THE RESTITUTION, mainly needs our aid and—is entitled to it—but many can send a dime or more for her when sending a remittance for our own loved paper. The good Lord has blessed our land with good crops, and we now expect our patrons will feel it a privilege to aid us in our work, and do a little otherwise. We are the Lord's stewards and the time of reward draws near. Work while the day lasts.

A FRIEND writes: "Please discontinue my paper, as I am dissatisfied with so much dry reading about the restoration of the Jews, of their persecutions, and of the rebuilding of Jerusalem, and the age-to-come story, things I cannot believe. You have my thanks for sending me the paper as you have done, but please stop it now." In our Savior's time there were some of "little faith" and some slow to believe all that the prophets had spoken. John Bunyan came across one of this little faith family supporting himself on crutches if we rightly remember. But our friend is evidently of a still more incredulous stock. Although reported in all the leading papers, our friend cannot believe what is said "about the restoration of the Jews, their persecutions, the rebuilding of Jerusalem," etc. We now recollect of only one instance of so great incredulity. An old lady once (as we read in a paper) gave an account of a man who was a Calvinian in the first place, and went so far in this doctrine that he did not believe anybody would be saved; next he became a Universalist, and believed everybody would be saved; failing to sustain this theory by the Scriptures, the old lady said he finally turned Free Mason and didn't believe nothing. Notwithstanding our friend's incredulity we have great hope in his case. He paid up all past dues like an honest man, and we bid him farewell with regret. To be serious, we are sorry that he fails to see in all that is so distasteful to him the very signs that demonstrate that the end of this dispensation is imminently near. We hope some of our friends will find us a new subscriber in his place. With kindest wishes to our friend we part, praying that his faith may be increased greatly in due time.

REJOICING IN HOPE.

The War in Egypt—The Beginning of the End.

Tuesday, July 11th, in the year of our Lord, 1882, is destined to be, in all future time, a notable and memorable day in human history. That day witnesses the inauguration of the work of doom of the present cosmos—the approaching rapid downfall of these "times of the Gentiles," which for eighteen centuries past, have been permitted to dominate and direct the affairs of our world. Now begins a change—God rises up for the judgment of the nations. Let us hope that the war in Egypt is the beginning of the end—that it is at last the tocsin for which the weary saints have been so long listening. It tells us that the long-pending Eastern Question is to find its final solution—not in the successful arts of a delusive diplomacy, nor in the temporary devices of human wisdom, but in that last argument of the kings—the stern, unrelenting, ruthless arbitrament of war! This indeed is an irrepressible conflict, in which men and nations are actors and instruments, but whose arbiter and disposer is God.

Certain political necessities and international complications concur with the design and purpose of Jehovah to make the war now begun of vast extent and unparalleled destructiveness. England and France must hold the Suez Canal intact. The law of national geography and the necessities of the world's commerce must control this indispensable highway between the East and the West. This necessitates the conquest or armed occupation of Egypt. The Egyptians on their part resent and resist this conquest and absorption of their territory, but Egypt being weak and distracted—called in Scripture, at this crisis, "the basest of kingdoms"—is unable to defend herself against the vast superiority of Britain and of all Western Europe, if need be, and must succumb to the inevitable. But, as in common with all Mussulmans, the Egyptians hate the Franks, the war will speedily become one of religions and races, and this may bring all Europe and Asia into the struggle. It thus becomes, in the language of Revelation, "The war of the great day of Almighty God," the grand result of which will be the downfall of all existing governments over mankind, social, political and ecclesiastical; and the erection on their ruins of that kingdom predicted in the book of Daniel, ii. 44, when, as John tells us in Rev. xi. 15, and xv. 3-5, "the kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord and his Christ and he shall reign forever and ever."

The partial return of the Jews to their ancient heritage, after their long exile—an event which we now see taking place before our eyes, and which this war will rapidly hasten—is to precede the coming of the Christ, according to what is written in Rom. xi. 12-16: "If the dispersion of the Jews be (the means of) the reconciling the Gentiles (unto Christ) what shall the restoration of them (the Jews) be but life from the dead, i. e. by resurrection, at the coming of Christ and the establishment of his kingdom on earth over all nations."

How literally true is the present and progressive fulfilment of the prophecies in regard to the return of the children of Israel to their ancient inheritance and the particular route of their return. Let the reader turn to Isa. xi. and see what shall happen when "The Lord shall set his hand again a second time to recover the remnant of his people which shall be left, from Assyria and from (or through) Egypt....and from the islands (continents) of the sea (America, Australia, etc.,)—and when he shall utterly destroy the tongue of the Egyptian Sea (the Red Sea lying between Egypt and Palestine) and with his mighty wind (spirit or power, by force of the destructive artillery bombardment of the British war vessels which has well nigh laid Alexandria in ruins) shall shake his hand over the river (Nile) and shall smite it (in Alexandria) in the seven streams (or mouths) and make men go over dry-shod (i. e. by embarking on the Suez Canal), and there shall be a highway for the remnant of his people (the Jews) like as it was to Israel, in the day that he came up out of the land of Egypt."

The Suez Canal has already destroyed the isthmus or tongue of the Egyptian Sea and now we see in the canal, the "highway" for the return of the Jews to their land by the Red Sea route, "dry-shod," on the canal ships and steamers.

Although the world does not believe—indeed does not know—that such marvellous realities are in the Bible, and are now passing before them the saints of God and the brethren of Jesus perceive, and know them—and hence they lift up their heads and rejoice, thanking God and taking courage.

Let the intelligent reader carefully peruse the 11th and 12th chapters of Isaiah together, continuously, as a consecutive prophetic narrative and he will see how this wonderful "second-time restoration" of Israel, now in progress—the first being from the captivity in Babylon—is directly associated with "the Holy One of Israel in the midst of them" and the songs of praise and shouts of triumph, related so glowingly by the prophet in the 12th chapter.

Selections.

THE NEW HEAVENS AND THE NEW EARTH.

Our heaven will not be in some distant sphere, but in this very earth, where sin and sorrow, grief and pain, exist at present, when the fiat shall go forth, "Behold I make all things new." We are not told that we shall go to be with God—whatever becomes of us prior to resurrection is not the question now—but "the tabernacle of God shall be with men, and he will dwell with them, and they shall be his people and he will be their God." That is to say, God will come and fill the whole scene forever. And there shall be no more curse, and no night there, and God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes, and there shall be no more death, neither sorrow nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain, for the former things are passed away. Then the earth, stained as it hitherto has been with crime and cruelty, pain and poverty, oppression and blood, will start on a new career, never to be again blighted with a curse. But the curse will be transmuted into a blessing, and the wilderness into a Paradise—Paradise restored. The Bible opens with the loss of Paradise, and leads us on, unfolding the mysteries of redemption, till it closes with the new man, the new earth, and the new Jerusalem. These, taken together, constitute "the redemption that is in Christ."

This expectation connects us with God's glorious everlasting future, and leads us onward towards it. It is adapted to move the springs of action in the heart, and make us eager and watchful to check indifference and worldliness, and promote godliness. So the apostle thought—"Seeing that these things are thus all to be dissolved, what manner of persons ought ye to be in all manner of holy conversation and godliness, looking for and earnestly desiring the day of God. Wherefore, beloved, seeing that ye look for such things, give diligence that ye may be found of him in peace, without spot, and blameless in his sight." "Having, therefore, these promises, dearly beloved, let us cleanse ourselves from all filthiness of flesh and spirit, perfecting holiness in the fear of God."

"We look to no particular year, but are persuaded that the true position of the Christian church should be that of expecting the coming of the Bridegroom in any and every year, and to stand with the loins girt, and the lights burning, ready to receive him." The possessor of such a hope will seek to make its attainment the great object of his life—he will stretch out after it, cast forward, and not as a mere expectancy, but as an earnest full of glory—he will eagerly desire, earnestly long for, ardently anticipate it, as if to accelerate the day that shall bring the promised good—to speed it forward that he may enjoy the sooner that which is hoped for—"looking for and hastening the day of God." Where such a feeling is circulated there is no desire to remain amid the ashes and ills, changes and losses, of this sorrowful world. Christ is coming again to this very earth, and we shall put on our resurrection robes and go forth to meet him. Then what is only prospect to our hearts, shall be possession exceeding all prospect—transcending all expectation. Every hour that passes is an obstruction taken from them between us and the day of our glorification. No merely spiritual enjoyment of Christ's presence, or of future bliss, can prove an adequate substitute for his personal presence, and the glory for which we wait. Those who say they are satisfied with this alone, are convicted of self-delusion. For the principal evidence of the spiritual presence being enjoyed, is, that it excites an ardent longing for the personal presence, when we shall behold him face to face. "Oh, that he would speed time and days out of the way and make haste!" said the saintly Rutherford. "O day, dawn! O time, run fast! O Bridegroom, post, post fast, that we may meet! O heavens, part asunder, cleave in two, that that bright head and face may not itself through the clouds!"

Will not this hope promote earnestness, prayerfulness, and fidelity, in the discharge of every Christian duty, and prevent our clinging too tenaciously to the things that perish with the using, and keep us constantly ready to exchange the time-state for the eternal?

The greatest events, supposed certainly to be at a remote distance, naturally exercise much less influence over us than does something comparatively insignificant which we believe to be near at hand. If we think the pleasant land is still far away, we shall be tempted but languidly to expect it. For the heart will be kept down and depressed by the burden of things present, and a dimmed prospect of future glory will weaken our hopes of the hereafter. Just so far as we heartily receive this truth shall we refuse to identify ourselves with the interests, pursuits, and objects, of a dying world, and just so far as we wait for the Son from heaven, will we turn from earthly idols, and

> "We strangers in this world below,
> We'll calmly sojourn here;
> Nor will its happiness or woe
> Provoke our hope or fear.
> It's vain on a transient road,
> Its joys as soon are past;
> But oh! the bliss to which we tend,
> Eternally shall last."

Are you a toiler; making others rich while you yourself remain poor?—so poor that to the last you can never expect to sing anything more truthful than the refrain—

> "No foot of land do I possess,
> No cottage in this wilderness—
> A poor wayfaring man,
> I lodge a while in tents below,
> Or only wander to and fro,
> Till I my Canaan gain."

Let me tell you for your encouragement, that though you can never hope to possess more than a grave in the present earth, there is not a foot of it over which you shall not reign hereafter, and the new earth will offer you an everlasting habitation. Continue to walk by faith—look away from the vanities of the present world to the unfading inheritance that shall be "redeemed" at the revelation of Jesus Christ, and the very loss that you may meet in so doing will prove your eternal gain, when the parchments that now prove man's titles to lands and inheritances shall have shrivelled up in the last great fire. Then there will be no more toilsome struggles for a precarious existence.

To the unconverted, this subject is fraught with anything but hope. It is fearful to contemplate. That which brings deliverance to the saint seals the fate of the unbeliever in endless perdition. The saint is looking forward hopefully. But there is another "looking" derived from the same Greek root, which implies an expectation of something dreadful which you would prevent but cannot. You have in this passage "a certain fearful looking for of judgment, and fiery indignation, which shall devour the adversaries." There is a threat to the sinner corresponding to the promise for the righteous in the earth, and always introduced by way of contrast thereto—"The face of the Lord is against them that do evil to cut off the remembrance of them from the earth." "Evil doers shall be cut off." "Destruction shall be to the workers of iniquity." "The wicked shall not inhabit the earth." Psa. xxxiv. 16-37; Prov. x. 30. The wicked are only here on sufferance—tenants-at-will, during the ground landlord's pleasure. The estate must change occupants. The present possessors will be removed, and their possessions given a more deserving people.

O, unconverted man! those things that you now hold so fast will be dissolved. The wealth you accumulate—the honors you wear—the confidence you trust in—will all be fuel for the flames that shall consume you. Why, then, will you continue to heap up your own funeral pyre?—why be content with the trash that perishes while you grasp it?—that flects as a spectre, while you pursue it? You may change the aspect of the future from fearful to hopeful, by changing your attitude toward Christ. Change your mind, and take from him the proffered blessing of salvation—no longer refuse it. Do, this day, be reconciled to God. Do not force him to the dire necessity of exterminating thee to get rid of thy sin. What an abomination it must be to bring on the creation a curse, from which it can only be freed by being dissolved, like metal in a furnace, for the separation of its dross. Sinner, it is in your own power to change the aspect and condition of your future—if changed at all, it must be done by you, and done soon, "for behold the Lord cometh out of his place to punish for their iniquity the inhabitants of the earth." "Nevertheless we, according to his promise, look for new heavens and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness."

Truth is the most powerful thing in the world, since fiction can only please us by its resemblance to it.

MARVELS OF PROVIDENCE.

A celebrated sceptical philosopher of the last century—the historian Hume—thought to demolish the credibility of the Christian Revelation by the concise argument: "It is contrary to experience that a miracle should be true, but not contrary to experience that testimony should be false." Contrary to experience that phenomena should exist which we cannot trace to causes perceptible to the human sense, or conceivable by human thought! It would be much nearer the truth to say that within the husbandman's experience there are no phenomena which can be rationally traced to anything but the instant energy of creative power.

Did this philosopher ever contemplate the landscape at the close of the year, when seeds, and grains, and fruits have ripened, and stalks have withered, and leaves have fallen, and winter has forced her icy curb even into the roaring jaws of Niagara, and sheeted half a continent in her glittering shroud, and all this teeming vegetation and organized life are locked in cold and marble obstruction; and, after week upon week, and month upon month, have swept, with sleet, and chilly rain, and howling storm, over the earth, and riveted their crystal bolts upon the door of nature's sepulchre—when the sun at length begins to wheel in higher circles through the sky, and softer winds to breathe over melting snows—did he ever behold the long-hidden earth at length to appear, and soon the timid grass peep forth; and at last the autumnal wheat begin to paint the field, and velvet leaflets to burst from purple buds, throughout the reviving forest, and then the mellow soil to open its fruitful bosom to every grain and seed dropped from the planter's hand; buried, but to spring up again, clothed with a new, mysterious being; and then, as more fervid suns inflame the air, and softer showers distil from the clouds, and gentler dews string their pearls on twig and tendril, did he ever watch the ripening grain and fruit, pendent from stalk, and vine, and tree; the meadow, the field, the pasture, the grove, each after his kind, arrayed in myriad-tinted garments, instinct with circulating life; seven millions of counted leaves on a single tree," each of which is a system whose exquisite complication puts to shame the shrewdest cunning of the human hand; every planted seed and grain, which had been loaned to the earth, compounding its pious usury thirty, sixty, and a hundred fold, all harmoniously adapted to the sustenance of living nature, the bread of a hungry world; here, a tilled corn-field whose yellow blades are nodding with the food of man; there, an unplanted wilderness—the great Father's farm—where he "who hears the raven's cry" has cultivated, with his own hand, his moroiful crop of berries, and nuts, and acorns, and seeds, for the humbler families of animated nature, the solemn elephant, the browsing deer, the wild pigeon whose fluttering caravan darkens the sky; the merry squirrel who bounds from branch to branch, in the joy of his little life—has he seen all this? Does he see it every year, and month, and day? Does he live, and move, and breathe, and think, in this atmosphere of wonder—himself the greatest wonder of all, whose smallest fibre and faintest pulsation is as much a mystery as the blazing glories of Orion's belt? And does he still maintain that a miracle is contrary to experience? If he has, and if he does, then let him go, in the name of Heaven, and say that it is contrary to experience that the august Power which turns the clods of the earth into the daily bread of a thousand million souls, could feed five thousand in the wilderness.—Edward Everett.

AN ELECTRIC ICE-STORM.

Texas is a country of marvels. Wonderful things are constantly happening. Strange stories are told and stranger truths are developed. A week ago today a cloud, a little larger than a man's hand, passed over the Big Wichita valley, eighteen miles north of us. It lingered but a moment, yet in that moment unheard-of things transpired. It did not hail, but there dropped electric ice. Pieces of ice five inches in diameter, fifteen inches around, were hurled from the upper realms, dashing upon the ground like cannon balls from heavy artillery. Dozens of pieces were gathered and weighed and found to run from fifteen to twenty ounces. One piece broke through the new pine shingles on Tom Gee's house and descending went through the pine ceiling over the sitting room. At another house, Colonel Whaley's we believe, a piece struck the stove-pipe projecting from the roof and cut it off as smooth as could have been done by an instrument of steel. A number of sheep on Elder Brothers' farm were killed, and we have heard of a few cattle having their legs broken. Fortunately there were but one or two pieces to the acre fell. Had they fallen in numbers like hailstones usually come, the entire district would have been one vast ruin—a mingled heap of animal and vegetable life gone out. —Henrietta Shield.

RESTORING ORDER IN ALEXANDRIA.

ALEXANDRIA, July 15.—It is now possible to walk the streets without escort. Cafes and shops are reopening and confidence is generally reviving. Admiral Seymour telegraphs at 10:20 this morning: "I am organizing a police force as fast as possible, and I have occupied the gates and two forts."

LONDON, July 15.—An Alexandria dispatch to the Times says: Thirteen hundred Christian refugees were saved in the Coptic Church during the massacre.

Rioting and conflagration have now been suppressed in Alexandria, and the British authorities are in quiet possession. The whereabouts of Arabi and his troops is not known.

MAHOMETAN CHIEFS.

It is reported that a number of Arabian Sheikhs have promised to support Arabi Pasha.

ALEXANDRIA, July 15.—The bombarding of Tuesday almost exterminated the Egyptian corps of artillerymen, which was the best branch of the army.

FOREIGN OCCUPATION.

The Daily News believes that there is a growing feeling among the Powers that the time for Turkish intervention has passed, and that the work will be sufficiently done by English and French occupation. Within the passed two days France has shown an increasing disposition to undertake joint occupation if invited to do so by the Powers.

HOLY WAR.

Rotngees from Cairo report a holy war being proclaimed, and Europeans are being massacred in Mantah, Mansurah, and Zegazig. The Consul has been killed at the last named place.

ARABI'S PLAN OF ACTION—TO RETIRE UPON CAIRO AND MAKE A STAND THERE—EL MEDHI, THE PROPHET.

PARIS, July 18.—Information has been received here through a trustworthy source to the effect that Arabi's plan of action, as developed at Alexandria, is the result of a conference with his leading officers and advisers, and was determined upon before the arrival of the British fleet at Alexandria.

This plan, it is said, involved the evacuation and destruction of Alexandria within twenty-four hours after the commencement of the bombardment.

Arabi was then to proceed with the remnant of his forces to Cairo, 108 miles distant, destroying the railroad as he proceeded.

Arriving at Cairo, he is to find that city surrounded by a network of fortifications, which have been erected under his directions during the past three weeks, and behind which he could successfully resist any force that might be brought to bear upon him for a long time, and until an army of 200,000 men would be at his command.

The most remarkable statement in connection with the matter is that Arabi is in perfect accord with El Medhi, the so-called false prophet, who is fast moving northward from the Soudan with an immense army of soldiers and religious enthusiasts who regard him as the Messiah.

According to the programme, El Medhi is to march in the direction of Cairo, where he will join the forces of Arabi, and the combined armies, inspired by a religious fanaticism and a blind devotion to their chiefs, will be enabled to protract the struggle for an indefinite period, and possibly enlist the sympathy and support of some friendly powers.

Thirty dead bodies have been taken out of the ruins of the fallen walls of a building at Texarkana, Ark., and thirty more are missing.

The widow of ex-President Abraham Lincoln died of paralysis at the home of a sister at Springfield, Ill., last evening, aged 64 years. Mrs. Lincoln has been a great sufferer in mind and body since the tragic death of her husband. Only one of Abraham Lincoln's family now survives—the Hon. Robert T. Lincoln, the Secretary of War, who left Washington for Springfield last night.

Ingersoll was effectually answered by the gamblers, when he said that Ingersoll's infidel lectures would hardly be good reading when there was a funeral in the house.

Sententious.

The creed of the true saint is to make the best of life, and make the most of it.

They that can give up essential liberty to obtain a little temporary safety deserve neither liberty nor safety.

The love of Christ is fixed in its objects, free in its communications, unwearied in its exercises, and eternal in its duration: here stands the believer's comfort.

> Leave God to order all thy ways,
> And hope in Him, whate'er befide;
> Thou'lt find him in the evil days
> An all-sufficient strength and guide.
> Who trusts in God's unchanging love,
> Builds on the rock that nought can move.

The lily is my symbol of fortitude, white and pure and royal, even as I have seen some dear children of God triumphant though in darkened chambers, and on beds of pain. The mignonette, most unobtrusive, yet most tenderly subtle, of all things in the floral world, is my emblem of patience. Its perfume pervades its neighborhood.—M. E. Sangster.

> Alas for him who never sees
> The stars shine through the cypress trees!
> Who, hopeless, lays his dead away,
> Nor looks to see the breaking day
> Across the mournful marbles play;
> Who hath not learned in hours of faith,
> The truth to flesh and sense unknown,
> That life is ever lord of death,
> And love can never lose its own.
> —Whittier.

When men in high places stoop to associate with vice and crime, they cannot expect to remain untainted; often, to save themselves, they seek to fasten their guilt upon the innocent, but deception is a tangled, as well as dangerous web, and, sooner or later, its votaries are caught in their own foul meshes.

Christians in Jerusalem, it is feared, will be in great danger if there should be an outbreak of Mohammedan fanaticism in Egypt and the countries surrounding it. Edith Holman Hunt—a relative of the eminent English artist, Holman Hunt—writes to the London Times as follows: "Having lived in Jerusalem from the commencement to the end of the last Russian war, and having thus experienced something of the danger arising from a threatened outbreak which was seething around us, I cannot refrain from asking a few words in the much-prized columns of the Times for the sake of pointing out how helpless are the people in Jerusalem at the present juncture. Jerusalem is the centre of fanaticism for all the peoples of the world, and should the long-threatened storm burst the Christian inhabitants there will be among the first to feel it. They are singularly helpless, shut off from the nearest coast by thirty-six miles of difficult road. The whole of Christendom is interested in the question. Since there are people of every nation living in Jerusalem, cannot each Government send a frigate to Jaffa to give refuge to the fugitives while affairs are in the present hazardous condition? The only retreats are the convents, and these would ill hold out against such an outbreak as would take place if the banner of the Prophet were at last unfurled in earnest."

OBITUARY.

DIED—At the residence of her son, W. J. B. Fontimore, in Miami county, Ind., July 4, 1882, Mariah Fontimore, born March 28, 1798, aged 84 years, 3 months and 5 days.

At the age of 76, having been for about 60 years a member of the M. E. church, she was buried with Christ by baptism, rising from the watery tomb to walk in the new and living way.

WHAT IS BEST.

MARIANNE FARNINGHAM.

We do not know! Thou knowest!
As children in the dark
We lift our hearts, our hands to thee,
And find a rest, an ark;
We trust thee in our ignorance.
O Wise, O Good, O Strong;
And though the shadows compass us,
We find thee with our song.

We think we know. Thou knowest.
We dream, and hope, and plan,
And make mistakes, and sigh to know
How frail and weak is man;
But thou, from the beginning,
Canst see the end of all;
We rest upon thy knowledge,
Father, on whom we call.

We do not know the best for us,
And so we strive in vain;
And for our sowing often reap
A harvest of dire pain;
We fall and fall, and then at last
We cry to thee for aid,
And only rest when thou dost say,
"This, be not afraid."

O God, we would be wiser yet,
And only pray, "Choose thou."
Lead as one leads the little ones,
We are thy children now;
And day by day, and step by step,
We need the guiding hand;
Oh! let us cling to thee, until
We reach the safe home-land.

And then let days be fair or dark,
The journey short or long,
Our hearts will rest in comfort,
And we will sing our song;
Since thou dost know, our ignorance
And sickness matter not,
We trust in thy great love, O God,
And then dost choose our lot.

Editor Restitution:

I have frequently stated to some of the readers of your valuable paper, that the first thirteen verses of the gospel of John, as they were in the old Version and as they still stand in the Revised, are an illustrious example of mistranslation, disregard of ordinary grammatical rules and common sense as well. This may have seemed a too sweeping statement, but if you will grant me space I propose now to prove it to the satisfaction of any thorough Greek scholar at least, and I think also to the satisfaction of ordinary well balanced common sense minds, though not schooled in the intricacies of the dead language.

The first verse reads in both the old and revised versions, "In the beginning was the word and the word was with God and the word was God."

The first general error is in conveying to the mind of the reader a thought entirely foreign to that contained in the text, and I would say in passing that the only important variation from the old textus receptus which appears in the Tischendorff text is the change of hon to hos in verse 10, and that our translation as it appears in both the old and revised is a perpetuation of ideas which, if not identical with, are akin to those eliminated by the fertile imaginations of the Gnostics, a well known heretical sect of the second century, and to correct whose heresies the seeds of which had already begun to germinate even in John's lifetime, this gospel is said to have been especially written.

The first specific error is in violating all classic and idiomatic use in translating the first two words en archē by the English expression "in the beginning." The idiom only occurs four times in the New Testament, and but twice outside of John's writings, and yet you have the idioms ex archēs, ap' archēs, and kat' archēs, and all of them translated "at or from the beginning," the translators thus assuming that all these various idioms are practically equivalent in meaning, a fundamental and important error.

The word archē is a noun, meaning a first cause, a beginning, an origin, and has two principal uses, one having reference to time and the other to place, the word meaning first in time or first in place. Beginning translates the first idea, headship or authority, the second. Now the ordinary idiomatic use of en archē, as I propose to show from the Scriptures of the Old and New Testament, is "in authority," or "at the head," or "to the extent," or "at the height," or "in the reign," or speaking of a circle "at the periphery" measuring from the center, or "at the outer limit" speaking of an encampment, but never meaning in the beginning.

The true idiom for "at the beginning," or "at first," in the Greek is archēn, used absolutely as an adverbial accusative. Now as I understand the heretical Gnostics during John's lifetime were bringing forward all sorts of mystical theories in regard to spiritual things and supporting them by various authorities outside of the word of God. So John says in combatting this fundamental error of all heresy: "In authority was the word" raising the old battle cry of the early church "to the law and the testimony." If you speak of authority. A singular fatality is it that the very expression with which he aimed his first blow at mysticism, should have been perverted by mistranslation to perpetuate mysticism even to the present day.

One of the two places outside of John's writings where the expression en archē occurs in the New Testament is in Acts xi. 15, and is translated in the old and revised versions, "at the beginning." The verse correctly translated should read, "And when I had begun to speak the Holy Spirit fell upon them even as also upon us in authority or authoritatively." At what beginning? The beginning of the preaching of the gospel? But the gospel had been preached through the mouth of all the prophets, and Christ had sent out the twelve and the seventy even before his crucifixion, and they had already received miraculous spiritual power before the day of Pentecost. No, I think the writer is speaking of the special authoritative outpouring of Holy Spirit which had been promised, and which was to be the evidence to them of God's spiritual power accompanying and authorizing their preaching of the word, or in other words ratifying the authority under which they claimed to preach and act.

The only other place outside of the writings of John where the expression en archē occurs in the New Testament, is in Phil. iv. 15, and is here also in the old and revised translated "at the beginning." The verse correctly translated reads, "And ye also know, O Philippians, that when I came out from Macedonia in the authority of the gospel, no church participated with me in the word of giving and receiving except you alone." There is here the same and even a more valid and marked objection to translating the expression "at the beginning," because the point of time referred to was in no sense whatever a beginning of the preaching of the gospel, not even of Paul's beginning to preach the gospel. And still more the writer intends to draw an antithesis between the general authority under which Paul preached and the specific authority which he claimed to have under this commission to insist upon the churches of his ministry putting into practice the word of giving and receiving.

The other two instances of the use of this expression in the New Testament being in the first two verses of John's gospel, the passage now under consideration, I will proceed to refer to various passages illustrative of its use in the Septuagint of the Old Testament; and first, the first two words of the Old Testament consist of this idiomatic expression, and the verse correctly translated reads "In authority (or sovereignty) God made the heavens and the earth." Think for a moment of the puerility of the statement, "In the beginning God made," etc. Did you, reader, or did anyone else, ever know of anything being made at any other point of time than the beginning of its creation? Of course God created the universe at the beginning if he created it at all. He could not very well create it before or after he had created it. The thought is too absurd for further comment, and I have too great respect for the author of Genesis to attribute to him any such use of language.

The next place in which the idiom occurs is in Judges 17-10 vs. Here it occurs three times and in two different idiomatic senses.

The 17th verse reads when correctly translated, "And he (Gideon) said unto them, See how I do and so shall ye do. And lo, I am going to enter in (en archē, tes parembolēs) at the outer edge of the camp and it shall be that even as I do, so shall ye do." I will give the 18th verse also to show the connection. "And I will blow in the trumpet, I, and all ye who are with me, do ye blow in your trumpets round about the whole encampment, and ye shall say, for the Lord and for Gideon." Var. 19. "And Gideon entered in and the hundred men along with him at the outer edge (en archē) of the encampment, at the height (en archē) of the middle watch," i. e. about the middle of the middle watch, the time when the guard would be most likely to be napping, as the event proved if you will read the next verse. For at the beginning or close of a watch would be the time of all others when a guard would be likely to be awake and alert, and the time chosen shows very clearly that Gideon was a good strategist.

The next passage illustrative of still another idiomatic shade of meaning to these words occurs in Judges xx. 18. It reads as follows: "Who shall go up for us (en archē) at the head in battle array against the sons of Benjamin? and the Lord said, Judah shall go up at the head leading."

The next passage I will refer to is the last clause of the last verse of Ruth i. It reads as follows: "And they (Ruth and Naomi) arrived at Bethlehem at the height (en archē) of the barley harvest." Now remember she went to glean immediately upon her arrival, in the field of Boos, and bear in mind if you know anything about country life, that the gleaning never begins until the height of the harvest is over. The gleaner does not go into the field to get anything more than what is left by the harvesters. They glean in that part of the field that has been harvested for the owner. But I quote this passage because it might be said to be a doubtful one, although I do not so view it myself.

The next passage I will refer to is 1 Kings xxi. 9, 12. "And she (Jezebel) wrote upon the parchments, (sending one and keeping a copy) saying appoint a fast and seat Naboth at the head (en archē) of the people, and they called for a fast and seated Naboth at the head of the people."

The next passage is in 1 Chron. xvi. 7, and reads as follows: "On that day then David in authority (en archē) appointed to praise the Lord at the hand of Asaph and his brethren." This authority is frequently referred to afterwards in the Scriptures, viz. the authority which David exercised at that time in the appointment and arrangement of the Levitical "courses" of the priesthood.

The next passage is in 2 Chron. xiii. 12, and reads as follows: "And lo, the Lord in authority (en archē) is along with us and his priests and the trumpeters to blow the signal for us." This needs no comment.

The next passage is in Esdras 2d, (Apocryphic) iv. 5, and reads as follows: "And in the royalty of Ahasuerus and in the authority (en archē) of his royalty they wrote a letter to those who dwelt in Judea and Jerusalem."

The next passage is in Psa. cxxxvii. (136 Septua.) and reads as follows, vers 5, 6: "If I forget thee, O Jerusalem, let my right hand be forgotten; let my tongue cleave to my larynx, if I do not remember thee; if I do not place Jerusalem first as it were (en archē) at the head of my joy." Well rendered in King James' version. I have rendered literally to illustrate.

The next passage is in Prov. viii. 23, and reads as follows: "Before the eon he founded me (wisdom) in authority (en archē) before that he made the earth."

The next passage is Jer xlvi. 1 (26th Septua.) and reads as follows: "En archē—in the authority of Zedekias while he was ruling as king," etc.

The next passage is in chap. xxvii (), of the same (33d Septua.) and reads as follows: "En archē—in the authority of king Joakim son of Josias."

The next is in chap. li. 58, of the same (28th Septua.) and reads: "And nations (en archē) in authority will fail." He is speaking particularly of Babylon.

The next is Dan. ix. 22, 23, and is what the angel Gabriel says to him, and reads as follows: "Daniel, now I have come forth to give thee understanding (en archē) to the extent of thy prayer."

I have given nearly every passage now where this idiom occurs in the Old and New Testament, and I leave it for the reader to decide whether I have given what seems to be the meaning of the writer in every passage, and whether, under these circumstances, I am not right in claiming that the first two words of John's gospel are a mistranslation and a grevious blunder in the old and revised versions.

I shall not have space to do more than indicate the remaining errors and re-translate the passage correctly.

Error 2nd. Translating the preposition "pros" as though it was the preposition "sun" before the word God in the 1st and 2nd verses, in order to give the idea of personality to the appelation "Ho Logos," which means the word of God. If the writer had intended to say what the translators have put in his mouth, he would have used the preposition "sun" or "meta," both prepositions of accompaniment.

Error 3d. In translating "houtos" the first word in the second verse as though the text read "ho autos."

Error 4th. In translating the preposition "dia" by the English word "by" in the 3d. verse and thus making it the equivalent of the preposition "hupo," and thus making the person referred to in the pronoun which follows the preposition the Efficient Cause of Creation.

Error 5th. In translating this pronoun "him," instead of "it," and thus carrying out the unwarrantable idea of personality all through the 12 verses.

Error 6th. In translating the word "egeneto," in the 3d verse, as though it were the 2nd aorist passive of the word "poieo," to make or create, when it means to become or come to pass. This repeated as often as the word occurs three times in this verse.

Error 7th. In not giving the idea of continuous action to the verb "phaino," to shine, in the 5th verse.

Error 8th. In translating the word "egeneto," in the 6th verse, "came." This is the same word, same tense, and bear in mind if you know anything about country life, that the gleaning never begins until the height of the harvest is over. The gleaner does not go into the field to get anything more than what is left by the harvesters. They glean in that part of the field that has been harvested for the owner. But I quote this passage because it might be said to be a doubtful one, although I do not so view it myself.

Error 7th. In not giving the idea of continuous action to the verb "phaino," to shine, in the 5th verse.

Error 8th. In translating the word "egeneto," in the 6th verse, "came." This is the same word, same tense, and same form translated in the 3d verse "were made." Comment unnecessary.

Error 9th. In translating the word "martirion," in the 7th verse, by one word "witness," this use of the word being practically obsolete and confusing.

Error 10th. In translating "auton," the last word in the same verse, "him" instead of "it," making "John" the antecedent instead of "light."

Error 11th. In introducing the thought of the 9th verse by a vague adverb "there," which does not belong in the text, and so perverting the thought of the writer from a specific to a general statement.

Error 12th. In introducing the idea of personality again unwarrantably by supplying the pronoun "he," when any school-boy could see that "light" was the antecedent here which dictates the pronoun to be supplied and that would be "it."

Error 13th. The same three errors already commented upon are all repeated in succession in this verse. "Him" translated as though it were "hupo," "auton" personified, and "egeneto" translated as though it was "poieo."

Error 14th. "Ta idia," a neuter noun in the accusative plural in the 11th verse, translated as though it meant persons when it means things, and "eis" unto instead of into. "Ta idia" is contrasted with "hoi idioi" in this same sentence, the first meaning its own possessions, the second meaning its own people.

Error 15th. In unwarrantable personification in the 12th verse by an improper use of the pronoun as all along before, in translating the word "exousia" "the right," when it means "power," and in making "his" before name refer to a person other than God expressed in the sentence.

Error 16th. In translating the verb "egennethesan," in the 13th verse "were born," instead of "were begotten," a very important error in its doctrinal bearing.

I will now translate the passage according to grammatical rules and common sense:

"In sovreignty (or authority) was the word, and the word was according to (the) God, and the word was (a) God (that is divine.) This was in authority according to (the) God. All things through it became and without it not one thing became that has become. In it is life and the life was the light of mankind. And the light is shining in the darkness, and the darkness hath not comprehended it. There became a man, who was sent from God, his name John. He came for testimony, in order that he might testify concerning the light, that all might believe through it. He was not that light, but in order that he might testify concerning the light. That which enlighteneth every man coming into the world was the true light. It was in the world and the world (meaning the universe) through it became, and the world did not know it. It came into its own realms and its own people received it not. But as many as received it to them gave it power to become offspring of God, as many namely as believed in His (God's) name, who were begotten not from blood (bloods literally) nor from a will of flesh nor from a will of a man but from God."

ISRAEL'S PROMISED FUTURE.—No. 2.

"And I will give unto thee and to thy seed after thee, the land wherein thou art a stranger, all the land of Canaan, for an everlasting possession; and I will be their God." Gen. xvii. 8.

But why, it may be asked, this everlasting, ever fresh, vitality of the Jewish race, so wonderfully preserved in all that constitutes the physical elements of a mighty nationality against such overwhelming odds, through the storms of so many centuries, the vicissitudes and perils of so many generations, and amid the wrecks of so many buried Empires? We answer not, nor seek to answer. We simply rest our faith upon the word of the God of Israel, and leave the mighty problem there. His incomprehensible sovereignty has so ordained.

A second historical indication of the destiny that awaits the House of Israel is its unimpaired physical vigor, as shown by its constant numerical increase, especially as compared with the no less constant numerical decrease beyond a certain point, of all other ancient nations.

The two tribes of Judah and Benjamin, at the time of their return from the Babylonian captivity, numbered according to learned authority, less than 42,000. Their descendants now number according to recent estimates about seven millions. If such has been the increase of the two tribes only, there has been also a corresponding increase of the ten tribes, discovered in the year 1822, beyond the river Ozean, by Sargon, one of the agents and missionaries of the London Society for Promoting Christianity among the Jews, stated to be seven millions.

A third indication of the destiny that awaits the House of Israel is the extent to which as a nation they have maintained, notwithstanding their expatriation and world wide dispersion, a purity of blood so inviolate and intact, and a patriotic fervor so ardent and invincible, that their native energies have lost nothing by intermixing with other nations.

You may describe a Jew as an Englishman, or Frenchman, or Russian, or German, or Prussian, or Austrian, or American; but you so describe him in a secondary sense only, the morning and evening prayers of the synagogue indicating their citizenship as belonging to the Holy City of Jerusalem read thus: "Blessed be the name of Jehovah who is to rebuild Jerusalem." In another section of the Jewish worship they repeat "This year here, but the next year in Jerusalem." The Jews are fellow-countrymen in a far higher sense, and regard their temporary domicile among the Gentiles as the place of their sojourn, the house of their bondage only, not less than their fathers so regarded the strawless brick-kilns of Egypt, or the reedy banks of the Chebar and Euphrates. Whether chilled by the snows of Lapland, or scorched by the suns of Africa; whether they drink of the Tiber or the Thames, the Jordan or the Mississippi, whether their latitude be north or south, and their longitude be east or west; whether wanderers in the east they gaze upon the broken arches and ruined walls of ancient cities, only to be reminded of their own more ancient capital, or whether wanderers in the west, they find possible fellow-travellers to its sacred gates in the early denizens of our mountains and plains, it is all the same to them. It is enough for them that they are Abraham's seed, the children of the covenant, the heirs of its promises, and that, like the bush of their own Horeb, though ever in flames, they are never consumed, ever uncontaminated by Gentile contact; ever throwing more widely open the robes of their cosmopolitanism; ever wrapping the [illegible] more tightly around them; ever wanderers from home, yet ever going home.

The last providential indication of the future destiny of the House of Israel which we shall consider, is the universal presentiment or rather prescience of it, everywhere found among its children in all their tribes, and all other generations, in all their wanderings. They have longed for their own land ever since the curse drove them from it, and have expected to return to it. This, we repeat, is not a presentiment or prophetic instinct only. It is something more. It is a deep and immovable conviction to the firm assurance of which nothing can be added. There is not a Jew so downtrodden, of so lowly a condition, be he possessed of fair intelligence, that you can in the least surprise him by the assurance that his nation now so utterly denationalized, has nevertheless as a reinstated theocracy a loftier destiny before it, in its own land, than crowded the hopes of any other nation. Assure him that his nation is to be set on high above all the nations of the earth. He may receive the assurance with the taciturnity and reticence of an Indian. But this will only be because he all the more accepts it; because he accepts it as a thing of course, as a foregone conclusion, as a point that has been decided about which nothing more needs to be said. Please ask Rothschild why he does not take advantage of present political embarrassments and complications to secure to his chosen nation the chosen land. There may be an electric radiance in his eye, but there will if unprovoked, be no added compression of the lips, as quickly he says to you, "It is ours already." The Jews themselves, converted and unconverted, everywhere count upon their return to their land, their national reinstatement in it, and their millennial king, when the throne of David shall be re-established on the heights of Zion, never to lapse again. The land of their cherished memories is the land of their not less cherished hopes, as dear to them now in this nineteenth century of their exile, as when twenty-five centuries ago, they wept, with Daniel and Ezekiel and Jeremiah by the waters of Babylon, as they remembered Zion.

The state loans of the Jewish bankers mostly have reference in one way or another to their own land. Their loans to individuals are for the most part short or readily convertible, and homeward bound is written by an invisible hand on the back of every one of them. Home, home again, evermore safe at home, is written by the same invisible hand upon all their now trailing banners, upon the altars and tablets and walls of all their synagogues, in all their hearts.

They see a hand we cannot see,
That beckons them away,
They hear a voice we cannot hear,
That bids them not to stay.

And when they return, what a return! what a spectacle to a wondering earth, what a monument of God's overruling and overruling sovereignty, of his mysterious providence, and, in the end, of his redeeming grace! What a glorious winding up of a finished dispensation! What a glorious beginning of a new dispensation! With what joyful feet they will tread again their patrimonial acres! With what eager lips will they taste again the precious things of their heavens, which no more shall be as brass, and the precious things of their lasting hills, which no more shall be as iron! With what willing hands will they build again their waste cities, and inhabit them, and plant vineyards, and drink the wine thereof, and make gardens, and eat the fruit of them, never more to be pulled out of the land which the Lord their God hath given them. When the ploughman shall overtake the reaper, and the treader of grapes him that sowed seed, and their mountains shall drop sweet wine and all their hills shall melt; when thou Israel shall no more be termed forsaken, neither shall thy land any more be termed desolate; but thou shalt be called Hephzibah, and thy land Beulah; for the Lord delighteth in thee and thy land shall be married! With what grateful hearts will they gather again, old and young, around the domestic altars of the old home, and go up again to the sacred courts of Zion, and join its cheerful assemblies in singing the praise of their deliverer; when Judah shall be saved and Jerusalem shall dwell safely; when the House of Israel shall dwell in the midst of Jerusalem, and old men and old women shall lean upon their staves for very age in the streets of Jerusalem, and the streets of Jerusalem shall be full of boys and girls, playing in the streets thereof, and holiness unto the Lord shall be engraven upon all their vessels and upon the bells of their horses. Zech. xiv. 20, and the Kenites and Terrorites shall abide with them for evermore! With what [illegible] of forgiving love, the cloudy and the dark days of their suffering and shame ended at last for ever, will they be received into the arms of the Everlasting Father, who in all their darkest hours of guilt and shame, both never forgotten that there was no sorrow like unto Israel's sorrow, and under all the chastisements of his hand hath ever loved them as one loveth his first born, and mourned for them as one mourneth for an only son.

We have seen on natural or to speak more correctly, providential grounds, that the House of Israel has a great destiny before it and that it is fully equal to it; and pass over Israel's final national restoration, and preceding its millennial glory, and open the sacred volume to one of those golden pages that place the seal of earth's highest glory and of heaven's choicest blessings upon its coming destiny; thus returning at the last, as we would ever return, to our supreme and infallible court of appeal, "The Divine Revelation."

The Children's Home.

FRANCES E. HAVERGAL.

God of heaven hear our singing;
Only little ones are we:
Yet a grand petition bringing,
Father, now we come to thee.

Let thy kingdom come we pray thee;
Let the world in thee find rest;
Let all know thee and obey thee,
Loving, praising, blessing, blessed.

Let the sweet and joyful story
Of the Savior's wondrous love,
Wake on earth a song of glory,
Like the angel's song above.

Father, send the glorious hours
Every heart be thine alone!
For the kingdom and the power
And the glory are thine own.

A Heroic Boy.

A young working lad of Woolwich was on the river bank when the Princess Alice went down in the recent Thames collision, and, being a good swimmer, at once dashed into the river and brought out the struggler next to him. He at once plunged in again, and rescued a second, to rush in again and return with a third. As he was making his way thus to the bank, he saw a small bundle, which he guessed must be a baby. He caught it with his teeth, and thus brought the fourth rescued life to shore. Not then able to swim in again, he carried the baby home to his mother's humble dwelling, and, placing the little orphan in her arms, said, "Here, mother, nurse this baby for me; I will work for it as long as I live."

This anecdote beautifully illustrates the Savior's redeeming grace. Christ finds the sinner perishing in the dark waters of sin. He rescues him, gives him into the care of his church, and says, in the language of the good Samaritan, "Take care of him, and when I come again I will repay thee."

Outside and Inside.

The Rev. Mr. Barnum, of Illinois, once preached a most delightful discourse on temperance to children, taking for his text the words, "My son, if sinners entice thee, consent thou not."—Prov. i. 10.

After having the children repeat the text and analyze it by answers to well-put questions, he drew a bottle from a package and asked the children to describe it. A bottle, a glass bottle, a round bottle, a long bottle, a corked bottle, a clear bottle, finally they hit his designs, a "clean bottle;" then he presented another which he asked them to describe precisely as they had the other, but when they came to "clean bottle," they all laughed out, "A dirty bottle." "Dirty—well, let me wash it;" so he plunged the vial in a pail of water, carefully wiping it, and held it up as cleansed! "But you haven't washed the inside," shouted the children. "Just so now about the hearts of some people that look very nice outside, but have been enticed to be very bad within. How shall they be cleansed?" "The blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth from all sin." We must remember that the contents of the bottle, however, often have very much to do in making hearts vile.

Dear Children:

Did you ever think how greatly you are blest. You who have homes, and friends to love and care for you. You who have papers and books to read, and best of all the book of books, the Bible. Did you ever think what a wretched world this would be if there were no Bible in it. Nothing to show us the way through this dark age of sin to the ages on ages of life and glory and immortality which lie before us if we only are good and obedient in this life or age?

[illegible] about these things and yet they are worth much more to us than all else that we can think of. If any of your parents had a special invitation to attend one of President Arthur's receptions in Washington City and that the invitation included all the family, with the assurance that suitable dress would be provided for each and all who would read, study to understand certain lessons which he sent to each with the invitations, would any of you tell your parents you did not care to go, that you would not read his invitation as you would rather have your own fun" than to see so many elegantly dressed ladies and gentlemen from our own country as well as from many foreign lands, and also to see so many interesting things, and to hear the conversation of the learned the wise and the great of this age? I think most of you would like to go, both for "a change," and because it would be an honor.

Well, now let me tell you that both you and your parents have a special invitation to attend a far more elegant reception than was ever given in Washington or even in the old European courts, which were much more magnificent than anything we see in this country. The invitations are sent out all over the world, they are contained in the Bible, "The Spirit and the Bride say come." It is our Lord Jesus Christ who will give this grand reception, when he comes to this earth again to receive those who have believed and obeyed the commandments he gave us in his word. On each one who has sorred and obeyed him in this age he will bestow a robe of righteousness—he will give them immortal life and a place in his glorious kingdom. The capitol of [illegible] will be the New Jerusalem. All will be glory and peace and joy. Then there will be no more death.

We have no time to lose about getting ready. The lessons must be all learned and obeyed. Nor do we know how soon he may come. He will come soon. If we are ready, all will be well, if not, all is lost. Let us all try to be ready. AUNT CARRIE.

USEFUL EMPLOYMENT.

Live for something; be not idle!
Look about thee for employ;
Sit not down to muse in dreaming,
Labor is the sweetest joy.

Folded hands are ever weary,
Selfish hearts are never gay;
Life for thee hath many duties,
Active be then, while you may.

THE AGE.--NEBUCHADNEZZAR'S IMAGE.

ARTHUR SEPTIMUS COOK, D. D.

On Dura's plain the potent stood,
By Time's first life, a thing of gold;
Vain symbol of its endless flood.
Its fates and fortunes manifold,
As fashioned by a tyrant's whim,
Who deemed all ages were for him.

But while he reared that thing of pride,
A vision to the sleeper came:
In the dark night it prophesied,
And stood a spectre without name,
Vast and deformed it loomed in air:
Cruel its front and stern its stare.

He gazed, and soon his image knew,
But ah, how changed! Its head alone
Is golden now; and thence its hue
In pallid silver to the zone:
Of bronze its thighs; the legs below it with Iron embossed and black as death.

Still as he gazed, that awe struck king,
On knew that mockery glittering gleam,
The legs of that inharmonious thing
To rust and rubbish dwindled down.
Of dross the toes, and, ruin all with clay,
Crumbling, they seemed to waste away.

The Titan! Michael's art sublime
Might make once more such image stand,
Interpreting the tides of Time,
Prophet and Sibyl on each hand.
Grope with the past the golden hurl:
Our times are in those feet of clay.

In Daniel's page, who runs may read;
Its oracles, in order set,
Are history now, or fates decreed;
What hath been, or what may be yet.
Great God, how wise man's mind may grow
When all things in thy light they know!

Blest be that grand prophetic page,
By which the days of old I scan!
Blest, as unfolds our living age,
Its presage of the growth of man.
Not dim, nor dark, the scene to me
Which in the glare of God I see.

What though of mixt and miry clay,
Earth's empire dwindles to its end,
Feebly their iron parts decay;
More than the purplest fragment grows.
Brittle and bruised, the crumbling ten
Princes have learned they are but men.

For, swarming like assembled hives,
How burns the mighty people's will!
Rome's iron law but half survives,
Corroded all that lasteth still;
When monarchs with the mobs conspire,
Iron, indeed, is mixed with mire.

Iron and clay! of such an age
The star is in meridian now.
'Tis mine to read its middle stage,
And mark not far beyond, I vow.
Its best and brethen are for me,
Nor would I wait its era to see.

I've climbed the century's morning slope:
I stand upon the summit high;
Far off, new worlds might seem to ope,
And through this moonlike heat mine eye
Surveys the vale, as, streaking afar,
If fades where clouds and darkness are.

Calm in the mercy of my lot,
Sure of his love who placed me here:
Still at my task, I murmur not,
But fain would fill, in duty's sphere,
Some part of God's majestic plan,
Mysterious mercy unto man.

CORRESPONDENCE.

TO THE BRETHREN AND SISTERS IN GRAND RAPIDS, MICHIGAN.

Beloved of God, called to be saints, grace to you, and peace from God our Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ. I would like to see you all that I may impart to you some spiritual good, that you may be established, and that I may be comforted together with you by the mutual faith of both you and me. I desire to comfort you by the comfort wherewith I am comforted of God. For whatsoever things were written aforetime, were written for our learning, that we through patience and comfort of the Scriptures might have hope.

We have attended meeting occasionally during the past few months, with a people who maintain with great zeal and assurance the universal restoration and salvation of all men. The influence of their arguments upon my mind has not been to convince me that their views are correct, but to quicken and sharpen my attention in examining the true import of the Scriptures and arguments which they use as proofs on the subject. I think I can now see and comprehend the true import of their proofs better than before. I believe I can now answer all their leading arguments easily, naturally, Scripturally and conclusively. It is on account of the comfort and assurance I have received from this investigation, that I now address you. I find that the same Scriptures, the same interpretations, and the same arguments are used to prove the restoration and salvation of all men, that are used to prove the "Fair Chance Theory." I will now reply to some of their strong texts.

1. 1 Tim. iv. 8, 10, Who is the Savior of all men, especially of those that believe. It is claimed that this passage teaches the salvation of all men. It does, but it is not the final salvation of all men. The salvation of all men in this passage is limited to the life that now is. The special salvation saves in the world to come. The special salvation is contrasted with the salvation of all men, and has this advantage over it, it has the promise of life in the world to come. The universal salvation is common to all in this life, but the special salvation has the promise of that which is to come. That salvation includes the evil and the good, the just and the unjust; this salvation includes only the good. That salvation consists in the sun shining on the evil and the good, and in the rain falling on the just and the unjust, and in fruitful seasons filling our hearts with joy and gladness in this life; this salvation consists in life in the world to come. Matt. v. 45, and Acts xiv. 16, 17. That salvation is for a little while, this is everlasting. That is in this world, this is in the world to come.

"Bodily exercise profiteth for a little time, (ως in the margin.) This is common to all. It is that to which we are appointed in this life. It is profitable only for a little while. But godliness is profitable unto all things, having promise of the life that now is, and of that which is to come. Then, the universal salvation in this passage does not save men in the world to come. Men can be saved in this life without being godly, but godliness is necessary in order to be saved in the world to come.

Jude 1, 3, "Beloved, when I gave all diligence to write unto you of the common salvation, it was needful for me to write unto you, and exhort you that ye should earnestly contend for the faith which was once delivered to the saints." This passage is like the one in Tim., and is claimed for the same purpose. It is claimed that the common salvation is universal, and that the faith once delivered to the saints is the promise of the special salvation in Timothy. The sense of this passage is the same as the sense of the one in Timothy. It has the same two salvations; the common salvation, in which all good and bad share, the salvation which comes by the faith of Abraham, in which only those who believe will share. The first does not require men to be good, but is common to all good and bad. The last requires men to have the faith of Abraham in order to be saved. As the promise made to Abraham is the only promise of life in the world to come, the common salvation, as it is full and complete without the faith of Abraham, must necessarily be limited to this life, as there is no way to get into the world to come but by the faith of Abraham. The common salvation then, must consist of the blessings of this life, for a little while, and the salvation by the faith of Abraham consists of life in the world to come, to continue forever. Thus, these two passages fail to prove that all men will finally be saved. The universal salvation mentioned in them is only for a little while.

2. 1 Tim. ii. 1, 4, "Who will have all men to be saved, and come to the knowledge of the truth." The word "will" is sometimes used in a sense of desire, and not in the sense of purpose. So I understand it in this passage. I will refer you to two examples where it is so used.

Matt. xxiii. 37. "O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, how often would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not." Although it was his will to gather them, but because they would not, he did not gather them. And he said unto them "Behold your house is left unto you desolate. For I say unto you ye shall not see me henceforth till ye shall say blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord." He would have gathered them on certain conditions, but they did not comply with those conditions, and he did not gather them. So God could have all men to be saved on certain conditions; if men do not comply with these conditions, God will not save them. See also Ezek. 18th chapter. He says he has no pleasure at all that the wicked should die, but rather that they would turn and live. He says, "why will ye die O house of Israel. I have no pleasure in the death of him that dieth." It is God's pleasure or his will that the wicked turn and live, but if they continue to sin they shall surely die. God so much desires all men to be saved, that he gave his Son to die for them, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish but have everlasting life. So that the passage under consideration cannot be used to prove conclusively that all men will be saved.

3. Heb. ii. 9, "He tasted death for every man." There are several passages like this, which I will class with this one. 1 Tim. ii. 6, "Who gave himself a ransom for all." 1 John ii. 2, "He is a propitiation for our sins, and not for ours only, but for the sins of the whole world." Rom. v. 6, 8, "For when we were yet sinners, in due time, Christ died for the ungodly." 2 Cor. v. 14, "If Christ died for all, then were all dead." I have put these passages together, because they all speak to the same point. And an answer to one will be an answer to all. It is claimed, with great assurance, that these passages teach that all for whom Christ died, will be saved.

The point stated in these passages which is relied upon to prove the salvation of all men, is this, "He tasted death for every man," "He died for all," "He is the propitiation for the sins of the whole world," "He died for the ungodly." This testimony certainly proves that Christ died for all men. But the question is, will all men be saved? These passages affirm that Christ died for all men, without any conditions; this we allow. But they do not affirm that all men will be saved. Did God love the world so well that he will save all for whom Christ died? John iii. 16 tells just how much God loves the world, and the conditions on which men will be saved, "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son that whosoever believeth in him should not perish but have everlasting life." This passage affirms all that other passages affirm, and as strongly as they do. It is perfectly in harmony with those passages as far as they go. But it goes farther than they do. It tells on what condition men will be saved, which they do not. This passage cannot be made to harmonize with these without destroying its condition, but those can be made to harmonize with this very easily, and naturally, by adding to them the condition of this passage, which will render them more complete and full than they are now. Let them be read with the condition of salvation added to them. Thus, He tasted death for every man, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish but have everlasting life. He died for all, that whosoever believeth in him might not perish but have everlasting life. He is the propitiation for the sins of the whole world, that whosoever believeth in him might not perish but have everlasting life. He died for the ungodly, that whosoever believeth in him might not perish but have everlasting life. In this way no violence is done to the Scriptures, nor forced interpretation, but a complete harmony is preserved, with the general tenor of the Bible on the subject. If conditions of salvation are true in one passage they must be true in every passage on the same subject. Therefore these passages do not prove that all men will be saved.

4. Rom. v. 18, "The free gift came unto all men unto justification of life." It is claimed that this justification is unconditional and includes all for whom Christ died, that is equal alike to all of the race. This may not be so, as there are considerations which seem to lie in the way of such an application of the passage.

The people to whom this epistle was addressed, were to be saved by the process described in this chapter. If this is so, other people must be saved in the same way, and for the same reasons, but all men are not being saved in this way, therefore the application may not be correct.

The justification of this chapter is by faith, expressed or implied. "Being justified by faith we have peace with God." "Much more then being now justified by his blood," that is by faith, "in his blood." "Without this faith it is impossible to please God," or be justified of him. Thus, this justification is conditional, and applicable only to such as receive it by faith.

The position they occupied was accessible only by faith. "By whom also we have access by faith into this grace wherein we stand." Then the grace of God mentioned in this chapter several times, was received by faith. Everything in this chapter was received by faith, expressed or implied. The justification, the grace of God, the atonement, the reconciliation, the free gift, the righteousness, and the eternal life, all were received by faith, and these gifts can be applied only to such as receive them by faith. The free gift of these things must be received in order to make them gifts. It takes two parties to complete a gift, the one party must offer the gift, and the other must receive it. If things are only offered, and are not accepted, they are not gifts. An offered gift must be accepted to make it a gift complete.

The church at Rome was being saved by receiving all these gifts by faith. Others must be saved in the same way if saved at all, but all men have not faith, therefore the justification in the passage under consideration, cannot be applied to all men.

It will not do to apply the justification of this passage to all men, for this justification is by faith, and all men have not faith. The sense of the passage must be this, Even so by the righteousness of one, the free gift of the justification of life, came upon all men through faith. This is the way the church addressed in this chapter was being saved. They were justified by faith, they had access to all Christian privileges by faith, they received the atonement by faith, they received all the gifts mentioned in this chapter by faith, and in the world to come they will receive eternal life in fact. This passage cannot prove the salvation of all men.

5. 1 Cor. xv. 22, "For as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive." It is claimed that this passage teaches that all who die in Adam will be made alive in Christ. The words "in Adam" tell how many will die, and the words "in Christ" tell how many will be made alive. The sense of the passage seems to be this, As those in Adam all die, even so those in Christ will all be made alive, but every man in his order. Christ the first fruits; afterward they that are his at his coming. When he comes all that are dead in Christ will be made alive, but all that are in Adam are not in Christ. As many as become children of Adam die, as many as become children of God by faith in Jesus Christ, will be made alive. "If we believe that Jesus died and rose again, even so, them also which sleep in Jesus will God bring with him" from the dead. Christ is not the first fruits of those in Adam, but he is the first fruits of those only who are in him. He was the first sheaf from the dead. All the sheaves that will be made alive must be like the first sample sheaf. If that sheaf was wheat, all the rest of the harvest must be wheat. All that is said of the resurrection in the 15th chapter of 1 Cor. is said of those who are in Christ. They will be raised from the dead incorruptible; their natural bodies will be raised spiritual bodies; their earthly bodies will be raised heavenly bodies; their vile bodies will be fashioned like unto Christ's glorious body. Christ is the first fruits of such a harvest as this, but of no other. The rest of the dead are not included in the resurrection. So the passage under consideration furnishes no proof that all men will be restored to life and be saved.

6. John iii. 35, "The Father loveth the Son, and hath given all things unto his hand." It is claimed that the things that are given unto his hand, will be restored and saved. There are two senses in which things are given to Christ. First when men become the children of God by faith in Jesus Christ. These are given to Christ, they become the seed of Abraham and his heirs according to the promise. They are joint heirs with Christ to the rulership of the kingdom to Christ to be associated with him in his reign.

In the other sense, things are given into his hand to be subdued, to be saved and to be destroyed. The kingdom is given into his hands that he may subdue it, and gather out of it all things that offend, and them that do iniquity. In this sense things are given into his hand to be reigned over. In the passage we are considering, the things are given into his hand to be subdued, to be saved; and to be destroyed—to be ruled over. This passage furnishes no proof of universal salvation.

7. 1 Cor. xv. 26, "The last enemy that shall be destroyed is death." It is claimed that this is equivalent to a promise of universal restoration from death. For whom is death to be destroyed? Is it for the wicked or for the saints? Not for the wicked, but for the saints. To them who by patience continue in well-doing, seek for glory, and honor, and immortality, will be given eternal life. When this is done, the last enemy will have been destroyed. "So when this corruption shall have put on incorruption, and this mortal shall have put on immortality, then, shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, Death is swallowed up in victory." Then death is to be destroyed for those who are found worthy to be raised from the dead incorruptible, and put on immortality. and not for those who believe not the Son, and who shall not see life, but the wrath of God abideth on them for ever. This passage furnishes no proof of universal restoration from death, except for the righteous.

8. It is claimed that if the wages of sin is death, the righteous are punished as well as the wicked. Did Christ die as a punishment? Did he die for his own sins? Then a person may die and not die as a punishment. Do martyrs die as a punishment? Is not Christ the head of his body, the church? If he could die, and not die as a punishment, cannot the members of his body die in the same way? Then it is not true that the righteous are punished with the wicked.

9. It is claimed that every man must have a fair and equal chance or God will be unjust. This may not be so. It is very plausible from the stand-point of the objector. From his limited, and superficial, and partial understanding of the matter, he thinks he has made a strong point. But if he could view the subject as God views it, and take into his comprehension all the possible bearings of the subject upon the destiny of our race, undoubtedly he would acquiesce in God's judgment, "which is true and righteous altogether." When he says "The seed of the wicked shall be cut off," and as many as have sinned without law shall also perish without law."

I believe I have now answered the leading arguments in favor of the universal restoration and salvation of all men, briefly it is true, but easily and fairly, and naturally, and Scripturally, and conclusively.

Brevities.

Among the recent acquisitions from Babylonia made by the British Museum are numerous contract tablets in Babylonian cuneiform, a large fragment of early Babylonian history, and part of a hymn on the occasion of the entrance of Cyrus into Babylon.

A gentleman of Brenham, Texas, who was at the battle of Seven Pines, tells of a very strange incident. He was an orderly sergeant, and had the book containing the roll of his company, and a Bible, in his left pocket. A ball struck the roll-book, passing through it, and lurying itself in the Bible at a very significant verse; and, what was more singular still, was the fact that every man whose name was struck by the ball in passing through the roll-book was either killed or wounded in the battle.

One great interest that Great Britain has to protect in Egypt is the Suez ship canal. Without fresh water the canal could not be operated. The canal runs through a sandy waste. No fresh water is within 100 miles one side or 500 miles on the other side. The fresh water with which Port Said, Ismaila and Suez, the three stations along the canal, are supplied, comes from the Nile through a canal at Boulak, near Cairo. Should Arabi Pasha shut off this supply, the canal would be useless and great distress caused. As he is in possession of Cairo, the people along the canal are at his mercy.

"Moses almost certainly was educated as an Egyptian priest under the reign of Rameses II., and the Pharaoh of Exodus—Menephthah—was the latter's successor. The mummy of the latter is in Marictte's Museum. The name Moses is the Egyptian Mesu, signifying 'child, or boy.' A recently deciphered papyrus contained an official report concerning a certain 'Mesu,' who is declared to have much influence over the 'foreign people' has the Hyksos, Shepherd Kings, Israelites and other Semitic tribes are collectively designated. Bricks made with and without straw are to be found in quantities among the ruins of Bubastis and other Egyptian cities in the land of Goshen."—Ex. C. H.

The United States Signal Service office has published a careful account of the tornadoes and destructive storms of this year. The report shows that tornadoes were of almost daily occurrences during the month of June. As the result 150 people lost their lives, 400 have been wounded, and property valued at $6,000,000 has been destroyed. The most terrific storm was that in Iowa, which destroyed the town of Grinnell. Examination of heavy articles, such as stones, and railroad cars, lifted by this storm, shows that the force of the wind within the vortex was about 200 pounds to the square foot. Professor McCombor, of Amos College, who prepared the report on the destruction of Grinnell, says that it is unnecessary to introduce electricity as a factor. The wind was sufficient to do all the damage. The electric display was merely an incident.

HOW THE ITALIANS EMBALM.

The principal Italian embalmers keep their special processes a secret, although the chief steps are well known. The process of embalming is stated to consist of five steps. First cold water is injected through the whole circulatory system until it issues quite clear. This may take as long as five hours. Alcohol is then injected for the purpose of abstracting all the water from the body. This is followed up by the injection of ether, to dissolve out the fatty matter. This injection is carried on for several hours—in thin subjects for two, in very fat ones for even as long as ten hours. After this a strong solution of tannin is slowly injected, and full time is allowed for its soaking into all the tissues; this takes from two to five hours. Lastly, the body is exposed for from two to five hours to a current of warm air, which is previously dried by passing it over heated chloride of calcium. The body can then be preserved for any length of time without undergoing change, and is as hard as stone.—London Lancet.

MORE LAKE-WATER ECCENTRICITY.

During the high wind Monday afternoon several parties at Hathaway's Point were treated to a grand spectacle. The wind swooped down suddenly upon the smooth water in the bay, and taking it up for the space of about six rods wide lifted it into the air to the height of 175 feet; and this wall of water was carried down the lake with lightning speed for about six miles, when it divided into two parts, each of which went whirling about after the manner of a genuine waterspout. Several persons who were fishing a little distance from the shore made quick time in getting to land again, but luckily the cyclone did not strike the point at all; if it had, none of the buildings there could have stood the racket. There were fortunately not any boats out in the track of the watery wall, which would have certainly lifted up and destroyed anything in its way. It is spoken of as a terribly grand sight. —St. Albans (Vt.) Messenger, June 29.

THE PYRAMID OF MEYDOOM.

A recent letter from the Hon. J. Villiers Stuart, author of "Nile Gleanings," in The Academy, says: "The other day I visited Meydoom. The pyramid has now been cleared down to the level of the desert, to which it descends in a series of great steps of beautifully fitted masonry of fine white limestone. The joints are so close that it is often difficult to trace them. It is, in fact, more like cabinet-maker's work than mason's work. It must have been covered up from the remotest times, as it looks quite new toward the base. You may say it was but just finished. It comes next in size to the pyramids of Ghizeh. The central chamber is tent-shaped—that is to say, the walls incline inward toward the roof, so as to reduce the span, and better enable it (the roof) to bear the enormous superincumbent weight. There were found in this chamber some pieces of timber, which seem to have been used to remove some heavy weight, perhaps the sarcophagus. It is, however, possible that, as in the case of the Pyramids of Ghizeh, there may be another chamber in which the sarcophagus still exists. When I last saw Professor Maspero he seemed to doubt whether this was really Soneferu's pyramid; but within five minutes' walk of the pyramid I discovered an inscription which conclusively proved that it was indeed the pyramid of that Pharaoh. The inscription occurs on the right hand top corner of the tomb of Nufre-Maat. It reads Sene-feremMeate—i. e., the 'resting-place,' 'abiding-place,' or 'cemetery' of Soneferu. There is no context, and never has been any. The stone is quite uninjured, and the purpose of the inscription is to designate the locality in which the tomb is situated."

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

There will be a three days meeting of the One Faith, if the Lord is willing, at Pleasant Hill school house, in the southeast corner of Montague Co., Tex., four miles south of Forestburg, and thirty miles west of Gainesville, on the Jonesville & Jacksboro road, and one-half mile west of the old conference ground. Meeting to commence Friday evening, July 21, at 4 o'clock. A general invitation is extended to all. Bro. J. S. Lawver of Missouri is expected to be present.

B. F. HOOKER.

The Piedmont A. C. G. will hold its fourth annual session with the church at Beaver Creek, N. C., commencing Friday, Aug. 25, and holding over Sunday. Persons traveling by rail will leave the train at Hickory, N. C., and go via Lenoir. J. J. HARSHAW.

The annual assembly of the Church of God will (the Lord willing) commence on Friday before the first Sunday in August, at the house of the brethren, in Winchester, Va., and will continue for several days, including the first and second Sundays. As quite a number of able speaking brethren are expected to be in attendance, the brethren of the one faith are respectfully invited to attend. All coming by rail will please inform the writer in time what day they will be at the depot, and he will meet them there and conduct them to the house of the brethren, where they will be cared for as long as it will suit them to stay.

N. J. MORGAN.

Notice.

The time for Grove Meetings having arrived, I would inform brethren desiring such and wishing my assistance, that I am ready once more to render it. Brethren in any of the Western or Northwestern states who desire can have a tent meeting by making arrangements soon. I can furnish the tent. Address

J. F. WILSON,
311 Evergreen Place, Chicago.

"THE RESTITUTION OF ALL THINGS WHICH GOD HATH SPOKEN BY THE MOUTH OF ALL HIS HOLY PROPHETS SINCE THE WORLD BEGAN."

VOL. XXXI. PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, JULY 26, 1882. NO. 28.

THE RESTITUTION.

TERMS--TWO DOLLARS PER YEAR, Payable in advance. Three and Six Months at the same rate.

Address all Letters and Communications to THE RESTITUTION, Plymouth, Indiana.

TO CORRESPONDENTS:

THE RESTITUTION means the full restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with JESUS CHRIST as King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations (the restoration of Israel), the literal resurrection of the dead, the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked: eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Absolute loyalty to the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

COMING AGE--ITS PROXIMITY. No. 118.

French Revolution Continued. Republican Era. General Remarks. Its Acts Described. Execution of Louis XVI. Martyrdoms which Follow. French Atheism. Its Creed. Its Various Acts Against God.

J. P. WEETHEE.

The French Revolution assumed various forms. It arose out of the lower strata of the Feudal Monarchy. It struggled upward through the superincumbent elements like a burning mountain out of a raging abyss. The Republic was not a star falling from heaven; it came up out of an abyss; an abyss of corruption formed of the basest materials. The second form was Republican. It then passed into the hands of a Directory. It was afterwards governed by Consuls. It finally became Imperial. The Revolution completed the circle of government by restoring the Monarchy. With the Republic we are particularly concerned. That period was unlike any that the world had ever before seen. It fully justified the remark made by Napoleon: "Nothing in history resembles the eighteenth century, and nothing in the eighteenth century resembles its close;" this he said when he was overthrowing the Directory. Such results flow from adequate causes. A power had arisen out of the corrupt masses, that had overthrown the Altar and the Throne; and with them had cleared France of all titles of distinction. History has no record of any other such a sudden politico-ecclesiastical convulsion; and our conclusion is, that it was the child of extraordinary causes. An author remarks of this period, (Republican France:) "More blood was shed in the reign of three years, and it was fraught with more crime than the whole annals of twenty other nations." That the reader may form an idea of its nature, we submit a part of its record. The utterances of the leading spirits of Republican France.

1. Anacharis Cloots.—In the national convention: "Universal Republic and worship of Reason. Destruction of tyrants and all gods. Paris the centre of the globe for the orator of the human race. Since 1780 I have redoubled my zeal against the pretended sovereigns of earth and heaven. I boldly preached that there was no other God but Nature; no other sovereign but the human race—the people—god. The people is sufficient for itself. It will subsist forever. Nature kneels not before herself. Judge of the majesty of the free human race, by that of the French people, which is but a fraction of it. Judge of its infallibility by that of the French.

2. J. B. Gobel.—Bishop of Lydda, Deputy to the States General, abjured the Catholic religion. "Born a plebeian, curé of Porrentruy, cast by clergy to the first assembly, then raised to the arch-bishopric of Paris. I have never ceased to obey the people. I accepted the functions which that people formerly bestowed on me, and in obedience to it I am now come to resign them. I suffered myself to be made a bishop, when the people wanted bishops. I cease to be so now when the people no longer desire to have any. My clergy, actuated by the same sentiments, charged me to make a like declaration for them." As he finished speaking, he laid down his mitre, his crosier, and his ring. His clergy ratified his declaration. All other clergy followed his example. All the churches were stripped. Some burned all their Catholic books. Public worship ceased in France; the national Christian worship, for the time being, was dead, and with it, all Christian worship in public assemblies. They addressed the images, "O you instruments of fanaticism, blessed saints of all kinds! be at length patriots; arise en masse; save the country by going to the mint to be melted and give us in this world that felicity which you wanted to obtain for us in the other!" These images were deposited at the mint. Marat and Lepelletier's busts (two that had been murdered) were put in their places, and these churches became temples for a new worship."—Thiers.

Notre Dame the cathedral of Paris, 1882 being its 709th anniversary since the consecration, became by an act of the convention, the Temple of Reason. Decade (ten days) festivals took the place of Sabbath worship. The first great festival was held on the 10th of November, 1793. A young woman represented the goddess of Reason, the wife of Momoro, the printer; one of the friends of Vincent Ronsin, Chaumette, Herbert, and the like. She was dressed in a white drapery; a mantle of azure blue hung from her shoulders; her flowing hair was covered with the cap of liberty. She sat upon an antique seat, intwined with ivy and borne by four citizens. Young girls dressed in white, and crowned with roses preceded and followed the goddess. Then came the busts of Lepelletier and Marat, musicians, troops, and all the armed sections. Speeches were made and hymns sung in the temple of Reason. 'Beauty without modesty was seen usurping the place of the Holy of Holies.' —Beauregard. They then proceeded to the convention and Chaumette spoke in these terms: "Legislators! Fanaticism has given way to Reason. Its bleared eyes could not endure the brilliancy of the light. This day an immense concourse has assembled beneath these Gothic vaults, for the first time, to echoed the truth. There the French have celebrated the only true worship, that of liberty, that of reason. There we have formed wishes for the prosperity of the arms of the Republic. There we have abandoned inanimate idols for reason, for that animated, the masterpiece of nature." As he uttered the words, Chaumette pointed to the living goddess of Reason. The young and beautiful woman descended from the seat, and went up to the president who gave her the fraternal kiss, amidst universal bravoes, and shouts of, The Republic forever! Reason forever! Down with Fanaticism! The convention, which had not yet taken any part in these representations, was hurried away, and obliged to follow the procession, which returned to the temple of Reason, and there sang a patriotic hymn.

On these transactions, M. A. Thiers makes these remarks: "It is impossible to view with any other feeling than disgust these scenes without devotion, without sincerity, exhibited by a nation which had changed its worship, without comprehending either the old system and dogmas which were given to it to believe. When is it capable of comprehending the true principles of worship? What does it in general want? Large assemblies, which gratify its fondness for public meetings, symbolic spectacles, which incessantly remind it of power superior to its own; lastly festivals in which homage is paid to those who have made the nearest approach to the good, the fair, the great, in short temples, ceremonies, and saints. Here were temples, Reason, Marat, and Lepelletier; every tenth day a revolutionary leader ascended the pulpit and preached atheism to the bewildered audience. Marat (one of the most infamous characters, murdered by Charlotte Corday) was universally deified, and even the instrument of death was sanctified by the name of the Holy Guillotine! On all public cemeteries this inscription was placed: 'Death is an eternal sleep.' (The comedian Monert in the church of St. Roche, carried impiety to its height, "God, if you exist, avenge your injured name! I bid you defiance. You remain silent. You dare not launch your thunders. Who after this will believe in your existence?"—Allison.) Never had power overthrown with greater violence the habits of a people. To threaten all lives, to declaim all fortunes, to fix compulsorily the standard of the exchanges, to give new names to all things, to abolish the ceremonies of religion, is indisputably the most atrocious of tyrannies, if we do not take into account the danger of the state, the inevitable crisis of commerce, and the spirit of system inseparable from the spirit of innovation." —Thiers.

"The services of religion were now universally abandoned. The pulpits were deserted through the revolutionary districts; baptisms ceased; the burial service was no longer heard; the sick received no communion; the dying no consolation. The village bells were silent; Sunday was obliterated. Infancy entered the world without a blessing; age quitted it without hope." —Allison.

Cruelties of this period of atheism. The moral and political convulsions of France are now the themes of our investigation. They may be compared to the oscillations of a pendulum. Commencing at Christianity, in its descent it past scepticism in the Constituent Assembly, and in the Legislative Assembly. In the latter part of the Legislative Assembly and during the first 2½ years of the National Convention, the nation was passing through the age of atheism. This part of the oscillation is more particularly described. We do not hesitate to affirm that the world never before saw such a period as the one between April 6, 1792, and October 6, 1795. We challenge the learned of the world to find its like, or its equal for blasphemy, blood-shed, moral and political corruption.

La Vendee, in the northwest of France, gave to the Revolution the most protracted and bloody resistance. Being bigoted Romanists, they had always been under the power of the priests, and had shed the blood of martyrs. God, therefore, doubles the cup which they are forced to drink. They adhered to the Altar and the Throne, and their subjugation was, consequently, a long and bloody work. Over a million lives were sacrificed. The Republican cruelty was exceedingly severe.

In the south of France was another theatre of horror and blood-shed. It is worthy of special notice that these revolutionary vials were poured out upon those Papal districts where the greatest amount of martyr blood had been shed. The one about to be narrated, took place in and around Lyons, where the Waldenses and Albigenses were slain.

"Proceeding on these atheistic principles (death is an eternal sleep) the first step of Collot-d'Herbois and Fouche was to institute a fete in honor of Chalier, the Republican governor of Lyons, who had been put to death on the first insurrection. His bust was carried through the streets, followed by an immense crowd of assassins and prostitutes. After them came an ass bearing the Gospel, the Cross, and the Communion Vases, which were soon committed to the flames, while the ass was compelled to drink out of the communion cup the consecrated wine.

The executions meantime continued without the slightest relaxation. Many women watched the hour when their husbands were to pass to the scaffold precipitated themselves upon the chariot, and voluntarily suffered death by their side. Daughters surrendered their honor to save their parents' lives; but the monsters who violated them adding treachery to crime, led them out to behold the execution of their relatives! Deeming the daily execution of fifteen or twenty persons too tardy a display of Republican vengeance, Collot d'Herbois prepared a new and simultaneous mode of punishment. Sixty captives of both sexes were led out together tightly bound in a file, to the Place du Brotteaux. They were arranged in two files with a deep ditch on each side, which was to be their place of sepulchre, while gendarmes with uplifted sabres threatened with instant death whosoever moved from his position. At the extremity of the file, two cannon loaded with grape were so placed as to enfilade the whole. The signal was then given and the guns were fired. Broken limbs, torn by the shot, were scattered in every direction; while the blood flowed in torrents into the ditches on either side of the line. A second and third discharge was sufficient to complete the work of destruction, till at length the gendarmes, unable to witness such protracted sufferings, rushed in and dispatched the survivors with their sabres. On the following day this bloody scene was renewed on a still greater scale. Two hundred and nine were brought before the revolutionary judges, and, with scarcely a hearing, condemned to be executed together. With such precipitance was the affair conducted, that two commissaries of the prison were led out along with their captives; their cries, their protestations were alike disregarded. In passing the bridge Morand the error was discovered on the captives being counted, and it was intimated to Collot d'Herbois that there were too many. 'What signifies it,' said he, 'if there are too many? If they die today they cannot die tomorrow.' The whole were brought to the place of execution, where they were attached to one cord made fast to trees at stated intervals, with their hands tied behind their backs, and numerous pickets of soldiers disposed so as at one discharge to destroy them all. At a given signal the fusillade commenced; but few were killed; the greater part had only a jaw or limb broken, and uttering their most piercing cries, they broke loose in their agony, from the rope and were cut down by gendarmes. The great numbers who survived the discharge rendered the work of destruction a most laborious operation, and several were still breathing on the following day when there bodies were mingled with quick lime, and cast into a common grave. Collot d'Herbois and Fouche were witnesses of this butchery from a distance by means of telescopes which they directed to the spot. All the other fusillades were conducted in the same manner. One of them was executed under the windows of a hotel on the quay, where Fouche, with thirty Jacobins, and twenty Courtesans was engaged at dinner. They rose from the table to enjoy the bloody spectacle. The bodies of the slain were floated in such numbers down the Rhone that the waters were poisoned. During the course of five months upwards of six thousand persons suffered death, and more than double that number were driven into exile."—Allison.

"Chaumette, Herbert, and all the notables of the Commones and Cordeliers went on to atheism. Pache, Herbert, and Chaumette, the leaders of the municipality expressed ther determination to dethrone the king of heaven, as well as the kings of the earth."—Locretelle. October 14th 1792, it was decreed by the Convention that no religious exercises should be out of their temples, no funeral services as formerly, statue of sleep at cemeteries, all outward signs of religion abolished, no St. Veronica's handkerchiefs, Ecce Homos, Crosses, Agnus Deis, Virgins, bodies and rings of St. Hubert, or any powders, medicinal waters, image of the Virgin taken away to give place to the busts of Marat and Lepelletier.

Early Pioneers of the Truth in Virginia. No. 2.

The contention between Alexander Campbell of Bethany, and Dr. John Thomas of Painesville, Va., on the great question of life and immortality, excited great attention and interest throughout Virginia in the years 1834-40. It was waged with great spirit and no little learning and ability by the respective champions of tongue and pen. Mr. Campbell wielded an immense influence through his preaching lieutenants and in his Millennial Harbinger.

Dr. Thomas moved in a less ample arena, but kept up the controversy by his bold and public advocacy of the Bible vs. tradition and his Apostolic Advocate, answering and exposing with undaunted spirit and close Bible reasoning, the resounding broadsides of the heavy Bethany battleaxe.

Dr. Thomas' bold denial of the immortality of the soul and of the dismal creed of endless misery, called up in opposition the clerical expounders of the popular doctrine of natural immortality of all men by creation. One of these, a Rev. Mr. Watt, a Presbyterian minister, a gentleman of culture and education, held a public debate, about this time with Dr. Thomas on the much agitated question, which afforded to the Doctor and his brethren a welcome opportunity to present the subject more fully and formally to the public.

With our present greatly increased light and knowledge derived from the study of the word of truth, it is easy for us to believe that in such a discussion, the intelligent advocate of life and immortality only in Christ, had greatly the advantage and easily swept away, by force of the plain Bible testimony, the mouldy cobwebs of Pagan tradition contained in the opinions of the fathers and the writings of the so-called Doctors of Divinity. The pertinent and insurmountable array of Bible texts and arguments which Dr. Thomas' defence of the truth embodied carried defeat and disaster into the camp of orthodox sectarians. Nevertheless, as it was in the days of Noah and Lot, and of Jesus and the apostles, and as we see it even now in this boastful apostate Gentile age, "the truth" was in a woful minority in the popular suffrage, and its enemies increased and multiplied on every side. A few brave and noble spirits however accepted the reproach and boldly stood up in its defence. Conspicuous among these were Albert Anderson, F. V. Sutton, and a few others in Caroline County, Dr. Lemuel Edwards and brethren Littlepage, King Robbins, etc., of King William; Dr. Charles May, and the Watts, Ragsdale, Gee, etc., of Lunenburg, and the Bowles of Louisa and Goochland Counties, all of whom were proscribed and almost outlawed religiously, and socially by their late associates of "the reformation."

These courageous men, although standing alone in their defence of the word of God amidst the multitude of opponents, boldly braved the storm of prejudice and ill will, and "clave unto the Lord and believed." Growing strong in proportion as they plainly discerned the light of God's word and followed it, they were very diligent in propagating "the things both old and new" which they found in their treasures, and drew down on themselves not alone the bitter opposition of their quondam brethren but also of all the orthodox in the whole commonwealth.

These warm discussions reached their crisis at last by Mr. Campbell's formal announcement of his purpose to set out, like another crusader, from his ecclesiastical eyrie. In far off Bethany, Brooke County, Va., and invading the enemy's camp, to attack and overwhelm Dr. Thomas and his little band of factionists and heretics, as he styled them opprobriously, in a public, formal discussion.

Nothing was more desired than this course by Dr. Thomas and the friends of truth.

On the way to Painesville, Va., Mr. Campbell—the modern Luther as he liked to be regarded—gathered around him at Richmond the faithful, who readily espoused his cause. He was then in the prime of life—in 1837-8—and in the zenith of his powers and of his fame, especially as an able reasoner and a dexterous, experienced and eloquent debater. Confident in his own strength and in his popularity and influence with his brethren, he reckoned on an easy triumph over his almost youthful opponent. Like boastful Goliah, he continually dwarfed his antagonist and by his unquestioned abilities and by the blandishments of his cordial manners with his friends he succeeded in impressing his admirers with such a sense of his wonderful superiority that they were already prepared even before the debate came off, to join in the wild cry: "Great is Diana of the Ephesians."

Dr. Thomas, in all external circumstances and surroundings, presented a strong contrast to Mr. Campbell. He was comparatively "a stripling" in years, of rather small stature, and though a handsome man in person with good features, a clear voice and a fine eye, he possessed no advantage of declamation in his manners. On the contrary, though not rude, he was reserved, even cold in his intercourse with his fellowmen and always occupied when not preaching with his Bible or pen—more a listener than a talker in general conversation, and either ignorant or regardless of the suavity and social politeness (which distinguished his opponent, President Campbell,) and which wins friends for their possessor and his cause. Dr. Thomas, however, was ripe in scholarship—an earnest and sincere lover of truth—a foe to all sham and pretension—careless of popularity—like the Patriarch, looking upon "man in his best estate as altogether vanity"—not addicted to policy, but devoted to the right and a bold and fearless champion of his convictions and a constant, unremitting student of and reasoner from the Scriptures, which he supremely venerated. In the pulpit he was at home, being of fluent and easy speech, an elegant reader and very choice and happy in diction, with no gesture and without any of the arts of the orator.

Being of a brave and uncompromising temper and firm and stern in his convictions he seemed especially fitted for the hard work before him, which was the casting down to the ground all the mass of heathen inventions and musty theology which, like the accumulated rubbish of by-gone ages, had obscured the blessed light of the truth and exalted itself above the knowledge of God, "through philosophy and vain deceit, after the traditions of men—after the rudiments of the world and not after Christ."

The leader in this opposition to God's work, Alexander Campbell, in his strange and new role of heretic detector, a sort of ecclesiastical chief-of-police, seemed to forget his own recent experience with the Baptists, who proscribed him, as he repeatedly urged, for no other reason that he preferred to follow in religion the word of God instead of the doctrines and commandments of men. He was constantly urged, by tongue and pen to follow his own rule and point to a single text or authority in the Bible which taught the immortal soul theory and yet he failed deplorably in the effort. On the other hand, in his Apostolic Advocate, Dr. Thomas and his associates, did not fail to accumulate texts and Bible proof of the soundness and strength of their position in denouncing and exposing the absurd and baseless fabric of Pagan superstition. Never did a mere handful of faithful and courageous men appear to greater advantage in the sight of all honest and thoughtful observers. They stood up boldly like the first Christians as witnesses and martyrs, if need be of the truth of God, and gladly accepted persecution and reproach for the truth's sake, saying like their prototypes of Acts iv. to all threatened and denounced them "whether it be right in the sight of God to hearken unto you more than God, judge ye."

The disputants held a friendly interview in Richmond before they met in Painesville. In this Mr. Campbell stipulated that the debate should not be reported, hopeful perhaps that he should convince his opponent, and wishing no trace to remain after that amiable conclusion, of any former alienation between them. If so, it was an unnecessary precaution.

It was at this preliminary conference in Richmond that a remarkable conversation occurred between Mr. Campbell and Mr. Albert Anderson. The former mourned over the defection, as he called it, of Mr. Anderson from his cause. Doubtless he knew the rare merits of the man, his ripe learning as a scholar, and the singular transparency and fidelity of his character and of his devotion to the cause of truth. He therefore sought earnestly to win him over to his side. He expressed great sorrow and surprise that he had been led astray by Dr. Thomas, whom he had characterized in his paper as ambitious in temper and as a shallow and sophistical reasoner.

Most men, flattered by the compliment of being personally solicited and proud of the honor of such intimate association and preference from the Great Leader of a new and successful reformation in religion, the President of Bethany College, etc., would have found it difficult to resist the temptation offered by such an appeal. But Albert Anderson had been too much in the company of the prophets and apostles and had drank too deeply of their spirit not to know better. He at once informed Mr. Campbell that it was not Dr. Thomas who had led him to see the truth as to life and immortality but Moses and the prophets, Jesus and the apostles, and that in the coming debate he must be prepared to confront and confute them, and not a merely human opponent. Piqued perhaps by this pertinent reply, and proud no doubt of his known prowess as a skilful debater, Mr. Campbell had the folly and rashness to declare that God had raised him up, as he had "called Luther, to take the lead and be the superior of his associates," and had given him the right to choose his allies and associates and that he had "not invited Dr. Thomas to be one of them." Perceiving from this statement, which is here substantially, if not verbally rehearsed, that President Campbell was placing himself on the identical grounds of Papal supremacy, Mr. Anderson promptly repelled the arrogant assumption of the new "Supervisor," by informing him that he recognized no such titled official and that he had better understand at once that he was not his Supervisor, either as to faith or practice and that he should continue to follow the light of a far higher authority."

Such were some of the stern men of the early days of the present struggle for the truth.

Ezek. xxxi. 15-18, inclusive.

Thus saith the Lord, On the day on which he went down into hades, the abyss bewailed him; and I caused its currents to be stayed and I restrained an abundance of water, and Libanus was darkened on account of him; all the trees of the plain languished on his account. By reason of the report of his overthrow the nations were shaken when I brought him down into hades along with those who go down into a narrow pit, and on the earth all the trees that are for enjoyment and the chosen trees of the Libanus all that drink water were comforting him. For they themselves also have gone down along with him into hades among the wounded from the sword; and his seed those who dwell beneath his shadow have perished in the midst of their life.

To what hast thou become like. Go down, be thou brought down along with the trees that are for enjoyment into earth's gains in the midst of uncircumcised ones thou shalt sleep in the midst of the wounded with the sword. Even so Pharoah and the multitude of his strength, saith the Lord.

FEELING.

Feeling is not always the criterion of right. He who refuses to obey God and yet thinks himself pardoned and saved, may feel very happy at times; but that does not make his happiness a proof of God's favor. God only promises pardon to the repentant obedient sinner—to the one who does his will. The thing that God has said must be done before pardon can come. Must be done. Then the proof that we have forgiveness, is in the words,—"for the remission of your sins."

Take the family name and God looking at you through the sinless one clothes you with his righteousness, and remembers your sins and iniquities no more.

S. ROXANA WIXON.

Dr. Judson believed that when any man becomes a Christian, or real disciple of Christ, a specific moral change takes place in his spiritual nature. The essential elements of this change are, a deep and universal sorrow for the sins of his past life, an entire renunciation of all hope of salvation by any merits of his own, an unreserved surrender of himself to Christ, relying on him alone for pardon and acceptance with God, and an earnest desire to live henceforth in obedience to all the requirements of the gospel, and that these spiritual exercises terminate in a radical change of moral character, leading to a pure and holy life.—Wayland's Memoir of Judson.

We go on through our life comforted in our troubles, strengthened in our trials, and elevated in our joys, by the wondering and expectant hope of that day of glad surprise when the sealed package shall be opened, and we shall know what the Lord hath prepared for them that love him.

Now, every morning, to the Lord
Our whispering and rejoicing prayer
Through clouds and darkness safely brought,
Restored to life and rest—and thought.
New mercies seek returning day,
Never ceased or while we pray!
New pulse beat, new life to-day,
New thoughts of God, new hopes of heaven.
—Anon.

Notice.

The time for Grove Meetings having arrived, I would inform brethren desiring such and wishing my assistance, that I am ready once more to render it. Brethren in any of the Western or Northwestern states who desire can have a tent meeting by making arrangements soon. I can furnish the tent. Address

Plymouth, Indiana, July 20, 1882.

NORTHERN Indiana Conference at Rensselaer, August 24-29.

WE are compelled to let some articles go over to future numbers.

IT seems from latest news that the Egyptians and Arabians are disposed to adhere to Arabi Bey, as their leader, notwithstanding the opposition ostensibly manifested by the Sultan and the Khedive. From a letter to Gladstone, published in our news items, it appears that a holy war is among the probabilities, and should this occur, all Mohammedanism would side with Arabi. The fire already kindled may prove a conflagration.

From a circular sent to this office by Henry Monett, General Passenger Agent, Cleveland, Ohio, it appears that another trunk line railway will soon be in operation through Marshall county. This road will compete strongly with the Lake Shore and Michigan Central. The New York, Chicago and St. Louis Railway (known as the "Nickel-Plated Line") extending from Buffalo to Chicago via. Dunkirk, Erie, Ashtabula, Cleveland, Fostoria and Fort Wayne, will be opened for traffic on or about October 1. We are assured by the circular that the roadway has been constructed in a superior manner; the iron bridges are marvels of strength and beauty; steel rails have been laid the entire distance, and the passenger equipment, built entirely by Pullman, will be the finest possessed by any company in the world.

WE clip the following from the New York Times of Monday, July 17. It is, as will be seen, a re-publication from another paper. Evidently the truth is winning its way wonderfully. The short letter will place the correct doctrine of the future life in a very lucid and comprehensive manner of statement before a multitude of readers by being published in a Journal having the vast circulation which the Times numbers. Bless God that thinking minds are fast becoming emancipated from the power of false creeds.

THE SOUL'S IMMORTALITY—IT IS MADE AN ISSUE IN THE TENNESSEE CAMPAIGN.

The Memphis (Tenn.) Herald, a Greenback paper, prints the following letter from its party's nominee for Governor of the State:

WINCHESTER, Tenn., July 8 '82.

H. P. Ferguson, Esq:

DEAR SIR: Your letter has just been received, inclosing an article from the Dyersburg Gazette, one of your county papers, which charges me with denying the existence of a God and the immortality of the soul, and you wish to know if the charge is true. I have never denied the existence of a God, and, therefore, on this point Mr. Thomas Neal's charge is false. So far as the immortality of the soul is concerned, I did not hesitate to deny that, because, in my opinion, the Bible does not teach the doctrine. Upon the contrary, it says that, "God only hath immortality," and it makes the future life of man dependent entirely upon the resurrection of the body. "If there be no resurrection of the dead," said Paul, "then they that have fallen asleep in Christ have perished." The immortality of the soul is not a Jewish idea, and was never taught by Christ, the apostles, or prophets. The establishment of the Kingdom of God in the land of Judea, and the resurrection of the righteous dead to reign with Christ over the nations of the earth for a thousand years are the two grand ideas which illumine the Bible, in my opinion. No can man become immortal, according to the teaching of the Bible, until after the resurrection of the body, and his body will not be resurrected unless he believes in the Gospel. Plato taught the immortality of the soul hundreds of years before Christ was born, but I am not a disciple of Plato. I think his doctrine was invented for the purpose of reconciling the poor to the burdens placed upon them by the rich, and therefore I hate his doctrine with all my heart and soul.

But my religious opinions have nothing to do with the political affairs of the State of Tennessee, and I regret the necessity of having to say anything about them. It seems, however, that my political enemies, like the political enemies of Jefferson, are determined to excite all the religious prejudice against me that they can. Such warfare is contemptible, and I expected better things of the editors of the Dyersburg Gazette. Yours respectfully, JOHN R. BRADLEY.

DEATH BY SIN.

Knowing that Christ being raised from the dead dieth no more; death hath no more dominion over him. For in that he died, he died unto sin once: but in that he liveth, he liveth unto God. Likewise reckon ye yourselves to be dead unto sin, but alive unto God through Jesus Christ our Lord.—Rom. vi. 9-11.

The translation in these verses is so contrary to one of the plainest rules of Greek syntax, that it seems utterly unaccountable why such scholars as those who have given us the New Testament in the older authorized version, or in the Revision, should ever have so rendered the passages. The design of the apostle is to show the malignity of sin in producing or causing death. By one man—Adam—sin entered into the world, and death by sin, and so death passed upon all. By the sin of Adam the race became doomed to death. All descending from him, whether personal transgressors or not, are mortal. By his sin our first parent involved himself and his posterity in one common destiny. The death by the one sin of this one man has passed upon all—embracing the one who sinned, and the many deriving their existence from the one. Sin made the parent mortal, and the race inherit mortality. Those who share the nature of the one sentenced to death share the death-doom of that nature. Innocent infants who never sinned are not excepted. The Son of God who took a part in flesh and blood came under the power of death by thus participating in our nature. Jesus was made a little lower than the angels for the suffering of death. Heb. ii. 9, 14, 16. Hence the apostle, in the original Greek, uses no such absurd language in those verses as dying unto sin. Applied to Christ, who was holy, harmless, and separate from sinners, who did no sin, neither was guile found in his mouth, the language is monstrous error. Surely it cannot be said of Christ that he died to sin, in the sense of sinning no more, while the expression is literally true that he died by sin as a consequence of his assuming that nature that was under the divine sentence to death. By the sin of one—Adam—his flesh and blood nature became mortal, and humanity in the aggregate—embracing the all—the one that sinned, and the many descended from the one sinner—is doomed to die. Death has passed upon all. The sin-poison of mortality is in the nature. Because of this—Greek—ef' ô pantes êmarton—all have sinned—all inherit the sin-condemned Adamic nature, and consequently, die whether actual transgressors or not.

To recapitulate: Adam, by his sin in his personal flesh and blood nature, subjected himself and all participating in this nature, by deriving their existence from him, to a participation in the condemnation denounced against him. All are treated as sinners; and so, by his sin, all are brought under the power of death. The law controlling the Adamic nature—whether possessed by the one that transgressed, or by the many descended from him—is the law of sin and death. Rom. viii. 2.

By the immutable laws of cause and effect, sin, as a cause, has made humanity mortal—has subjected the entire race to death with Adam—death by his sin has passed upon all; and death is by sin; as the law is formulated by the apostle. The rule of Greek syntax that governs the relations of words in these verses is termed the Dative Instrumental. In a few words the principal is: The dative is used to express the cause, instrument, means, or manner of an action. The literal rendering of the dative words by this rule would be: For in that he (Christ) died, he died by sin—Greek tę hamartia—but in that he liveth, he liveth by God—Greek—tę theô. It was by the sin of Adam, that prostrated human nature, of which Christ partook when the word was made flesh that he died: he was put to death in the flesh. See John i. 14; Heb. ii. 17; 1 Peter iii. 18. But he lives by God—God raised him from the dead—he was quickened, or made alive, by the Spirit. Thus by sin he was caused to die, because he had assumed a nature made mortal by sin. And he lives by God because he was made alive by the Spirit of God when he was raised from the dead. Rom. viii. 11. The same idea of dative instrumentality, in causing death, and restoring life, is expressed in the eleventh verse, quoted at the head of this article, where dying by sin, and living by God are repeated in reference to the saints. They are made mortal by sin, and they are vivified in Christ by God.

This verse is a logical sequent to the tenth which speaks of Christ, and shows that the death, as well as the expected future life, of the saints are results linked with efficient causes. A literal rendering of this verse would be—So then account yourselves as mortal—i. e. obnoxious to death—by sin; but also as vivified by God in Christ Jesus our Lord. This idea of mortality being by sin, and embracing, as a doom, the entire race, is emphasized in many other passages which we may consider at some future time. It now remains to briefly speak of the love of God, who gave his Son to die the just for the unjust, and of the love of Christ who became obedient to death that we might obtain justification to endless life through his blood. God commendeth his love toward us, in that while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us. He spared not his own Son, but delivered him up for us all. Of Christ it is said—He died for our sins according to the Scriptures—that he appeared to put away sin by the sacrifice of himself. We always feel that we are treading on holy ground, when speaking either of the nature and character of our Divine and adorable Redeemer, or of having redemption even the forgiveness of sins through his blood. The blood of the everlasting covenant wherewith we are sanctified, is to us an intensely holy thing. We feel that our loved Savior not only died to abolish death but to put away sin. We rejoice that the redemption that is in Christ Jesus, not only brings a new life to a world that sin has poisoned to death, but, also, that by it sin itself is utterly removed—that the blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth from all sin.

While we expatiate with rapture on the covenanted prize of a crown of eternal life and glory, we would never dissociate the priceless boon from the precious blood of the covenant. Abel's altar, and Israel's countless sacrifices that crimsoned the sanctuary courts for ages, prefigured the blood of the sin-atoning Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world; and the broken bread and the wine of our holy communion tell in solemn emphasis, of the sacrifice and blood of Calvary. If we ever reach the world made new, if we ever enter the Heavenly Jerusalem, if we ever obtain a coronal of glory from the enthroned Jesus to grace our unworthy temples, we never expect to place its glittering gems on our immortalized brows, till in view of his ineffable love we place it at his feet and with the redeemed host exclaim—Unto him that loved us, and washed us from our sins in his own blood.

ASIA MINOR — CONFLAGRATION AT SMYRNA.

LONDON, July 19.—A dispatch from Smyrna says a great conflagration is raging there. Many hundreds of houses have been destroyed.

SMYRNA, July 19.—The fire here raged seven hours. Fourteen hundred houses were destroyed. Six thousand persons are homeless. One life was lost.

A DELAYED LETTER FROM ARABI.

Arabi Pasha wrote the following letter to Gladstone a few days before the bombardment, but Gladstone did not receive it until after the bombardment:

The Koran commands us to resist if war is waged against us, hence England may rest assured that the first gun she fires in Egypt will absolve the Egyptians from all treaties. The control will cease; the property of Europeans will be confiscated; the canals destroyed, and jehad preached in Syria, Arabia, and India. The first blow which England strikes Egypt will cause blood to flow through Asia and Africa, the responsibility for which will be on the head of England. Egypt is still ready to be fast friends with England and keep her road to India, but she must keep within the limits of her jurisdiction. Finally, England may rest assured we are determined to die for our country.

ALEXANDRIA, July 22.—Today 250 rifles, under an aide-de-camp of General Alison, pushed beyond Millaha, six miles hence, to blow up the railway. They met some of Arabi Pasha's cavalry, and several shots were exchanged. The Egyptians fled, after losing two dead and several wounded. The Rifles having finished their work withdrew.

The British troops now occupy Aboukir and will occupy Ramleh tomorrow.

Arabi Pasha has levied a war tax upon the land to the nominal amount of £500,000.

ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND EGYPTIANS.

ALEXANDRIA, July 24.—The bulk of Arabi Pasha's infantry is reported to be concentrated at Damietta, the troops at Kafr-el-Dewar being chiefly artillery and cavalry. The Inspector of the Cadastral Survey has arrived from the interior. He reports the total force of rebels as nearly a hundred thousand. He says a volunteer cavalry regiment is forming to attack Alexandria.

RAMLEH OCCUPIED BY THE BRITISH.

8 P. M.—The rifles and mounted infantry occupied Ramleh early this morning. They stationed one Gatling and one field gun at the bridge over the canal. The enemy's cavalry appeared and galloped boldly along the railway at 800 yards range, but fled upon a volley being fired. After a short time they reappeared with two guns, with which they opened fire, ineffectually, upon the British, who took to cover. By 9 o'clock the firing had ceased, but the enemy is expected to reappear with reinforcements.

TURKEY AND THE WAR.

LONDON, July 24.—The Times this morning says the question of Turkish intervention is practically decided by the fact that an expedition cannot be sent without denuding the district provinces of troops and even reducing the garrison at Constantinople.

SPRINGFIELD, Ill., July 19.—The funeral of Mrs. Abraham Lincoln took place at Springfield, Ill., this forenoon. The remains were placed in the vault of the Lincoln monument, in which rest those of the martyred President.

By the suspension of public and private business, and by a general attendance at the funeral, the people of Springfield this morning testified their love and esteem of Abraham Lincoln. The First Presbyterian Church, in which the services were held, was crowded with people, and the streets leading to the edifice were filled with the throngs who could not gain admittance.

Six years ago the temperance women of Iowa started the crusade for prohibition, which has just been crowned with such wonderful success. The Iowa State Register says: "It was pre-eminently a woman's contest, in origin, progress, conduct and result. With the three great weapons in the armory of women, faith, earnestness and love, these women never allowed this campaign for six years for the amendment to slacken, and never let a day pass without adding strength to its columns. They made first nearly every household in the State, in whole or in part, an ally of it. They obtained nearly all the women in the State as their supporters. They allied the church and the school-house in every neighborhood. They asked the press for its help, and got it. They even weakened and half disarmed the saloon itself by appealing to its owner rather than threatening them."

THE LIQUOR QUESTION IN INDIANA.

The situation of the liquor question in Indiana is very clearly stated by a correspondent of the Gazette in this paper. The people do not vote directly this year on prohibition, but for a Legislature which may or may not submit the question to a vote of the people. It requires the action of the Legislature to be elected in November to decide whether the people shall vote on a constitutional amendment prohibiting the traffic in liquor. Mr. Hendricks has undertaken to commit the Democratic party against submitting the question to a vote of the people, and this is also the position of the Liquor Dealer's Association. Thus a new question is brought to the front, viz, whether the voice of the people shall be stifled, and this is to be one of the planks in the Democratic platform if Mr. Hendricks can put it there. It is not now a question of prohibition, but whether the sovereign people have a right to vote for or against. —Cincinnati Gazette.

The news of a cholera epidemic not far from Singapore has been confirmed, and all vessels coming from the Dutch Indies and Singapore have been ordered to undergo twenty-four hours' watching on passing through the Suez Canal in quarantine; while vessels on which there has been a case of cholera are to remain seven days in quarantine. Similar precautions have been taken in regard to all vessels from ports in the Ottoman Empire, as the time for the pilgrimages to Mecca is approaching. There has also been an outbreak of plague in Persia, not far from the Armenian frontier of Turkey. The malady is the bubonic plague. Out of 524 inhabitants of one village, 250 were attacked and 150 died, death ensuing after an illness varying from twenty-four hours to a week. The disease has not spread, and the village has been razed to the ground.

EGYPT.

The conflict at Alexandria will prompt inquiry in the minds of our readers as to the political status of Egypt. The selections below will be found to contain, in brief, a description of the past and present conditions of this country in its domestic and foreign relations. Read these pieces with care.

EGYPT IN THE LIGHT OF PROPHECY.

The Rev. Dr. F. S. De Haas, who was for two years United States Consul in Turkey, and who is well acquainted with Egypt, lectured last night in the Central Methodist Episcopal Church, Brooklyn, E. D., of which he is pastor, on "Egypt in the light of prophecy," taking up the religious element of the Egyptian question, and Arabi Pasha and the Mohammedan Arabs. He took the view that the recent troubles in Egypt are of a religious origin. He said that no native Egyptian has filled the throne in the last twenty-four centuries, showing that the sceptre of power has departed from Egypt. He alluded to the degradation of the class known as fellaheens, or tillers of the soil, who are taxed $2 an acre for cultivating their own land. There are 5,000,000 acres of good land in Egypt, and 4,000,000 fellahs, out of a total population of 5,000,000. The present disturbance is nothing but a civil war—a rebellion against the Sultan and the Khedive. Arabi Pasha is a restless, ambitious Arab. He has founded a national party, and is trying to imitate Cromwell and Garibaldi, and wants to drive out all foreigners. There is nothing in Egypt to build an independent Government on. It would be like the negroes of the South trying to form a Government of their own. Dr. De Haas predicted that Arabi would fail utterly in his ambitious projects, but he thought that a religious war might break out that would spread over Asia, Africa and Europe, for Arabi is in league with the new prophet, Senoust, and also with the Shereef of Mecca, the spiritual head of the Mohammedans. In conclusion he said: "One thing is certain; if this contest goes on the Ottoman Empire falls, the Turk will be driven out of Europe, the Cross be planted again on the Mosque of St. Sophia, constitutional government established, and 40,000,000 of our race emancipated from religious despotism."—New York Tribune, July 17.

THE STATUS OF THE KHEDIVE OF EGYPT.

The exact position of the Khedive of Egypt is one of those vexed questions among International jurists which have never yet been exactly settled. After the expulsion of the French, Mehemet Ali, an Albanian adventurer born in Roumelia, was proclaimed Viceroy by the Caimé Sheikhs in 1805. He became sole master of Egypt, and organized a powerful army and navy.

Having annexed the Soudan, he conquered Syria, and annihilated the Turkish army at Koniah in 1832. But for the interference of the Russians he would have entered Constantinople. The treaty of Kutaieh, concluded between the Porte and its Legislature, recognized the feudal sovereignty of Mehemet Ali over Egypt, Crete, Syria, and the large districts of Adana. War broke out again in 1832, in which England espoused the part of the Turks, and in 1840 a treaty was made, to which Great Britain, Prussia, Russia, and Austria were all parties. Under this treaty Egypt became a self-governing province. The order of succession was fixed in accordance with the imperial rule of descent, and Mehemet Ali's right was guaranteed, subject only to a tribute payable to the Sultan, and a limitation as to the number of the Egyptian army. So matters continued until his death, and during the short reign of his three successors. In 1863 Ismail Pasha succeeded to the throne, and a new epoch opened in the history of the country. The official relation of the ruler of Egypt to the Porte still continued. Ismail was only a vali, or Governor General.

With this position he was not content. Shortly after his succession he opened negotiations with the Porte, and by increasing the annual tribute from £376,000 to £675,000 he obtained the title of Khedive-el-Misr, or king of Egypt, with the succession direct to his oldest son. But the old limitations against contracting debts without leave of the Porte, or entering into commercial treaties, still continued. In 1872 another firman was issued, which conferred on him every attribute of sovereignty except the right of being represented by embassadors, trammeled only by increased tribute and military aid in time of war. Both these firmans were communicated to and acknowledged and approved by all the great Powers.—New York Tribune.

EGYPT, ENGLAND AND FRANCE.

Were men wise, advantage would be taken of the present "crisis" in the affairs of Egypt to place that country in a condition that might lead to its settlement on something approaching to a permanent basis, as permanency is understood and accepted in this world. Whatever may have been the power of Egypt in very old times, it is beyond all dispute that the country has not been great as a nation since the days of the Persian conquest. That conquest was made more than twenty-four centuries since; and the case with which it was made, and the shortness of the time in making it, show that Egypt had declined from greatness—if ever she really had known it—at a period anterior to the real beginning of profane history. In less than two centuries more she fell into the hands of the Macedonian Alexander, and published to be a province. Even the establishment of the dynasty of the Ptolemies did not make a nation of Egypt, for that was a Greco-Macedonian dynasty, and so it remained to the last. Cleopatra, the last of its members, was no more an Egyptian than an American lady whose ancestors came over in the Mayflower or the Arbella an Indian.

The Ptolemies and their immediate supporters held a position in Egypt not much unlike to that of the English in India, only that Victoria, Empress of India, does not reside in Hindostan.

Egypt became a Roman province, because of a war between two great Roman parties; and her fate would have been the same had the decision at Actium been for Antonius instead of Octavius. When Mohammedanism appeared, Egypt soon became one of its conquests, and has so remained, for more than 1,200 years, during all of which time it has been governed by foreigners, of various kinds, some of whom were men of a high order—as Saladin, long since, and Mehemet Ali, of this century. In the seventh crusade, Louis IX. (St. Louis), associated French history with Egyptian, but the Christians had much the worse of the business. This was in the thirteenth century. Almost three centuries later, in the first quarter of the sixteenth century, Egypt was conquered by Selim I., Sultan of Turkey; and a Turkish province, really or nominally, she has ever since remained, for ten generations.

The celebrated Leibnitz suggested to Louis XIV. that he should acquire Egypt, in or near the year 1792, and pointed out that such an acquisition would be attended with the most remarkable results; and it is certain had the project been accepted, and undertaken, and carried out, the consequences must have been very important. But the Grand Monarque not only was partial to enterprises nearer home, and which promised quick returns, but his line of policy led him to pursue the old French course, that of conciliating the Turks, whose assistance against the House of Austria he sought, and obtained. The expedition sent from France to Egypt, under Bonaparte (1798), was derived from Leibnitz's project, a century and a quarter after it had been suggested, and when the position of Christian races in India had increased the value of Egypt. It is from 1798 that the connection between England, France and Egypt must be dated; and it began with the battle of the Nile, the issue of which seems to have indicated which of the two great nations of Western Europe was to have supremacy in the East, alike in India and the Levant.

Down to that time England does not appear to have given any thought to Egypt, and that country could not have commanded her attention for many years more, had the French expedition never sailed, as came very near being the case. It was because she had to prevent Egypt from becoming a French possession, wedged as it were between Europe and India, that England exerted herself to regain that country for Turkey. One land force was sent from Europe, and another from India, and the French were vanquished. But for what then was done by Christians, Egypt must have passed from the Turks, and European rule there have been set up; and Christianity might utterly have driven Islam from the valley of the Nile. Mehemet Ali, in all probability, never would have been heard of, had not England cleared the way for the restoration of Turkish rule in that land over which his family was destined to have something very like sovereign sway.

When Mehemet Ali was at the height of greatness, it was generally supposed that his intention was to make himself master of the Turkish Empire, and subvert the reigning family. Had he been left to act according to his own ideas, and had there been no Christian intervention, he might have reigned from Constantinople, becoming both Padishah and Caliph. But the Christian Powers had no desire that Turkey should revive, and they so proceeded that a close was put to the career of the master of Egypt. In 1831-33, Mehemet Ali became master of Syria, and Constantinople was kept from falling into his hands through the arrival of a Russian army, that acted in accordance with the general views of the Presbytery. In 1839-41 there was another move for Empire made by Mehemet Ali, which promised (or threatened) to succeed. Then came a "crisis." All the Powers but France were on the side of Turkey, which really needed all the support it got. Beyrout was bombarded by the British; Sidon was taken; and Acre was forced by the British, aided by some men from one or two other Powers. There came very near being a war between the four Powers and France. It was asserted that Mehemet Ali would not have moved, had he not had good reason—as he supposed it to be—to expect French assistance, on the largest scale. Two things resulted from what was done, and from what was left undone, in 1839-41. The English Whigs were much injured by the course of their principal leaders in quarreling with France, and this helped break them down, and to swell their defeat at the general election of 1841.

The surrender of Louis Philippe to the English Government gave great offense in France, and had considerable to do with the fall of the Orleans dynasty early in 1848. The Allied Powers dealt summarily with Mehemet Ali, who had to give up Syria, and confine himself to Egypt, which was to be ruled by his family. Had he succeeded, he would have transformed the seat of his rule to Bosporus, and the Nile country would have become one of his Turkish provinces. France is now so acting as to show that she cannot easily go with England, and that she is still under the dominion of ideas that ought to have been exploded after the events of 1870-71. Evidently she continues to hold to the notion that she is yet to have a great part in the Levant, whereas she is beneath Italy in that quarter, besides being below Italy as a naval power, speaking generally. Her sole chance of being influential in the East must come from her close alliance with England, which country has so deep an interest in the state of Egypt that she must proceed with equal caution and courage in preventing that country from coming under the dominion of any other nation, or under the control of any alliance of which England herself shall not be the principal member. —Boston Traveller.

MISCELLANEOUS.

ARABI'S NAPOLEONIC AMBITION.

Arabi Pasha recently gave orders to have the life of Napoleon I. translated into Arabic, saying to his friends: "Napoleon is my model. I will do what he did—nay, I will do more. I will found an Arabian Empire." He has also tried to play the role of prophet by frequently quoting the Koran, and professing to have familiar interviews with the ghost of Mahomet. One day, a month ago, while on his way to the mosque, he suddenly stopped and stared wildly at the air, as if seeing a vision. Then he stamped upon the ground and cried out that a gun was buried underneath the spot. Excavations were afterward made, and surely enough, a gun was found at a depth of several feet.

Ulema is a word that frequently occurs in the dispatches from Egypt. The New York Mail and Express says that it is the plural of the Arabic word "alim," a learned man. "Ulima" is the collective name of the body of learned men in Turkey. In a general sense, "ulema" are persons who are learned in both law and divinity. They constitute a distinct body in Constantinople, whose function it is to watch over the correct interpretation of the Koran and the right application of its teachings to law and polity. The head of the ulema is the grand mufti or Sheikh-ul-Islam; next to him come the Kaziaskiers, of whom there is one for Egypt and one for Asia; the third class are the Mollahs, the Superior Judges of the common Muftis. The Kaziaskiers have a voice and vote in the Divan, and all Cadis are appointed by and subject to them.

One may sometimes hear from the lips of a discontented Arab peasant in Lower Egypt the remark that he is being "trampled upon like a man at the Dosch." This comparison would come home with peculiar force to any good Mohammedan in Cairo or Alexandria, to whom the strange ceremony is quite a familiar spectacle. At the close of the great religious festivals of the Moslem year a number of Arabs are seen to detach themselves from the crowd and to lie down side by side in the dust, face downward, like logs upon a "corduroy" road, while their friends crowding around them press down an arm here and a limb here, in order to make this living pavement as compact as possible. When all is ready, the crowd falls back, while a horseman, coming up from behind, passes at a quick walk over the prostrate bodies. This is called the Dosch or "trampling." Each man receives the full pressure of the iron-shod hoof in the small of his back, and not a few may be seen to writhe under it like crushed worms. The moment this horrible pageant is over the friends and relatives of the trampled men rush up to them and do their utmost to make it appear that they have sustained no injury from the pressure. This odious farce, however, is always unsuccessful, the groans and writhings of the sufferers being a very sufficient evidence to the contrary. The whole spectacle is revolting in the extreme, but deserves attention as a striking proof of the lengths to which superstition and fanaticism can go even in an age of highly developed civilization.

THE LORD IS COMING.

The light of his coming is dashing afar.
The rising and glory of Bethlehem's star;
The heavens reseek a blot no longer from night,
Descending, encompassed with seraphim bright.

He comes! he, he comes for the harvest of earth—
The gems of crown bright jewels of worth;
And the mantle of death is folded away,
And the faithful of ages are born in a day.

Behold the despised and crucified One,
Once led to the cross, now ascending the throne!
And the kings of the earth cast their crowns at his feet,
And the hosts of the heavens his praises repeat.

Rejoice! O ye faithful! the stirring of years
Has hastened his coming to dry up your tears;
The waste fields of Eden again are restored—
The kingdoms of Jesus—rejoice in the Lord!

A GOLDEN WEDDING.

THE FIFTIETH ANNIVERSARY;
OR,
GOLDEN WEDDING,
OF
DR. R. AND MRS. E. S. WILLARD,
At Home,
TUESDAY, JUNE 27th, 1882.
Holly Farm. Haddonfield, N. J.
1832-1882.

Thus read the card sent out to some of our friends, both far and near; and the day proved an occasion of great interest to us all. Some forty of our friend did us the honor of their presence most of the day, and many letters of "regret" filled our hearts with melting gratitude and wonder, that such words could be spoken to us, even us. Golden baskets filled with fragrant flowers, and flowers in pyramids were sent in early in the morning, filling the rooms with their perfumes, while a heavenly peace seemed to intermingle.

Nearing the noon-day, when the tide of blessing was approaching its flood, the attention of all was arrested by the alighting of a venerable-looking gentleman from our carriage, with valise in hand. Can this be Brother Cook? asked I, as our son conducted him up the front walk. In a few moments more the stranger was announced to the friends on the verandah, as Elder J. B. Cook, of Brooklyn, New York. Only those who have felt the same can realize what we then enjoyed.

Elder Cook baptized us in the Ohio River near fifty years ago, and we sat under his his ministry both in Cincinnati and Covington, in those early years, and now he stands before us in the name of his Master to grace our "golden wedding," in the gracious words that flowed from his lips. What could be more appropriate?

Most sincerely yours,
R. AND E. S. WILLARD.

A GOLDEN WEDDING.

The family, neighbors, and many friends of R. Willard, M. D., and Mrs. E. S. Willard gathered at their hospitable residence, Haddonfield, N. J., to give a becoming recognition to the 50th anniversary of their married life—to own the Lord's loving care over them—to recall the abounding blessings dispensed by them to many; and "the riches of grace" awaiting them in the kingdom, and so near!

After the usual greetings, the table was spread, (beautifully adorned with flowers, interspersed with appropriate drapery, and laden with the bounties of this charmingly fertile region—seldom if ever surpassed in rural loveliness and agricultural promise,) and the festal occasion was enjoyed, as under the smile of God. Thence a call was made for "that meat which endureth unto everlasting life."

The occasion suggested the subject of marriage and its relations to human happiness. The Giver of all good saw the new-created man, and said, "It is not good that man should be alone." An help-meet was made for him—brought to him—and their marriage union availed to consummate the bliss of their "Eden home." Thus was marriage honored and made honorable from the beginning! Gen. ii. 18-24; Mal. ii. 15; Eph. iii. 15; Heb. xiii. 1-4.

Again, as we look into the opening glories of the future, we see that the marriage relation has been employed as the only proper portrayal of the royal union of Christ with his Bride—the Church! Eph. v. 32; Rev. xix. 7-9. This festal scene reflects its honor on the present occasion. It is to be the crowning event of all that is known of nuptial blessedness. It will be the "golden wedding" of "the Golden-Age-to-come!" Hence it is sketched in the loving terms of wedded joy, and known as "the marriage of the Lamb."

Between these two extremes—Paradise lost, and Paradise regained—our Heavenly Father in his tenderest appeal to the hearts of Israel, said, "I was an husband unto them!" This was the strongest term to express his affectionate care over them. Thence on, through the New Testament, we have the highest and holiest affections and relations, expressed and centered in him, "of whom all fatherhood—(the whole family) in heaven and earth is named." Eph. iii. 15.

But I forbear to expatiate on our relations to the Divine family. "He that sanctifieth, and they that are sanctified are all of One (Father), hence Jesus is not ashamed to call them brethren." Heb. ii. 5-14.

It is a grand thing to be a Christian, "renewed into the image of him who made" man. Of old, "faith" prompted Israel to come into ancestral line of the promised Messiah: but under the gospel it prompts to "seek a godly seed." Mal. ii. 15. Supreme devotion to dust, though golden, is but the old idolatry that cleaves "to the creature, rather than the Creator." Rom. i. 20-25.

The immortal portion, in the Messianic ancestry of old, and the corresponding participation in the Messianic destiny of "the first-born" embody the loftiest aim to which a creature should aspire. It assures a place at "the marriage supper of the Lamb," a portion in the golden paved Jerusalem, and an everlasting inheritance in "glory, honor, and immortality,"—with the plenitude and amplitude of "all blessing blessed!" Amen.

[To the above we add, by way of supplement, the following abbreviated account of this golden wedding of Brother and Sister Willard taken from the Public Spirit, a paper published at Haddonfield, N. J., near where our brother and sister reside. It would have given us the greatest pleasure if this notable anniversary had occurred while we were visiting them on our recent tour East. There are very many of our subscribers who have become acquainted with the venerable couple in days gone by who will rejoice to learn that God has spared them to celebrate the fiftieth anniversary of their wedding day. We formed personal acquaintance with our beloved brother and sister more than forty years ago. In days gone by they aided us much in our humble ministry, and we write REGRETS that we could not have been present. May the divine blessings crown their last days.]

THE GOLDEN WEDDING: OR, FIFTIETH ANNIVERSARY OF THE MARRIAGE OF DR. R. AND MRS. E. S. WILLARD, AT HOLLY FARM, HADDONFIELD, NEW JERSEY.

A rare treat was afforded the friends of Dr. R. and Mrs. E. S. Willard on Tuesday last in the very successful celebration of their Golden Wedding. Friends to a large number were received and entertained during the entire day, which could not have been more bright, and agreeable to the comfort of the guests. The residence being so surrounded with large verandas, trees and walks, was admirably adapted to the occasion and made doubly attractive by shining new paint and the fragrance and beauty of roses and woodbine, besides the many beautiful contributions of cut flowers and bouquets so handsomely accompanying the congratulations of nearer neighbors and friends. Presents, showing good taste and most affectionate friendship, gave continual pleasure, as each hour of the day showed some new addition to the greatly admired and handsome collection. Friends from a distance indulged freely in gold coins. Some sending checks for amounts too large to mail in coin.

Commencing with the fact that Dr. Willard is now in his eighty-eighth year, the mind will have to go back to the earliest times of the present great United States, and from 1822 to 1825, we find Dr. Willard, after erecting his own first building, reading medicine in St. Charles, then the seat of Government of Missouri. After three years reading, the Doctor was ready in 1825 for both practice and adventure, and he accordingly joined a large caravan to go through the unbroken wilderness west to Mexico. His learning the Spanish language and the immense practice he soon entered made him notable the country over inasmuch as he was called to the family of the Governor, and no price was too great in consideration of his professional services in so much that the Doctor was greatly put about to safely care for his money. A daily diary which he still has, afforded him the pleasure of being the first careful writer of the People and Country of Mexico, printed in 1828 in serial publications of The American Quarterly Review; then edited by Timothy Flint. A copy of the publication is still extant in this county. After three years remarkable success in Mexico, the Doctor wishing to settle in life among his own people returned by way of Matamoras to New Orleans and thence to Cincinnati. First making his parents comfortable in life, he bought a partnership in a large drug house in Cincinnati, practicing as a physician and surgeon at the same time. An item of his drug business is one purchase of castor oil, $500, and the first cargo of 30 barrels of petroleum ever collected in the United States by Indians with blankets from the surface of water.

During one summer there the Doctor entertained the famous general Arista and family, who was banished from Mexico by General Santa Anna. Arista afterward returning and becoming president of Mexico. At this time the Doctor became acquainted with Miss E. S. Borland, whose family then contained a young man who is now the great Professor Gross, of Philadelphia. After marriage to this lady in 1832, the Doctor bought the farm land on which now stands the city of Covington, Ky., and laying out the streets, started the city by building a large residence and school.

His next move was to the Indian village of Oswego, where he made a settlement and started large enterprises on the Tippecanoe river, building here his third large residence, beside four mills and a Baptist church. The Pittsburgh, Ft. Wayne & Chicago Railroad then piercing the great West, the Doctor removed with his family seven miles, to the town of Warsaw, now become a city. Here he practiced six years, was elected by the State Medical Society a delegate to the United States Medical Convention at Washington, and became known as a surgeon and a medical lecturer. At Warsaw he built his fourth large residence and its surrounding improvements. In 1860 Dr. Willard, on account of health, removed to Hammonton, N. J., and built the place on Willard's Hill called Summit Grove Seminary and now known as "The Sanitarium," conducted by Miss S. S. Nivison, M. D., of New York. This beautiful residence, being in a large woods and on the highest point between the Atlantic and Philadelphia, became quite a resort; but the war called off the professors and two of the Doctor's three sons, and thus broke up the school. At this place Mrs. E. S. Willard edited a synopsis of her life called "The Story of Grace," which was mostly published in a weekly paper of Boston, and when all ready for the press, and paid for, was burned in the great Boston fire. This being the greatest of many writings which have been published for Mrs. Willard during many years of authorship. In 1867 the Doctor again moved his family and bought the present beautiful residence called Holly Farm, where he has retired to old age from a life notable for great personal enterprise and liberal public spirit. During a residence of sixteen years on Holly Farm, good health, a contented mind and, home religion, have brightened life's setting sun, and the Doctor's silvered beard seems an emblem of purity and peace, while his companion, as she appeared at the golden wedding clothed in "linen, pure and white," seemed to us as angelic purity, of whom it might be said, a hoary head found in the way of righteousness is a "Crown of Glory."

Missing.

JULIA M. THAYER.

Late at night I saw the Shepherd
Twilling slow along the hill,
Though the flock below were gathered
In the fold so warm and still.

Just one tender lamb was missing
When he called them all by name;
While the others heard and followed,
This one only never came.

Off his notes rang through the darkness
Of that long, long night of pain;
Oft we vainly paused to listen
For an answering tone again.

Far away the truant sleeping
By the chasm of despair,
Lay unconscious of its danger,
Shivering in the mountain air.

But at last the Shepherd found it,
Found it ere in sleep it died,
Took it to his loving bosom,
And his soul was satisfied.

Then I saw the Eastern spaces
Part before a shining throng,
And the golden dome of morning
Roused all shattered into song.

Dishonest Men Value Honesty.

A young man came one day with a case of conscience. He was corresponding clerk in a flourishing house of business. His employers had begun to direct him to write letters to customers containing statements which he and they knew to be false. He had objected, and they said, "We are responsible for these statements; it is nothing to you whether they are true or false." I said to him, "Do they sign the letters, or ask you to write them in your own name?" As soon as the question had left my lips, I saw that, if there were a difference, both would be wrong; and I hastened to tell him so. He said, "I have to sign them with my name, pro. Messrs. Blank." I said, "Your case is perfectly clear; you must decline to do it." He said, "Then I shall be dismissed;" and after a pause, "I have a wife and family." I replied, "My dear friend, this is a trial of faith and principle; you must do right and trust to God to take care of you and your family." I met him some days after. "Well, Mr. ——," said I, "how are you getting on?" He replied, "I am still in my situation; I had an interview with the partners, and told them I could not write letters I knew to be untrue. They were very angry, and I expected to receive notice, but I have not received it yet." Months passed, and he remained in his situation. After a while he called on me, and I saw in his face something had happened. "Well, Mr. ——," I said, "have you had your dismissal?" "No," he said, "I have not," and smiled. "What then?" "A very confidential post in their service, with a higher salary, has fallen vacant, and they have put me into it!" On second thoughts these unprincipled men had come to the conclusion that a clerk who would not deceive a customer would not deceive them, and was too valuable to be lost.—Dulcith.

Galilee.

You have ridden through Galilee? You have seen the city of Nazareth, and the site of Magdala, Gerasa and Capernaum? You have been on the spot of the marriage feast? You have stood on the slope from which he preached the sermon on the mount? Is Cana known? Where is Capernaum? Has the spot been identified, and what kind of a place is it now?" Such questions break in cataracts on every pilgrim from the Holy Land. Jerusalem may have a deeper and sterner interest for a Christian Frank than any place in Galilee; yet Galilee is properly the country of our Lord. Here his early life was spent; here his chief companions lived; here his most important words were spoken, and his most important works done. The whole province of Galilee was called the country of our Lord. Whence comes this name of Galilee, so closely connected with the sacred history, and so closely sounding in all Christian ears? It is not sacred to a Jew, nor sweetly sounding in a Jewish ear! The first name under which we know the country is Galilhaggoyim—land of the heathen. In the midst of Israel a Gentile people clung to the soil, and could not be expelled by fire or sword. They were a remnant of the ancient dwellers, but a hardy and unconquerable remnant, occupying the stony hills and thickets, much as the Druses cling to the hillsides in Lebanon and the Waldenses to the valleys of Piedmont. Joshua ravaged their towns, Solomon tossed them as a fee to Hiram; but the leader of Israel and the king of Tyre were equally baffled by the passive tenacity and endurance of these ancient tribes. In the language of Jewish scribes, the country remained a land of strangers and heathens—Galilee of the Gentiles. Many Hebrews lived in this heathen province, but the high priests looked on such Hebrews as low rabble who were not unwilling to live among strangers for the sake of gain. The feeling was not unlike that which English country squires used to express for people who sought their bread and salt in Van Diesman's Land or Botany Bay. Galilee never ceased to be a term of reproach. To be called a Galilean in the court of Annas Caiphas was to be called a rogue and churl. Josephus frequently speaks of the Galileans as brigands. Hence the saying of a strict Jew like Nathaniel, "Can any good thing come out of Nazareth?" Hence the opprobrium attaching in minds of strict metropolitan Jews to such epithets as Jesus of Nazareth and Jesus the Nazarene.—Hepworth Dixon.

Letters to a Son.—No. 1.

My Dear Son:

You can be at no loss to understand my motive in addressing you upon the subject of religion. You might rather have a difficulty in discovering my motive for not having done so long ere now. I had a good reason, so long as you were under age, for not urging upon you a profession of religion, because of your doing so merely out of respect to my authority. Yet if you had done so of your own free will, it would have given me very great pleasure indeed, although it would not have absolved me from writing to you on the subject of religion, but would have materially affected the point of view from which I should have to address you. But now, as you are come of age, and have to act for yourself, and as you have not yet taken upon yourself a profession of religion, but seem rather to be undecided or indifferent, I feel called upon to address you on the importance and necessity of your becoming a decidedly religious young man.

Do not for a moment suppose, however, that I have to find fault with your general conduct, as your training and education here in a measure anticipated much that religion is supposed to do for a man. You have been trained to habits of industry and of obedience to your superiors, and have been inured to labor and to a sense of independence and freedom of thought and action, such as few families beyond our own country can boast of.

From these considerations, I trust you will not look upon my present writing as any interference with your freedom, or that it is in the least degree uncalled for in your present circumstances.

If I were to recommend you, my son, to join a Life Insurance Association, I would forward you a prospectus, reports, tables, etc., and point out to you the advantages you would thereby derive. Such is the course I shall pursue in recommending to you the subject of religion—the only difference being that you already have in your possession all the documents I shall have occasion to refer to. My aim in writing to you is to induce such earnest attention to these documents as shall result in an early and proper decision upon a matter so important.

At the outset, you might feel disposed to ask, What is Religion? Such a question is susceptible of various answers, according to different aspects and relations. Take one from James: "Pure religion and undefiled before God and the Father is this, to visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction, and to keep himself unspotted from the world." James i. 27. This is true religion in its effects, as regards benevolence towards others, and purity in ourselves; and if these effects do not follow a profession of religion, that religion is vain. But religion has another aspect—that which is God-ward—godliness, faith, spirituality. "He that cometh to God must believe that he is, and that he is the rewarder of them that diligently seek him." The religion of Jesus seeks to place man in the true spiritual relation to God; that is, to be united to God, have an abiding consciousness of the friendship of God, and of being his friend; having a regard to his will above everything else beside. The Bible has for its object the developing in man this spirituality, this godliness:—in short, to make a man a "man of God."

In directing your attention to the study of the Bible for this purpose, I shall present you with a brief outline of the manner in which I intend to pursue the subject:

1. Objections against such as your father presuming to understand or teach Bible truth without a classical education.

2. Objections against the credibility of the Bible as a revelation from God.

3. What has God revealed?

The objection I have placed first, is simply that a man cannot understand the Bible without a knowledge of the languages from which it has been translated; for if a man can understand anything and has a general aptitude for teaching, he is qualified to teach what he understands. A man may be capable of understanding a subject, who has no aptitude for teaching; and one's aptitude for teaching is not affected by his ignorance of a subject, though his understanding is. And a man may be ignorant of Hebrew and Greek, and yet be a fair English scholar; and if he cannot understand the Bible, and therefore cannot teach it, it cannot be his ignorance, but the translation that is to blame. So this objection resolves itself into a demand for a better version of the Bible.

Paul seemed to entertain a very high idea of the efficiency of the Scriptures, when he declared they "are able to make us wise unto salvation, through faith which is in Christ Jesus." And again: "All Scripture given by inspiration of God is profitable for doctrine (that is, teaching), for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness; that the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works." This commendation of the apostles covers a great deal of ground—first to make wise unto salvation, then to make perfect. Further, the apostle speaks of the Scriptures as a safeguard against the evils to which the disciples are exposed. "But evil men and seducers shall wax worse and worse, deceiving and being deceived. But continue thou in the things which thou hast learned and hast been assured of, knowing of whom thou hast learned them, and that from a child thou hast known the Holy Scriptures." 2 Tim. iii. 13-15. Again, in Heb. v. 12, he says: "For when for the time ye ought to be teachers." Was this expectation based on any literary advantage they possessed, or on the simple fact that they had in their possession the Holy Scriptures? And remember that these were the Old Testament, and in most cases a translation from Hebrew into Greek, and thus liable to the same objection as our own English version. In point of fact, it is a Jewish objection to Jesus and his apostles that they usually quote from the Septuagint.

In exposing such straw some cod-

ation of the Scriptures, the apostle laid himself open to the same objection in his day; but it would have no more force than it has now. If learning were any guarantee for understanding the Bible in any age, surely we might expect that the highly learned men of our day should be of one mind in their understanding of the Scriptures. But nothing is further from the fact. And how inconsistent is it to tell me, that because I am unlearned, I cannot understand the Book, and in the same breath to say to the learned man, "You are qualified; but if you make any discoveries not to be found in the creed, you will be treated as a heretic!" Such a manifestation or human folly is only equalled by the bold decree of the recent Œcumenical Council—that learning and intellect can do nothing to discover the truth; and hence the necessity of the Pope's infallibility to determine the truth as to faith and morals.

Believe me, my son, that the word of God is intelligible, and be not deterred from investigating for yourself, from any fear of your not being able to understand—aye, to understand infallibly—what God has revealed. I do not see any more difficulty in ascertaining the ideas of Jesus and his apostles, than in apprehending those of any who have written since their day. I would rather expect that the former would be the more intelligible, for they professed to speak and write for the great mass of the people, and that on a subject of the utmost importance to their highest welfare; and no one disputes their intelligence and ability to express what they desired to communicate.

Thus far, then, in regard to the instrument from which I am to draw my arguments for your becoming a truly religious young man. I might say a great deal more on the point I have considered, but it may be resumed at a later stage of my communications to you. In my next, I shall offer a few suggestions in regard to the credibility of the Bible, and the evidence of its being a revelation from God.

Accept, my dear son, my best wishes for your welfare, and believe that your good is the constant prayer of your affectionate father.—Alex. D. Black, in Messenger of the Gospel.

INQUIRY AND REVOLUTION.

It was announced at the latest anniversary soiree of Mr. Macrae's church in Dundee, Scotland, composed chiefly of seceders from the communion he once belonged to, that the membership had already risen to 1,800, and that financially everything was prosperous with the young congregation standing out there and alone in its courageous independence. Only two years ago, or a little more, their pastor, then located in the west of the country, had been expelled from the U. P. fellowship, because of his unbelief in eternal penal misery, and the above facts are a protest against the high-handed synodical decree, which unlike some creeds requires no explanation. The heroic preacher now enjoys the liberty won by his devotion to truth, as these words from his address at the social entertainment so clearly indicate:

"It was with unspeakable comfort," he said, "to be free—free to think, free to speak, free to reject what is false, though it be taught in the Confession of Faith, free to welcome the truth, and to welcome it honestly, though it be not taught in the Confession or may contradict its teaching and the dogmas and notions of bygone ages."

Mr. Macrae, like one emancipated, sympathetically desires that all, bound as he and his auditors once were bound, may have deliverance from ecclesiastical fetters and frowns: "The churches would he hoped, by and by, share the freedom of thought and liberty of conscience to which they were meantime driving out their heretics. Never was (theological liberty more needed than at present." Speaking of the age, and its theological revolutions he said: "This age was an age of inquiry, when all things are to be tried as by fire. Already many things that the churches denounce as heresies in the past are proving themselves to be living truth. With things as they still are, an age of inquiry means also an age of revolution; and in the days before us short shrift is likely to be given to things, however venerable, out of which the life and honesty and usefulness have gone."

Few can doubt but that this prophesy will be made good, and as a consequence God will be seen as a God of love, and men will no longer be in slavish terror of his Majesty, nor of their associate in communion, nor of those whom they have suffered to become their ecclesiastical superiors.

WHAT ARE THE FACTS?

I am always pleased to receive information (?). I thought the Savior's first coming took place at his birth and not at the beginning of his public ministry and manifestation as Brother Cook infers! I thought when I came to a house my coming was a thing of the past although I was not manifested at the time to all in the house. But, although I am pleased to hear the opinions of others who differ with me, yet I shall beg to be excused from accepting what is to me, so untenable a theory. If the Savior's first coming took place at his birth, then the paragraph numbered 1 is not relevant to the question because the public demonstration occurred after that event had taken place and not in connection with it.

By the same parity of reasoning as is used in the paragraph numbered 2, it could be shown that the resurrection of all the dead takes place at the same time (John v. 28, 29), and yet we know they are at least a thousand years apart. With this fact before us, would it be at all strange then if events that are heralds of their manifestation rather than the coming and rapture, together with that manifestation, should be spoken of as occurring at the same time with the coming, when in fact we know there is a short space between? "Behold, I come as a thief," denotes stealth and silence. "Two shall be in the field, one shall be taken and the other left" denotes the same quietness. Then how harmonize these conflicting statements? By "rightly dividing the word of truth." The quietness at his coming—the demonstration at this manifestation. I am doing just what our brother says should be done—heralding the coming as revealed, and am not suppressing their revelation but placing it in its chronological order.

PROGRESS OF MOHAMMEDANISM.

The growth of Mohammedanism in Africa and India has been very great during this century. The Arabian missionaries of that theistic faith are the most indefatigable workers. They are rapidly converting the Pagan tribes of the "Dark Continent," and Mohammedanism is spreading far in the interior, while Abyssinia is about the only African country not penetrated by it. There are nearly 50,000,000 Mohammedans in British India, and there is every probability that the nearly 200,000,000 of population will ultimately be largely converted to that faith, which seems to be more attractive to the Indian mind than the hopeless dogmas of Buddhism and Brahmanism. In North Africa and Arabia the Mohammedans can be stirred up to the wildest fanaticism, but it is exceedingly doubtful if a proclamation of the "Fehad" or Holy War by the sheikh Ul Islam, the great religious official at Constantinople, would have any effect on Arabian churchmen, who by a large majority belong to the Sunnite sect of the Mohammedan Church, and do not recognize the Ottoman Turk as the rightful heir to the Caliphate, the nearest descendant of the Prophet residing at Mecca and being regarded as the rightful heir. Selim I., three centuries ago, conquered the sacred dignity of the Caliphate by the sword from the Abassside Princes, but the sword of the House of Othman is no longer feared in the East. If the Arabian Mohammedans of Arabia and North Africa rise against England, they will do so without reference to the orders of Abdul Hamid. They respect the Porte less than ever since the Russo-Turkish war, which stripped Turkey of 71,000 square miles of territory and humbled her before the world.

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

The fourth annual Conference of the Church of God, of Western North Carolina, will meet at Concord Church on Cane Creek, Buncombe County, North Carolina, on Friday, September 1, 1882, at 2 o'clock p. m., and continue over Sunday. All are invited and especially preaching brethren. Those coming by railroad will stop at Asheville Junction, and if they will write to Brother E. M. Anderson, Arden P. O., Buncombe Co., North Carolina, they will be met at the depot with conveyance to take them to the place of meeting.

DESPONDENCY.

Sometimes there comes within the life,
This else sacred life of ours,
So much of loss and pain and strife,
That out and over, with tear drops rife,
Look up and see no flowers.

A sudden sorrow clouds the day
And the tired heart grows faint,
For strength and courage die away,
And life that have been first to pray,
Can only make complaint.

And life becomes at such a time
An unattractive thing;
There is no sound of cheery chime,
The days move on in dreary rhyme,
And bring no heart to sing.

If such a time should come to thee—
And somewhere in the years
For everyone its pain will be—
Do not despair, but try to see
Some sunshine through the tears.

And know that he whom sorrow teach
Receives a gift from heaven,
His tenderness some hearts may reach,
To whom the glad in vain might preach,
And joy through him is given.

Oh, then, be thou a comforter
To some so sad that, there:
And while thou thus dost minister,
Strange lilies in thine own heart shall stir,
And grief forgotten be

ISRAEL'S PROMISED FUTURE.--No. 8.

Arise, walk through the land in the length of it and in the breadth of it, for I will give it unto thee. Gen. xiii. 17.

God's sovereign choice of the house of Israel to be to him a peculiar people, though through their own unfaithfulness they have been a most afflicted people, while it is one of the most wonderful mysteries, is at the same time, one of the most indispensable features in the whole scheme of his government of this world.

The covenants of God with the fathers of the house of Israel, overflowing both with material and spiritual blessings, are the sure foundation on which rests the hope, not of Israel only, but of all the families of the earth, of salvation. In thy seed, God said to Abraham, shall all the families of the earth be blessed. The promise of God, afterward ratified by successive covenants, though not fulfilled in the past, he will certainly fulfill in a day near at hand.

It is from behind the uplifted veil of these covenants, uplifted not by mortal hands, that the Christ of God, the Savior of man, personally appeared to the house of Israel once, and will appear again, to set up his millennial reign on this very earth.

These covenants are God's key to those prophecies concerning the future national glory of the house of Israel with which the sacred pages everywhere abound, on which they rest as their proper basis, and to which they look as the proper pledge of their fulfilment. The words with which God by the mouth of his holy prophets almost uniformly closes these prophecies, are to the effect that even in the latter days, God will not forget the covenants which he made with them. Thus does these prophecies concerning Israel's final re-establishment and happiness everywhere lean for their final support upon God's covenants with his friend and servant Abraham, and everywhere beam with their hallowed light.

Far away in the Orient, beyond the ocean, and between those pleasant Eastern seas, where for the most part, flowers ever blossom, and beams ever shine, there lieth a goodly land; a land of wheat and barley, and vines, and figtrees, and pomegranates, and olives, oil and honey; a land of brooks of water, of fountains and depths that spring out of valleys and hills; a land flowing with milk from its cattle on thousands of hills, and with honey from its forests and thyme shrubs of wonderful configuration, embracing within its narrow range, scarcely larger than that of Wales, or the little State of Maryland, the natural features of almost every country in the world; a land which, for the delights of its climate, the fruits of its soil, and its central situation, military and commercial, between the North and South, the East and West, has ever been the coveted prize of kings of the East, in the time of the Assyrian and the Egyptian, the Persian and the Greek, the Roman and the Saracen, for which they have never ceased to strive, even with an ardor not less impatient than that with which the vast hordes they have so often led to its invasion, have sighed for the unfrequented palm groves it-landed in the wild wastes of the deserts of red and yellow sand that skirt its Southern and Eastern borders; a land upon whose iron earth and beneath whose brazen skies there hath rested these many centuries, one of the most fearful and desolating curses ever inflicted by an angry heaven on guilty people; and yet a land whose forests and hills in the millennial period, when war shall be abolished forever and ever, and will flow with milk and honey again, and its pastures be clothed with flocks, and its valleys be covered with corn, and its old foundations, and fallen walls, and crumbling terraces, and broken cisterns, and ruined presses, and deserted folds, proclaiming with their mute and eloquence, the fertility, and opulence, and populousness of its ancient past, be built again; for the sure word of prophecy everywhere proclaims that in those better days to come, even in the latter days, the consecrated land will be restored to more than its pristine beauty, and greater than its ancient glory.

Such is the Fatherland, the Divinely covenanted inheritance, not of the two tribes of Judah and Benjamin only, who alone returned from the Babylonian captivity, but of the twelve tribes of the covenant, given to the house of Israel, as an inalienable inheritance and everlasting possession, in all their tribes and generations, notwithstanding any temporary periods of dispossession or the length of their duration; to which, therefore, they will according to present intimation and existing facts, before long return, to re-inhabit it, in organic unity, as God's peculiar people. His ancient and sacred nation, after these dreary centuries of Gentile servitude, exile and persecution are ended shall exercise therein all the functions of a distinct and recognized nationality as completely as ever before, or as ever any other nation.

Such is the land of which alone of all lands, it can, at all periods of its history, be truly said that its hopes are richer than the memories, growing ever richer still. Such is the land, the future glory of whose ancient capital has been the burden of so many of the saddest, but sweeter strains of the prophetic bards of Israel, whose walls though now a desolation, are to be built again; and when rebuilt, will lift their sacred watch-towers to the skies, around the "City of the Great King," the destined metropolis of the millennial earth.

How wonderful in its antiquity, this wonderful nation! Other nations, as for instance, the four great empires of the Gentile past, those symbolized by the four parts into which the glorious but terrible image of the second chapter of Daniel is divided, and by the four wild beasts which the seventh chapter of the same book describes—symbols which, for some reason, so many interpreters find it convenient, in these modern times, to quietly ignore, namely, the Babylonian, Persian, Greek and Roman, are, in the parlance of scholars, by a sort of classical courtesy, styled ancient. But what is the antiquity of the most ancient of these compared with the antiquity of the Jewish nation? They have passed before our eyes, in quick succession, in the stereoscope of history, leaving scarcely the ashes even of their fires behind them. They have fought their last battle, and sleep their last sleep beneath the ever gathering dust of the ages, never to be quickened into life, never awake to earth's glory again. But the Jewish nation, in respect to its organic structure and outward forms, broken and scattered, still lives. Trace back the history of these Gentile empires, till it is lost in its obscurist mists of tradition. Even then were the Jews an ancient nation. The Hebrew commonwealth had shone in the fulness, yea in the fulness of its majestic proportions, and the Hebrew language, in the fullest purity it ever attained, had recorded the acts of its founders and its kings ages before. This ancient nation, which certainly has not passed the matured manhood of its power now, though its power be now as yet a scattered power, had, for centuries flourished in ripened manhood before the proud name of the great Babylonian Monarch ever shook with terror a single Eastern heart, as the records of its achievements and the productions of its greatest minds everywhere affirm. Some of the loftiest intellects of ancient Babylon, even when it shone in its highest glory, as, for instance, Daniel and Ezekiel, were Jews of by no means an early generation, or early period of the Jewish monarchy.

The empire of Babylon reached the height of its greatness some twenty-four hundred years ago, or some six hundred before the commencement of the Christian era, and yet, though mistress of almost the entire then known earth, some four hundred years before, or about a thousand years before the commencement of the Christian era, the Hebrew Theocracy was in full meridian of its splendor, and its dominions scarcely less extensive than those of the Babylonian monarch four centuries later. The comparative material splendor of these two dynasties is, perhaps, a not unfair exponent of their comparative antiquity. The temple of Belus, at Babylon, the palace of its king, and the hanging gardens of its queen, were far outshone by the Temple at Jerusalem, planned by the Great Architect of the heavens, and reared by Israel's stateliest king four centuries before.

Again, Nebuchadnezzar founded his own capital and empire, reducing as he did, for the first time in Assyrian history, all the countries that at various times had been subdued by the Assyrian arms into one united, compact, and homogeneous government, obedient throughout all the ancient Assyrian borders, as well as the now more widely extended borders of his own immediate kingdom, to the same sovereign and autocratic will and the same golden head; thus introducing, in his kingly person, in all its august and golden fulness, the first great universal Gentile empire, the opening era of Gentile supremacy upon the earth, the "Times of the Gentiles," and of treading down evermore of the tribes of the house of Israel, "until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled."—Daniel and Luke. Is not this great Babylon which I have built for the house (that is the metropolitan seat) of my kingdom (that is, of this great Assyrian empire, now subject unto me alone) by the might of my power, and for the honor of my majesty? "the words just proceeded out of his mouth," he was changed into a beast, driven among the cattle, till a certain period had elapsed, restored, when he humbled himself and acknowledged the Supreme power and absolute government of Jehovah. Dan. iv. 34–37. But David and Solomon could trace their ancestry, and that of their nation, and the constitutional policy of their government, without the slightest break, or obscurity or mist of tradition or hieroglyphic uncertainty in the record, back in the one case, to the days of Abraham, who first entered the land of Canaan more than a thousand years before they reigned; and in the other to the days of Moses, who led the children of Israel through the wilderness six hundred years before. Compare the antiquity of the Jewish nation with the American, if indeed to refer their antiquity, in any possible sense or connection, be not the purest solecism. When this continent was discovered, Palmyra, whose famous Queen was of the seed of Abraham, had been in ruins a thousand years. The first foundations of Palmyra were laid two thousand four hundred years ago, yet, even then, the Jewish monarchy was in the very plentitude of its ancient splendor and power, for it was flourishing under the scepter of King Solomon, who built Tadmor in the wilderness, the identity of which with Palmyra and Athens, and Rome, and Carthage as yet unknown and the bricks of Babylon as yet unburnt, but while also (if as some suppose, a point however, which is foreign to our theme, this continent was still an unpeopled wilderness,) the Jewish nation was then intact in their twelve tribes, when Tadmor was built, in that remote antiquity, Jerusalem was a queenly capital, and mistress of the known earth.

Verily, how short the record, how brief the career, how recent and new-born the ancestry, of every other nation in comparison with God's ancient nation, with these hoary patricians of the earth! What letters patent of nobility, of kingdom, or principedom, or earldom, in all the Gentile ages, can be compared, in the antiquity of the Hebrew date, with the covenants sealed by God with Abraham on the plains of Moreh, beneath the sacred and overhanging cliffs of Gerizim, more than four thousand years ago, covenanting unto him a posterity as innumerable as the stars of heaven, and a national existence as endless as the ages!

ALEXANDRIA.

Alexander the Great sought to found a city after the destruction of Tyre, and in 332 B. C. selected the site of Alexandria, because of its excellent position for trade. It is twelve miles west of the Western Nile, and between the Mediterranean Sea and Lake Mareotis. The city grew rapidly, and soon became the great centre of Eastern commerce. The Ptolemies succeeded Alexander, and under them the city contained 300,000 free inhabitants and as many slaves. It became the centre of learning and schools of Grecian philosophy flourished there. Magnificent monuments were erected, among them the Pharos, the Museum, and the Temple of Serapis, and there were many gorgeous palaces and public buildings.

Julius Cæsar besieged and took the city in 48 B. C.; and eighteen years later, Augustus made it an imperial city. It now began a new season of prosperity, continuing till the establishment of the seat of empire at Constantinople. The catacombs, public baths, and Pompey's Pillar, with the Roman city wall, were erected during this period. In the year 215, the Roman Emperor Caracalla visited the city and ordered a general massacre; and under the rule of Gallienus a famine swept off half of the population. In 273, an insurrection resulted in the destruction of the great library of the museum. In 296, another revolt ended in a general slaughter, and in 365, an earthquake destroyed 50 000 persons. The Persians captured the city in 616, and yielded it to the Arabs in 641. It then contained 400 palaces, 400 theatres, 4,000 public baths, and 12,000 gardens.

From this time on, it rapidly decayed, and its population and trade diminished. Cairo took its place as the chief city of Egypt. It finally sank so low that in 1777 its population was only 6,000. Since then, the city had been rebuilt and raised to importance again. It resembles an Italian city, and had large streets, well paved, lighted with gas, and abounding with fine residences. The great promenade of the Mehemet Ali or Franks Square, where the massacre of June 11 began, was the central point of the city. Railways connected the city with Cairo, 120 miles distant, and with the Suez Canal. The city was a great central station for passengers, as the steamers to and from India, the Mediterranean and the Levant all stopped there.

Among the prominent buildings were the palace of the Khedive at Ras-el-Tin, the large naval arsenal, the naval and military hospitals, the custom house, tribune of commerce, Italian college, and the various schools. The Turkish quarter was irregular, but the European quarter had many good streets and fine buildings. The city has two harbors, one east and one west of Pharos. The former has a breakwater, mole, and quays. The city was supplied with water from the Nile, and was the seat of several large government and other manufactories. The principal exports were corn, cotton, wool, gums, rice, dates, sugar, cotton seed, wheat, beans, senna, and hides. The principal imports were woolen and silk goods, hardware and machinery, with timber, coal, petroleum, drugs, and other products. In 1872, the population was 242,034, of whom 47,316 were foreigners.

Editor Restitution:

Enclosed find a "greenback" and the name of a new subscriber, a prominent dentist of Baltimore. He wishes you to send the paper to his office. He is like myself, a Methodist, that dares to think and investigate for himself. "And he followeth not us" (Mark ix. 38) is as powerless to intimidate him and me as it was to compress the great liberal heart of Jesus when importuned by the beloved disciple John, to rebuke such as were doing God's work outside of the John circle. What a rebuke is this to exclusiveness and pious puff. See Jesus answer, forbid him not.

The writer of the article—"Some Thoughts on God and his Christ"—has for the first time made me feel as though I would like to be to this dear friend, as Elihu was to Job and his would-be counsellors. Elihu to me is a grand character. What a pity his race should be so near extinct. He is not required to ask Job to pray for him, as were his three friends—Eliphas, Bildad and Zophar. God says to Job, "Where wast thou when I laid the foundations of the earth? declare if thou hast understanding. Whereupon are the foundations thereof fastened? or who laid the corner-stone thereof?" etc. I claim that these questions which the Almighty puts to Job, are as easily answered as the subject of "The blood of Jesus Christ his Son cleanseth us from all sin."

"'Tis mystery all immanuel dies,
Who can explore his strange design?
In vain the immortal Seraph tries,
To sound the depths of love divine;
'Tis mystery all let earth adore,
Let angel minds enquire no more."

That which angels are represented as not able to look into, my friend treats as a plain matter-of-fact, no more mysterious than the "removal" of J. A. Garfield. If the blood of Jesus the Christ did not fall as a blessing upon the heads of even those who said "His blood be upon us and our children" it was not because vindictiveness on the part of Jesus for this imprecation. Hear the Lamb with his expiring breath lisping a prayer for his tormentors—"Father, forgive them; they know not what they do." Again hear him—"Beginning at Jerusalem." So that I think it is plain that the Jews were not forsaken because of the part they took in his crucifixion, but because of their rejection of him as their Savior and Redeemer. My friend styles the tragedy at Calvary "The most desperate crime that was ever committed against God—an open outrage of his authority." I question the rightfulness of this position. It has ever been a mystery to me that God should adopt this method of curing the rebellion that began in Eden. No doubt he could have adopted some other way had he been pleased so to do; he evidently deliberated in the matter, he surely made no mistake, he is too wise to err. Since he has adopted the plan of subjecting the "only begotten," the sweet, meek Lamb, he in whom there was no guile to be mocked, scourged, crucified, the most fitting thing I can do is just to imitate Moses at the bush—not literally—but in awe and reverence. This it would appear is God's method of mortally wounding the serpent and recovering fallen man. "And if I be lifted up I will draw all men unto me." When Jesus said this, he knew what he was saying. Who like him can know so well how to reach the human heart, hence it is written, "We love him because he first loved us." None of the Divine attributes affect us like this one love—

"For God so loved the world,
That he only son he gave,
Whoever believeth on him,
Eternal life shall have."

I trust my dear friend and neighbor will not think hard of me if my thoughts of God and his Christ differ just a little with his thoughts as they appear in the issue of June 28—I mean only where he speaks of the blood cleansing and the manner of our Lord's death. In most other things I am with him heart and hand. I think there is danger in becoming too much absorbed in the King's matters, finite minds can explore so far and then stop. Well for us if we know just where to stop.

May the blood that speaketh better things than that of Abel, be to my friend and myself as well as to all the readers of The Restitution what the typical blood was to Israel in Egypt—when the death angel passed through the land to destroy the first-born—God's mark and means of salvation.

"Jesus thy blood, thy blood alone,
Hath power sufficient to atone;
Thy blood can make me white as snow,
No Jewish types, could cleanse me so."

Having just returned from a two weeks' preaching tour in Potter Co., Pa., near Coudersport, I thought I would write a few lines for The Restitution.

Had the privilege of attending the Michigan State Conference, and shall not forget the associations formed while there; also at Cleveland, Ohio, with the brethren and sisters there, in company with my wife. On our return home, to our disappointment we found that our beloved brother, J. B. Cook, had been in our neighborhood, and we did not see him.

After resting a few days started for Potter Co. We endeavored to the best of our ability, to preach the gospel of the kingdom, and the signs of the times; also our duty. Some few were almost persuaded, and I hope they will yet obey by putting on Christ and walking so as to be found of him in peace at his coming.

Yours in hope.

"THE RESTITUTION OF ALL THINGS WHICH GOD HATH SPOKEN BY THE MOUTH OF ALL HIS HOLY PROPHETS SINCE THE WORLD BEGAN."

VOL. XXXI. PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, AUGUST 2, 1882. NO. 29.

THE RESTITUTION.

TERMS—TWO DOLLARS PER YEAR, Payable in advance. Three and Six Months at the same rate.

Address all letters and Communications to THE RESTITUTION, Plymouth, Indiana.

TO CORRESPONDENTS:

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the christ as King of kings, and the immortalized saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also as hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

FROM ARKANSAS.

If death comes before Christ comes, (to me,) then I shall be utterly without the power to do a single good thing. I can not speak a word, write a sentence, or think a thought to God's glory. I can not do a single act, there will not be the smallest power of will, there will be no heart-throb of feeling, no thrill of sensibility, no power or possibility of influencing any person or thing on earth. Then ought not my life to be more fruitful now—when I am well and active, when heart and blood, and brain and nerves and muscles are all tributary to God's service, or capable of being so tributary? What new life, and new wisdom, and new usefulness I ought to desire and to possess!

Take it altogether (some will say) do the enjoyments and utilities of life exceed the drawbacks and burdens, the griefs and discouragements? People differ greatly in constitution and circumstances. Some are light-hearted and hopeful, some have health and wealth and friends, have happy contentment, simple tastes, and easy adjustment to circumstances, are not anxious, are not much afflicted perhaps, and have a happy natural harmony and symmetry of faculties, and ease and efficiency of physical functions, have comparatively few cares, have constitutional and characteristic restfulness, have a happy habit and purpose of looking on the bright side of things, are full of suggestions and impulses of charity and hope (an exceedingly good combination by the way.) But others are not so. They are not so happily constituted. They are too sensitive, too apprehensive. They may be really poor and unfortunate. They are deficient in hope, in health, in friendships, in comforts. They suffer losses, they endure hardships, they toil painfully, and this too, without imputing the fault of neglect, or any blamefulness that should seem to lookers on to be fairly a cause of sufferings, at least in many cases. Hence the old question comes up, "who will show us any good?" Life is a hardship and a burden.

But for all these things what a happiness to remember, there are mitigations. We are on the field of battle. We are in a life and state of trial, and those most tried may be most fortunate, if they know it. They are really chosen for some future great good. There is a God unseen who has a smiling face, smiling with the thought of intended kindness, intentioned kindness; goodness and good will, and purposed blessing, as fixed and certain as day-break and morning. And God is smiling on, unseen all the while, immutable and immovable in his determinations to bring about the greatest good and the most wonderful coming joy and delight, and in his immovableness and immutableness, with a heart as gentle and tender as a mother's, and a hand as soft and large and kind as that of the best and most benevolent being on earth—yea and more. In trials, O, beloved, think of the God who thinks of you, sees you, cares for you, and loves you. One said, "I have set the Lord always before me." A grand thing to do. Not a vengeful and austere God, but good and true and sympathising, and a fore-ordained of good things.

Therefore he is wise who sets the Lord before him, who does it even with an effort of memory, a painstaking of thought, helped by the spirit. Such a man simply sees by faith what is true, though out of sight—or invisible. The saint sees the invisible—that is his character, and course of conduct, his law of life. He sees beauty, love, brightness, kindness, immutable purpose of kindness, if he is willing to see it and earnestly seek it, which is to see and seek these things in God. David's God is a being of every excellence. Pagan gods are merely imagined giants, with faults that repel or corrupt or confuse. Their worship degrades the mind. Not so the God of Divine revelation. His grand instinct is goodness. Harshness may be a rough garment that he puts on to hide the love whose intensity is impossible to be revealed to creatures that have not the strength to bear such a revelation. We need to be thoughtful and wise, and to have that trait, that quality, that exercise, often so difficult, to-wit: patience. So cheer up, down-cast hearts, that have such burdens, such losses, such labors, such disappointments. Yes, disappointments, which is simply another word for or a word equivalent to compound words, to phrases, and whole chapters even of experience put into utterance, blasted hopes, expectations raised to be ruined, and visions to be blighted and dashed down fruitless and unfulfilled. How many hidden sufferers and sufferings! How many bravely hide their anguish! How many habitually fail, to human sight. To say that God is not looking on, that he does not know or notice, that he does not feel or care, is to say there is no God. For if there is a God he must feel and care. Now have faith. Jesus said so. Believe more and despond less. God is alive. Be bolder in faith, be bolder in asking. We ask too timidly. Remember, God, like strong men in that one thing, likes his strength tried. He loves to be leaned on. He enjoys having his word and power put to the proof. We are too faint in asking. We are not half so bold as king David. Study some of his expressions—paraphrase them and see.

Within the sphere and limits of becoming reverence, we are not half pointed and explicit enough, not daring enough in prayer. We want to frame excuses for God's refusals or non-fulfilments. We put our petitions in the shape of generalities, so constantly, that whether God answers or not, we can scarcely tell, and if he don't answer we can give some wise reason. The age and situation demand more—demand an answering God, demand the proof and experience of answers, the evidence of them, the exhibition of them, to confound cavil and to cure heart-aches. There ought to be a new era in praying. There must be more boldness, more earnestness. God, I must think, does not care to have so many excuses framed for him. He wants to be put squarely on his promise. He wants to be tested by bold and persistent asking. I believe God admires daring. He cannot love, (he may endure, or possibly pity,) weak and hesitating styles of prayer. Here is a field and occasion for wise and reverent but wonderful daring. Am I wrong? Then let some one criticise me. Let some one show me false. I am sick and weary and tired of the unfruitful praying of these days. There is some great wrong or lack, some fault that is the mother of failure. Where is Samson? Where is a strong man, strong in faith, that can pray and win, ears and obtain? We want him, the age needs him, the audacity of infidel ridicule demands a great new work and power of prayer, a man that can pray, that can ask what he will and get it.

It is no use talking. There is no rest, there can be none, till this new power is seen, till this new man appears. Let him be a prophet, let him be somebody raised from the dead, if need be, but we need him. Yet it seems to me mortifying almost, and discreditable, that we must look for the grave to yield up an old prophet, in order to find a man to head the praying world in the nineteenth century. Is there no one among the living? Christians are afraid to confess openly that nine-tenths of their prayers fail to be answered, or would be if they dared to ask outright for what they really want. They dare not ask simply, concisely, explicitly for just what they really desire, especially for fear somebody hearing them might comment on their failure to obtain. And they themselves have such doubt and misgiving about obtaining that they dare not, can not squarely ask. And, excuse me, but I do think, there is a great picture of unconsequential and ineffectual form, a great picture of faintness, and a great exhibition (shall I call it by that unflattering word?) of failure. And are we so anxious to shield the Lord himself from reproach as we are to save ourselves from the imputation of non-accomplishment? I don't know how it is in every case. But I suppose we do not know how to be as bold as we ought in prayer, because we are not bold and honest in the confession of our own failures, honest in acknowledging that we are somehow far behind and below the promises. We don't come up to them, and we don't realize and fulfil them. It is not mercy because we are such sinners—for God can save us from our sins—but because we don't come up to the measure of his power and willingness and longing to help and bless, through our everlasting and pitiful timidity.

Why don't we reason with God—if I may use such a word—and tell him what a blot on his glory it will be if he don't fulfill his word? Why don't we press our call for what we dyingly need? Why don't we wait on his action, hanging expectant with open mouth on his hand, instant in waiting and expectation? Why don't we say to him we must have this or that, which we need, or we die, are dying and will die? I don't mean we must not beware of silly petitions. But I am talking now about life things, things of the heart, things of depth and height and present necessity.

O, it is an age of weakness in prayer. We must have somewhat to answer cavilling infidels. We must have power, and proof of power, which is success. We must have answers. We must come to the help of the Lord by boldness and faith. We must feel that we are so driven into a corner, that we can reverently put the Lord in an angle of necessity to do for us to save us, and save his own word and honor. We have got to have intrepidity, and cease tapping on his door with feathers. We may have to suffer keenly to bring us up to this daring. But have we not, have you not suffered enough? How much longer do you desire to suffer? Wake up! Why David asked God to wake up, and [illegible] why he was sleeping. If we wake up enough to rap loudly at his door, if we are in dead earnest, and urgent almost to audacity, if our heart is in it, we may expect to see new things see a new day. Everything is dying for want of bold and effectual prayer. When we feel intensely that we are dying for want of God's hand we may possibly begin to see a way out of weakness and unprofitable living.

LETTER FROM ENGLAND.

Editor Restitution.

How long, unanswered, will the infidels of England hold forth, may be asked, and asked in vain. Men are not now ready to meet the sceptics as they were forty and fifty years since. Then, not only in Manchester, but in divers parts of Lancashire besides, were speakers eager to face Robert Dale Owen, and other prominent Socialists, in open discussion, night after night. But now when blasphemy is rife as never before, and infidelity rampant and defiant beyond precedent, no one seems ready to accept the challenge openly presented by the Secularist lecturers to meet them in public. So men and women of all ages are continually swelling the multitude of undisguised rejectors of the Holy Scriptures.

The Bishop of Manchester is aware of the progress of infidelity and his published sermons and speeches show his sad misgivings: but the generality of the clergy of the establishment and the dissenting ministers, with their congregations, do not appear to be alive to the fact of increasing disbelief and godlessness. The fact is indeed admitted; but without much seeming concern. Having mentioned the Bishop of Manchester, it is no more than fair to say that the Roman Catholic Bishop of Salford has like a faithful man raised his voice against the prevailing irreverence so manifest in society. He is evidently an earnest, conscientious man.

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY, Manchester Branch, 125 Grosvenor Street, All Saints'.—TOMORROW (Sunday) Mr. G. W. FOOTE, Editor of The Freethinker, LECTURES three times. Subjects: 11 a. m., "Garibaldi, Hero and Freethinker;" 3 p. m., "Was Jesus Insane?" 6:30, "God in a Box." Discussion invited. Admission 3d. and 6d.

Has not blasphemy reached a pitch when such an advertisement as this appears not only in newspapers but in big letters posted all over Manchester? From what I heard in the lecture by Symes some weeks since, I can suppose a part of Foote's second lecture. And you will me will understand that the Ark is meant by the subject for the evening. From what I witnessed when I heard Symes, I can realize the scenes without being present while Foote lectures. Cheers for the speaker, bursts of contempt and ridicule with ejaculations of excitement, wild characterize the meetings.

No person (when I heard Symes) appeared more intensely amused and delighted than a female who sat opposite to me, as the lecturer said this and that in contempt of Jesus. What a sight was that! a young woman, say a little over twenty, who, did she know the love of Christ, would herself be lovely indeed—a very picture of blasphemy! I have seen dreadful men and women in my life: but a woman rejoicing at hearing our Lord scorned, despised, and represented as vile and abominable—I desist from saying more—was an object the like which I never met before. True, as I told you in a previous letter, the great majority present were men: had it been otherwise the assembly would have appeared still more Satanic.

I think I may say that English infidels are worse than Ingersoll. He does express regard for Jesus: but the advertisement I send you shows that the Secularists here are going beyond Voltaire and Paine.

I remember seeing in The Christian some months since this observation by Brother Hastings:—"Infidels seldom attack the Sermon on the Mount." But they are vehemently attacking it now: and they tell their audiences that Jesus was an ignoramus or worse, to teach men to live in a way to cause mankind to die by wholesale and make the earth a desolate wilderness. So they talk and quote divers sayings of our Lord as the sayings of a fool and impostor: multitudes are led by them, and none confront them. For my own part I am distributing printed matter here and there in defence of the Bible: but I am not strong enough to speak in public. Shall I ever see in THE RESTITUTION or The Christian one or more articles on the Sermon on the Mount able enough to face the infidel with?

THE BUDDING FIG-TREE.

In reading Mrs. Davis' letter from Jerusalem of May 8, 1882, our heart was gladdened to that degree that only finds relief in tears of gratitude, with the bright unmistakable evidence of fulfilling prophecy that marks the end of this age. Near two thousand years ago there stood a fig-tree in the way from Bethany to Jerusalem. One morning as Jesus was going into the city, he hungered, "And seeing the tree, came to it, and found no fruit thereon, but leaves only, for the time of figs was not." He said, "Let no fruit grow on thee henceforward forever (for the age), and presently the fig-tree withered away." Now this peculiar circumstance is evidently designed to reach out beyond itself and teach us by parable the condition of the Jewish nation. Their sad dispersion and deep affliction in which they have been long cast off, because they rejected their Messiah. "He came to his own, and his own received him not." "The time of figs was not yet." "He spake also this parable; A certain man had a fig-tree planted in his vineyard; and he came and sought fruit thereon, and found none." See Luke xiii. 6-9. When the fig-tree withered away, the disciples marveled, saying, "How soon is the fig-tree withered away!" Just so the dispersion and miraculous keeping of the Jews has been a marvel to all people. The fig-tree withered under the curse, and bearing no fruit for the age, finds its counterpart most fully in the following: "And they shall fall by the edge of the sword, and shall be led away captive into all nations; and Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles, until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled." "Behold your house is left unto you desolate: and verily I say unto you, Ye shall not see me, until the time come when ye shall say, Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord."

From the foregoing testimonies we learn, first, that in consequence of blindness and hardness of heart, the Jews as a people have been scattered among all nations, having fallen by the edge of the sword. Their land has lie a-ward, and their beloved city trodden down of the Gentiles. Most all people admit this much. In the next place it is strongly inferred that this sad state shall not last always—is not final. Thank God this "until" marking their long captivity and Gentile sway, is now ending, and very soon they will behold him "that is to be ruler in Israel," and cry, "Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord."

The anti-typical fig-tree, and all the trees are now shooting forth to Jerusalem, whereby we may know that the summer is nigh at hand.

The Lord said, "Sing O daughter of Zion! Shout O Israel! be glad and rejoice with all thy heart, O daughter of Jerusalem." Zeph. iii. 14; see also Zech. ii. 10. While Mrs. Davis writes, The sun was sinking beneath the hills, while its soft rays lit up the scene, and as the voices of fifteen hundred people sang the sweet anthem of "Peace to Jerusalem," I looked upon the holy city with feeling of reverential awe that I had never before felt."

The Lord says, "Then shall the virgin rejoice in the dance, both young men and old together; for I will turn their mourning into joy, and will comfort them, and make them rejoice from their sorrow."

Again, "Thus saith the Lord; I am returned unto Zion, and will dwell in the midst of Jerusalem: and Jerusalem shall be called a city of truth; and the mountain of the Lord of hosts the holy mountain. Thus saith the Lord of hosts; there shall yet old men and old women dwell in the streets of Jerusalem, and every man with his staff in hand for very age. And the streets of the city shall be full of boys and girls playing in the streets thereof." Please read carefully Jer. xxxi. and Zech. viii.

Now let us read Mrs. Davis, narrating the beginning of the fulfilment of the foregoing prophecies.

"Beautiful young maidens with banners, old men with heads bare and bowed, as they gazed for the first time on Jerusalem. I sepia as I saw by faith the nations coming up to keep the feast of tabernacles. Everyone says, nothing like this has occurred since the crusaders. What shall we see next?"

It seems to us that the case in hand is now assuming such proportions, and the evidence of such a character that all doubts should vanish, the child of God lift up the head and rejoice, believing that redemption is nigh. Not only so but that the cavillers should forever cease their cavillings, fall in love with God's plans and learn to "pray for the peace of Jerusalem." Read Psa. cxxii. Moreover, if there be a lingering doubt in the minds of those long accustomed to human creeds, or, if the light of evidence, now looming up in the East and flashing forth to the West fails to work a deep conviction, we say, "Show pity, Lord!" Let such read again the following: "Thus saith the Lord of hosts; If it be marvellous in the eyes of the remnant of this people in these days, (such is now the case) should it also be marvellous in mine eyes? saith the Lord of hosts. Thus saith the Lord of hosts; Behold, I will save my people from the east country, and from the west country; And I will bring them, and they shall dwell in the midst of Jerusalem: and they shall be my people, and I will be their God in truth and righteousness. Hear the word of the Lord, O ye nations, and declare it in the isles afar off, and say, He that scattereth Israel will gather him, and keep him as a shepherd doth his flock. For the Lord hath redeemed Jacob, and ransomed him from the hand of him that was stronger than he. Therefore they shall come and sing in the height of Zion, and shall flow together to the goodness of the Lord, for wheat, and for wine, and for oil, and for the young of the flock and of the herd: and their soul shall be as a watered garden; and they shall not sorrow any more at all. He shall cause them that come of Jacob to take root: Israel shall blossom and bud, and fill the face of the world with fruit. And there shall be signs in the sun, and in the moon, and in the stars; and upon the earth distress of nations, with perplexity; the sea and the waves roaring; men's hearts failing them for fear, and for looking after those things which are coming on the earth: (probably cyclones) for the powers of heaven shall be shaken. And then shall they see the Son of Man coming in a cloud with power and great glory. And when these things begin to come to pass, then look up, and lift up your heads; for your redemption draweth nigh. And take heed to yourselves, lest at any time your hearts be overcharged with surfeiting (gluttony) and drunkenness, and the cares of this life, and so that day come upon you unawares. Watch ye therefore, and pray always, that ye may be accounted worthy to escape all these things that shall come to pass, and to stand before the Son of Man."

Editor Restitution:

Feeling very lonely, away from all of like faith, thought I might spend an hour agreeably and profitably, in writing to the readers of THE RESTITUTION. I have long ago lost all interest in the pleasures of the world, and nominal church, or, since I tasted of the good word of God, and received an earnest of those pleasures that are eternal and unending. My heart is sad, as I think of the great mass of nominal Christians, engrossed with the vain amusements of the world. While I am sitting by my window writing, in this little country town, the members of the Congregational church are hurrying by to a picnic, to mingle in the world's pleasures. It is but two weeks since they went there to have a strawberry festival. Do they not fill the picture drawn of Paul? "Lovers of pleasures, more than lovers of God, having a form of godliness, but denying (or rather despising) the power thereof."

Well, this should confirm our faith, that we are living in the time spoken of by Jesus, concerning the end of this age. He said, "As it was in the days of Noah, and Lot, so shall it be in the days of the coming of the Son of Man." They were eating and drinking—feasting as they are now, every few days, having kitchens and parlors built in their temples for worship—for the worship of Mammon. Jesus said, "No man can serve two masters;" but they seem to be entirely forgetful of his admonition. O, how careful, and prayerful, we should be in these days of evil, lest we be led away by the error of the wicked, either in doctrine, or practice. I tremble when I see those who have once walked so humbly before the Lord, lay aside their armor in the times of peril, and saying, "It was all flesh, and nonsense, to think we could be Christians in these Gentile times." They say, "There has been no Christians since the destruction of Jerusalem, and will not be, till Jerusalem is rebuilt, and the Spirit comes back that was withdrawn from the earth at that time."

Is that so, brethren and sisters? Have you never felt his reproving and comforting influences upon your heart and life? I think you could as easily make me believe the sun never shone in the heavens, as to make me believe that. That being true, what did Jesus mean, when he said to the Samaritan woman, "But the hour cometh, and now is, when the true worshippers shall worship the Father in spirit and in truth; for the Father seeketh such to worship him." You will see it is associated with the time when he said, "The hour cometh when ye shall neither in this mountain nor yet at Jerusalem worship the Father." If he did not have reference to the calling of the Gentiles, or the church, the body of Christ, out of all nations, I confess I cannot understand his language.

I think such persons dishonor God, and Jesus Christ, notwithstanding they have a zeal for the building up of Jerusalem, and the return of the Jews. I know that true believers are few, at the present day, and ever have been; but that only confirms the saying of Jesus, viz., "Strait is the gate, and narrow the way that leads to life, and few there be that find it." I want the truth, and all the truth, revealed for our instruction and comfort. But our faith must be tested, and our hope, and such people are calculated to try us, and drive us to the throne of grace and to our Bibles, to see whether we are built on the rock of truth. O, the Holy Scriptures! What should we do in this day of error and fables, without our chart and compass?

May the Lord help us to "search the Scriptures" diligently, both the Old and the New, and then may we enter our closets and ask God to seal instruction on our hearts and minds, and keep us from evil influences.

There are very many things transpiring to strengthen our faith in the soon coming King, and kingdom, for I am not looking for a kingdom without the King, even Jesus.

These are truly times of darkness and of peril. If the terrible cyclones, and floods, and flames, and earthquakes, and tidal waves, and famines and pestilences, and the war that is brewing in Egypt, and Ireland, are not signs of the end of this age, and of coming greater judgments when shall we have such signs?—"Signs in the sun, moon, and stars, and upon the earth distress of nations with perplexity."

Now, the admonition is, "Not to forsake the assembling of yourselves together as the manner of some is, and exhort one another, and so much the more as ye see the day approaching."

Are you who can, doing this faithfully? then think of us who are isolated, and pray earnestly for us, that we may be "kept by the power of God, through faith, unto salvation ready to be revealed in the last time." Would it not be more profitable to have more letters of exhortation, containing sound doctrine, and less long spun articles? But I will not dictate. The Lord give his children wisdom, and direct in all things in the prayer of your sister in the faith and hope of the gospel.

Bro. Geo. H. Kramer preached to the Church of the Blessed Hope last first-day on the victory of faith, and on the reward of faith, as illustrated, exemplified and dispensationalized by the Great Teacher—the Messiah.

In the temptation he achieved the victory over all the subtle policy of the tempter. In the resurrection he triumphed over the last enemy—death. He was the first-born and first-fruit from the dead, that in all things he might have in all relations the pre-eminence. How was this elevation reached? The answer comes in the words of the Spirit—whom God raised up from the dead, and so gave him glory. 1 Pet. i. 18-21.

Thus it is revealed of David, Acts ii. 29-34, "David hath not ascended," but he gave testimony to the resurrection of Christ, and that gospel doctrine of life-immortal. Thus of Abraham and all the worthies. Heb. xi. 3-20. Of course the central truth of both Testaments lies in death by sin, while life and immortality are brought to light by faith in Jesus and the resurrection.

These facts, these examples of victory over the world by faith in Jesus, the second man—the Lord from heaven—demonstrate that all language from the pulpit or press, as to "death and glory," belongs not to the gospel, but to the father-liar. John viii. 44; 1 John v. 10-12.

That root of false doctrine embodied, "not surely die!" Its growth has been vastly varied; but its branches and foliage have filled the world with subtle philosophies, and mysterious theories, that deny both the fact and the examples of resurrection from the dead.

However God raised up the Lord Jesus, and gave him glory, on that line of promise. Nay more, every example and illustration of this truth stamps the opposite as anti-christian delusion. But let us, dear readers, be found in the way of truth, and look like the apostles, for the redemption of the body.

This meagre notice may only feebly indicate the power of this fundamental truth that transfixed the audience—a promise of good.

THE RESTITUTION.

S. A. CRAFLIN, EDITOR.

Plymouth, Indiana, Aug. 2, 1882.

PLEASE write shorter articles, at least for awhile. We have more long ones now than we can use for weeks to come.

ARTICLES that we would gladly have printed this week must be deferred. Some editorials are indefinitely if not finally postponed.

WILL the brother residing at Brooklyn, Md., who sent us $1 for tracts, please send his name so we may know to whom we must send.

WE are receiving some help for Mrs. Davis which we will forward to her soon. We hope to hear from her soon directly or through the Age-to-Come Herald.

FOR ourself, and in behalf of others, we would be glad if Brother Weethee could find time to write one or more articles on the Egyptian question in the light of prophecy.

REMEMBER that the Conference of the churches in Northern Indiana was appointed to be held at Rensselaer, Jasper County, Ind., August 25-27. No formal notice has been forwarded yet, but the committee decided that the meeting be held at this time. Let all attend who can, and may God's blessing rest upon this contemplated gathering.

WE hope our friends will now renew as the harvest is rewarding the laborer. We ask also for an increase of names to our list. We also thank the friends who have sent extra aid. Our list increases slowly, and we hope it will ere long be full enough to make the paper self-supporting. Some extra aid is needed till our number of subscribers is larger.

AFFAIRS in Egypt are daily becoming more and more complicated. There is certainly at present the prospect of a war that will involve nations in the conflict. The Russian representative, Onou, has declared that he has been instructed to participate in the deliberations of the Conference only so far as relates to the Suez canal. The Russian press, generally, is hostile to England, and claims that England will have a contest, diplomatic or worse, with Turkey. France has ordered the troops destined for Egypt, to be disarmed, and the transports withdrawn, while the French gun-boats have sailed away from Alexandria, as the Consul-General had been ordered to withdraw the entire fleet from Egypt. The Turkish fleet, that was expected with troops to assist in quelling the insurrection, is not going to sail at present if at all. Murders are constantly occurring in the railway trains, as mobs search every train for Christians. The commander of the German gun-boat has been instructed on no account to land troops, but, if necessary, to take German subjects aboard his vessel. So that on the whole it seems that England will be left to pursue such a policy alone and unaided as the force of circumstances may compel. Our own objections are that the conflict has only just begun, and that, probably, the Oriental question will be opened up to an extent that will involve a horrible war—or, at least that is the way toward which events are at present tending. God's plan, however, will be consummated. Every jot and tittle of the sure word of prophecy will be fulfilled. Let us in watchfulness and prayer await the results.

Faith in thy faith, but only faith in Him;
And this he meant by saying "Come to me."
To light and darkness seek to do his will,
And leave the work of faith to Jesus still.

A living, bright reality!
More present to faith's vision keen
Than any outward object seen;
More dear, more intimately nigh,
Than e'en the sweetest earthly tie!

Editor Restitution:

The first passage I propose to consider in this article is found in Heb. ii. 10. It reads in the Revised version: "For it became him for whom are all things and through whom are all things in bringing many sons unto glory to make the author of their salvation perfect through sufferings." Change "author" to "captain" and you have the old version.

The Douay (Catholic) version reads as follows: "For it became him for whom are all things, who had brought many children into glory, to perfect the author of their salvation, by his passion."

I give these three different versions to show that high authorities have already sanctioned different renderings of this passage, and to show how marked the variations are. I now propose to show from the thought of the context as well as from the grammatical construction and true meaning of the words that they are all wrong, so far as adequately rendering the thought of the inspired writer.

The thought of the context beginning at verse 5, is that God has not made the world that is destined to be, viz: the "new creation," subject to angels, as he did the old creation in which we now live. See Deut. xxxi. 8, 9, 43, other perversion in the old version. "When the Most High distributed the nations by allotment, while he was sowing the sons of Adam, he set boundaries for the nations according to the number of angels of God, and Jacob's royal people became the Lord's portion, Israel the definite allotment of his inheritance."

But Inth made it subject to a Son of Man called the Christ, all through the Old Testament prophecies. Then the writer says we do not yet see all things made subject to this Son of Man, as predicted, but we do see this Jesus who hath been made to lie (that is humiliated not exalted) somewhat lower when compared with angels, in order that he might taste death for every one, and because of the suffering of death crowned with glory and honor; and why did this take place? Why was this suffering and humiliation necessary? This is the question answered in verse 10, under consideration, and the first general error is in failing to keep the connection of thought, and in obscuring the relations herein stated to exist between the two persons—first and Christ.

The first specific error lies in making the clause "for whom are all things" a modifier of the pronoun "him" which stands for God, when it is very clear that the writer intended it to be a modifier of the word translated "author" or "captain," and in doing this the translator has destroyed the whole significance of the conjunctive adverb "gar" which introduces this sentence as a conclusion drawn from the statements made in the preceding 6-9 verses.

The query raised is this, Why did God humiliate Christ by the suffering of death, before he exalted him and crowned him with glory and honor? As I have already said, verse 10 answers this query distinctly and unequivocally when it is correctly translated.

The second specific error lies in translating the second aorist participle of the verb meaning "to lead" as if it was the present participle of the verb meaning to bring.

The third specific error lies in translating the word archegon "author," which means "efficient cause" when the word does not properly mean any such thing. God himself is always spoken of as the Efficient Cause of every thing, salvation included, and this word does not contradict this truth. For it means a subordinate chief who is chief by appointment. "Captain" is not a bad translation of the word, but "author" is a perversion of the thoughts of the writer, and very confusing in what it suggests.

The verse correctly translated reads as follows: "For it became him (God) to make the captain of their salvation, who hath lead (that is preceding as leader) many sons into glory, for whose sake are all things and through whom are all things, perfect through suffering."

The next passage I will call attention to is to is Heb. i. 10, and the question I propose to raise here is one of interpretation as well as grammatical rule.

A careful analysis of the grammatical construction of two words which constitute an adverbial modifier of the verb "hast founded" it seems to me, in its outcome assists very materially in giving an interpretation to the passage which is harmonious with the general teaching of Scripture. The two words referred to are kat' archas, which expression has usually and I think invariably been dispersed of by scholars and grammarians in this way. The word kat' being for kata, a preposition used only with the genitive and accusative cases, the final a being elided for euphony. The word archas is a noun of the first declension, and declined with the terminations nom. a, gen. es, Dat. e, accus. an, etc. accus. plural as. Now the grammarians have usually considered this form here used to be a genitive singular of the Doric dialect, which would form its genitive with the termination as instead of es, the usual Attic form, and if this supposition were correct have correctly translated it "at the beginning."

The first objection to this conclusion however is—it is extremely doubtful whether any Doric idiomatic forms of words occur in the New Testament, as the marked variation from pure Attic, so far as the use of words and idioms is concerned, is in favor of the Ionic, and this is very natural too, as Palestine and all Syria, and the adjacent provinces came under the influence of the Ionic dialect when made subject to Greek conquest, as all history will attest.

The second objection to supposing this to be a Doric form is the fact that this idiom occurs in Herodotus, the historian who wrote in the Ionic dialect, and an important fact is established right here by the sense in which he uses it. See Herodotus, book 2. 153. last paragraph. He evidently does not use it here in the sense of "at the beginning," but does mean to say "according to the authorities."

Now the only other places where I have discovered this idiomatic expression to be used in the Scriptures of the Old or New Testament is in Psa. cii. (Septua. 101) 26 from which this is quoted, and in Psa. cxix. (Septua. 118) 152. Suppose you translate the idiom here in this last instance "at the beginning," what does David mean to say? What beginning does he refer to? The beginning of his life? The beginning of the Scriptures? The beginning of creation? It does not seem probable that he meant to say any such thing.

This is what I think he meant to say and does say: "According to the authorities I have known thy testimonies, that thou didst found them forever."

The position of kat' archas in the sentence shows conclusively that it is an adverbial modifier of the verb "have known," and not of the verb "hast founded." If then it modifies "have known" and you translate it "at the beginning," it raises a question in the mind of the reader very difficult to answer as to what beginning is referred to.

To recur now to the passage under consideration. If you translate the idiom "at the beginning" here let us see what the writer says. Who is speaking in the words of the writer? God is it not? Whom is he addressing? Christ is he not? What does he say? "Thou (Christ) O Lord, at the beginning didst found the earth and the heavens are the works of thy hands."

In what way can this be explained so as not to contradict the plain statements of Moses and the prophets? The doctrine of the Trinity, as taught, merely makes confusion worse confounded of the whole matter.

Now let us see if there is not a solution of this difficulty by following what seems to be correct grammatical usage of this idiom. I would premise however by calling attention to the fact that the writer says in chap. ii. 5, that he is talking about the new creation. viz., "the inhabited (earth) that is destined to be."

In what sense then, does the writer mean to say that God calls Christ the founder of the earth and the creator of the heavens? I think this is all contained in and determined by this adverbial modifier kat' archas, which modifies the founding and the creating, and I should translate the passage in this way: "According to authorities (or authority by authority) O Lord, thou hast founded the earth, and the heavens are the works of thy hands;" and I should interpret in this way, letting Scripture speak for itself.

What is said of authorities and powers elsewhere in the Scriptures? At the creation in the account given by Moses, man is made lord of the whole of it, but through disobedience he loses his high estate. It is a fair supposition then that as man was made lord of creation, that the object in creating it second only to the creator's own glory was that man might be lord of it, and that the original purpose would be eventually carried out in restoring man to the original sovereignty which God had given him and that, as we learn from a study of his works, he being a God who works through means to an end, he would give evidence in his revelation of an intelligent plan to accomplish this great purpose. And this we find in a great multiplicity of details. So far as we have any sacred record of events they all conspire to ultimately accomplish this end. Individual men are raised up through whom God speaks and acts with miraculous power toward this end. Nations rise and fall, principalities come and go; one authority swallows up another, but each new civilization is in many important respects an advance upon the old. We get glimpses here and there of principalities and powers of heaven as instrumentalities in the great work, and clearer than all else stands out the figures of a prophetic man and a final prophetic kingdom of which this man is to be king, and which kingdom is to be what David calls a sunteleia a unity, or a united harmonious outcome, a consummation of all this grand plan and purpose of God.

Now let us see if this word arche itself is not a prophetic word. The first two words of Moses' account of creation and of the old covenant Scriptures, and the first two words of the beloved disciple John's gospel of the new covenant are the preposition en and this word arche, and correctly translated meaning "in authority."

In the book of revelation this same John says Christ calls himself "the arche of the creation of God," viz: the head, chief, principle, object.

In Gen. xliv. 10, the Christ, as the expectation of the nations, is called an archon or ruler, one who rules in an arche, and so on down, the term occurs frequently in prophecy as designating the office of the Christ. For instance Psa. cx. (septua. 109) 3, God addresses Christ in this way: "With thee the arche in a day of thy miraculous power among the shining splendors of thy saints."

Again in Exaias ix. 6, the word appears in a very specific sense. The whole verse reads "Because for us a child hath been begotten, yea a son hath been given to us, whose arche (authority) hath come to be upon his shoulder, and he will be called a messenger of a great council."

I might multiply passages all through the Psalms and the Prophets, where the term occurs with this signification as applied to Christ, but I will quote but one more.

In Don. vii. 13, 14, where the vision of sovereignty occurs, it reads as follows: "I was beholding in a vision of the night, and lo, in the midst of the clouds of the heavens, one like a son of man coming, and he drew nigh unto the ancient of days, and he was conducted unto him, and unto him (Christ) was given he arche, (the authority) and the honor and the kingdom; and all the peoples, tribes, and tongues will serve him. His power an everlasting power which will not pass away, and his kingdom will not be destroyed."

So it is evident to my mind that God intended we should see in this overturning and overturning of kingdoms and governments "until he hath come whose right it is to rule," the founding process of the new creation of which Christ's arche is to be the grand outcome, and the inspired writer here in this passage I think means to describe this founding process as going on, as it appears in the purpose of God, by this idiomatic expression kat' archas, which is the accusative plural of the word arche, used in the distributive sense with the preposition kata, like the very common expression kath' hemeran, meaning according to days, or day by day, he meaning to say here that this founding process of the new creation is going on kingdom by kingdom, or government by government, or authority by authority towards the grand sunteleia of the kingdom of God in Christ, for whose sake are all things and through whom (in this sense) are all things.

Christ himself speaks of this founding process in this way in his language to Peter, "On this rock will I found my church." What rock? The good confession of faith which Peter had just made. What was this? That he was the Christ. What does this mean? The Anointed One. Anointed for what? To rule, to assert authority. What authority? The authority conferred upon him by this anointing process. Then as the appointed eons of the new order of things, "the new heavens and new earth," he is properly spoken of as the founder, is he not? But as a king's authority implies authorities and agencies subordinate to him, so we would naturally speak of his kingdom as being founded upon these subordinate authorities, or if he was establishing his own authority for the first time, or entering into possession of his kingdom by the selection and instruction of his subordinate appointees, we would naturally speak of the process as being accomplished authority by authority, as the inspired writer does here in the passage under consideration.

CHARLES GARDNER.

THE LIVING SOUL OF THE BIBLE.

And the Lord God formed man of the dust of the ground: and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life, and man became a living soul. The first man, Adam, was made a living soul. Gen. ii. 7; 1 Cor. xv. 45.

In the above texts we are told clearly how the Lord made the living soul man, and we are able to see just what it took to make him, what he was, a living soul. Three things, the dust of the ground, the wisdom and power of God, and the breath of life, and as God made only one man he made only one living soul. "Wherefore as by one man sin entered into the world." Rom. v. 12. Not two men, as some suppose, or vainly imagine. The one "living soul," or man of the Bible, that God made, had breath, life, and a material image of dust, and since God made but one man, it is impossible for us to conceive of "a living soul" or man without these three. All must admit, let the word soul or "living soul" mean what it may in other parts of the Bible, it means no less than the entire literal man, in the above texts. No life, no image or body, no man, or living soul. We have the word soul, and the phrase "living soul," and while the word soul may be used in a limited sense expressing only a part of man, or what it takes to constitute a "living soul," the phrase "living soul" invariably means the whole man when applied to him.

The different parts of man are called the man: when the foot is hurt, the man is hurt, and so in relation to all parts of the body, and when the mind is injured the man suffers, and when the breath of life or the vital principle departs from man, he dies, and is no longer a "living soul" or man. The "breath of life" which God gave man, must have contained the vital principle, which may be, and doubtless is, in many instances called the soul or life. When Elijah stretched himself upon the child and breathed into his mouth, we are told "his soul (life) came again into him." "Fear not them that kill the body, but are not able to kill the soul," or destroy the vital principle which God gave man. And as the "spirit of life" may return to God, and exist to be restored at some future time if he please, and although gone out of the dead man, still exists in all the living and can only be destroyed by God, the higher power than man. But as this vital principle or "spirit of life" was not man, but only given to make him live, it cannot be called man because is taken from him. The idea that God put into the "earthly" man an immaterial man, or an immortal man into a mortal man, flatly contradicts the plain statement of Paul, that only one man sinned, and is a creature of human imagination peculiar to the dark ages of heathen mythology, and a fruitful source of unlimited imaginations.

For when we get before us a fancy man, we must have a fancy salvation, and a fancy reward or home for him, and to make room for him we must spurn the real man of the Bible, and turn him out of doors, and plaster his back with "dangerous man," "materialist," "destructionist," "soul-sleeper," etc., but if he turn upon us with the sword of the spirit and overmatch us, then, like cowards, while in his presence we may ask, "What difference does it make whether we believe men sleep or are in a state of death until the resurrection, or whether they go immediately to glory?" God will make it all right. God will never make it right for us to utter falsehoods, and scorn them that are his, and heap vile epithets upon them, and load them with railing accusations, when behind their backs. We have learned to our sorrow that those who cry, "it makes no difference whether we preach this or that," only mean it makes no differences if we believe as they do, or if we believe what is popular and teach it.

We have aimed to be very explicit in what we have said thus far, and now will try to drive the nail and clench it. When we turn away from the imaginations of men and look to God, he has placed before us two lives and two images or bodies, "The life that now is, and that which is to come." 1 Tim. iv. 8. The image of the earthy Adam, and the image of the heavenly, the natural and the spiritual bodies. 1 Cor. xv. 44-49. We were created in the first or earthy Adam, and existed substantially in him, but not personally, our first or present life and image were in him, but were not transmitted until we were begotten and born of our parents, we then entered upon this living organized state, which must close at death; we shall then lose the natural life and image, and as our first life and image were in the first Adam so our second life and image will be in the second Adam, if we be his for "this is the record that God has given us eternal life, and this life is in his son." 1 John v. 11. It is not in us now but will be given at the resurrection, or in the world to come, Mark x. 30, where the natural image will be changed into the heavenly, by the resurrection from the dead which is a restoration to life and being, and as our first life and image were in the first Adam before our first personal existence, so our second life and image will be in the second Adam, and we shall live in him who is our life eternal (not personally) until we are raised from the dead, when we shall again exist personally, having the life and spiritual body of the second Adam, Christ.

Now as we get the second, the life to come, the eternal, and the second or spiritual body at the resurrection, will some one be so wise and kind as to tell us, what life we have and what image, from the time we lose the life and image of the first Adam until we get the life and image of the second? Remember God never made a man without an image, and unless we can find some form or image outside of the first and second Adams, our theory that man exists personally from death until the resurrection is done for, unless we can conceive of a man without life and image. Paul would not have his brethren ignorant concerning those brethren who were dead or asleep, but said not one word more about them before the coming of the Lord to raise them from the dead, 1 Thes. iv. 16, 17.

Come now all ye who are contentious and can tell us all about the dead, before the resurrection, which Paul has failed to do, tell us what life and body they have, and as "faith comes by hearing the word of God" tell where he has said all about it, or half as much as you do. How can you have a heart to condemn us unless you give God's word to show us that we are in the wrong? May the Lord give us all grace and wisdom.

LONDON, July 29.—A report was current in the House of Commons last evening that the Sultan of Turkey had made overtures to Great Britain looking to the latter's acquirement of Egypt on the same terms as those on which Cyprus changed hands.

CAIRO, July 30.—Arabi Pasha has had publicly read the proclamation of the Khedive dismissing him from the ministry. He has assumed the green turban and robes of the descendant of the prophet. The Bedouins have agreed to furnish Arabi with 60,000 men.

CONSTANTINOPLE, July 31—Lord Dufferin says the Porte, by its inactivity, has compelled England to assume alone the task of restoring order in Egypt, but England will accept Turkish co-operation provided the Porte makes an unambiguous declaration of its intentions.

A dispatch to the Manchester Guardian from Alexandria says that persons competent to judge believe that half the cotton crop of Egypt will be lost, and also the greater part of the wheat crop of lower Egypt, in consequence of neglect of irrigation.

Six Mudirs of Upper Egypt have been ordered to supply 500 horses and 650 camels to the army of Arabi Pasha. Murders are constantly occurring in the railway trains. Mobs search every train for Christians.

The Christian population of the Asiatic shore of the Black Sea are emigrating in large numbers to Greece. The movements is not yet viewed with approval by the Government, for the emigrants are in the habit of leaving their taxes unpaid. An order has heretofore been issued forbidding any one to the country until he has settled his accounts with the treasury.

The British government has taken sixteen steamships from the New York, Quebec and Montreal lines to carry troops to Egypt. They range from the Prussian of 1,776 tons, to the Greece of 4,810 tons, and aggregate 46,360 tons, estimated to carry 17,000 troops. Freight on grain from New York to Liverpool has gone up from nothing as ballast to seven pence per bushel.

The condition of Egypt is described as one of complete anarchy. Arabi Pasha issues commands to the governors of the provinces which are countermanded by the Khedive, and the governors, not knowing whom to obey, are taking no precautions for the safety of Europeans. From Cairo and Port Said reports arrive of outrages and massacres, and the ruffians of the cities, which seem to form no inconsiderable part of the population, pillage and kill unchecked. The Khedive's following is of the smallest, and even of those who remain with him the majority are said to be in communication with Arabi. A reconnaissance has been made by English troops in Alexandria of Arabi's position, and they were met by the Egyptian cavalry six miles from the city, where a skirmish ensued. Arabi was found occupying a strong position flanked by two rivers, from which it will be difficult to dislodge him. Arabi has embarrassed the English by diverting the Mahmoudieh Canal, which supplies Alexandria with water. The attitude of the people has changed from abject servility to sullenness and insolence. Newspaper correspondents in Egypt assert that there is no longer any doubt but that the religious hatred against Christians is spreading like a contagious disease from Egypt to Palestine, Syria and Asia Minor.

The effect on Russian business of the Jewish persecutions has been most disastrous. "They have," says the London News, "put a complete stop to business, and the passenger traffic of the Russian Steam Navigation Company between Odessa, Nicolaieff, Kherson, and the Dnelper, and also of the South Russian Railways, fell lower than it had been in any previous year. The Kachovka May fair was a complete failure, as half of the Jews, who do nearly all the trading, abstained from appearing, and half the remainder hurried back their goods before the fair opened. At this time barges were hired and moored off the shore, and household effects and valuable goods placed on board, to be safe in case of riot—those Jews who had Christian friends bringing to them for safe keeping their jewelry and documents.

M. DE LESSEPS ON EGYPT.

I have recently, says the Paris correspondent of the Pall Mall Gazette, heard the views of M. de Lesseps about Egypt. He thinks the Egyptians are well qualified to govern themselves. The Copts are very intelligent, and would be progressive if they had fair play. They form an excellent material for a governing class. There is no country in which there is so little need of a public executioner as Egypt. Because the Egyptian is gentle it does not follow that he requires a Turkish or other foreign master. From a Christian point of view his meekness should be a title to citizenship. M. de Lesseps regards the Egyptian fellah as superior to the French peasant in thrift and fertility of money-making resources. The account to which a soldier in Cairo will, in the hours when he is free from military duty, turn a donkey that he has hired shows a financial talent of a superior kind. In the Egyptian army before the Control was established pay was always in arrears, and arrears were never paid. The soldier had to do for himself, and he managed to create a fund which would enable him to bear up against weighty imposts. When he returned to his native village he bought and sold, swapped and bartered, and turned over a great deal of money, in the periods which would have been spent in idleness and dissipation were he in a European army. Wherever there is a free school in Egypt it is well attended; the poor people there understand the value of knowledge and accept it from teachers belonging to Catholic and Protestant missions, although attached to their own forms of Coptic Christianity. Reading and writing are much more general than Europeans imagine. M. de Lesseps could almost now form a staff of Egyptian clerks for the administration of his canal. The negroes who were imported to labor as slaves on the domains of the ex-Khedive have many excellent and useful qualities. M. de Lesseps has a very kindly feeling toward the dark races of the world, among whom he has lived a great deal. He is convinced that Egypt will be in the future, as she has been in the past, a civilising State in Africa.

There are no times in life when opportunity, the chance to be and do, gathers so richly about the soul as when it has to suffer. Then everything depends on whether the man turns to the lower or the higher helps. If he resorts to mere expedients and tricks, the opportunity is lost. He comes out no richer nor greater; nay, he comes out harder, poorer, smaller for his pain. But if he turns to God, the hour of suffering is the turning hour of his life. Opportunity opens before him as the ocean opens before one who sails out of a river. Men have done the best and worst, the noblest and the basest things the world has seen, under the pressure of excessive pain. Everything depended on whether they looked to the depths or to the hills for help.—Phillips Brooks.

WAITING FOR THE MORNING.

There is no roof in all the world,
Of palace or of cot,
That hideth not some burdened heart
Sigh breaking for its lot!
The earth is filled with pain and tears,
And closer draws the gloom;
And light or balm there can be none
Till Christ, the Lord, shall come.

O morn, when like a summer bird
My spirit shall go free,—
When I shall see thee as thou art,
And be, my God, like thee!
Like thee! like thee! all spotless white—
This heart, this will, no more!—
O love of God, O blood of Christ!
O grace and power divine!

My Savior, who doth know the thirst
The longing spirit feels!
O Bridegroom, now so long afar,
Why stay thy chariot wheels?
Were ever eyes so dim with tears,
Breasts so oppressed with care?
Did ever hearts so yearn to catch
Thy whisper from the air?

Thou lonely one, lift up thy head!
Array thee for the feast!
He that hath carried long is near!
The glow is in the East!
O Morning Star, so soon to lead
Thy chosen ones away,—
O Sun of Righteousness, bring in
The everlasting day!

"THE GREAT CITY."

"The Great City" is an appelation which occurs in the Apocalypse in eight several places. In the eleventh chapter and eighth verse it is found in connection with these words, "And the dead bodies of the witnesses shall lie in the Broad Way (plateia) of the Great City, which spiritually (i. e. figuratively) is called Sodom and Egypt, where also our Lord was crucified." In chapter fourteenth and eighth verse it occurs in the saying, "Babylon is fallen, is fallen, that Great City, because she made all nations drink of the wine of the wrath of her fornication." Again in chapter sixteenth and verse nineteenth, "The great city was divided into three parts . . . . and great Babylon came in remembrance before God, to give unto her the cup of the wine of the fierceness of his wrath." In chapter seventeenth we find these allusions to the said city—"Come hither; I will show unto thee the judgment of the great harlot that sitteth upon many waters. And I saw a woman sit upon a scarlet-colored beast arrayed in purple and scarlet color, and decked with gold and precious stones and pearls, having a golden cup in her hand full of abominations and filthiness of her fornication; and upon her forehead was a name written, Mystery, Babylon the Great, the mother of harlots and abominations of the earth. And I saw her drunk with the blood of the saints, and with the blood of the martyrs of Jesus." "And the woman I saw is that great city which reigneth over the kings of the earth." In the eighteenth chapter, which is continuous with the eighth verse of the fourteenth, the kings of the earth are represented as viewing her overthrow, and saying, "Alas, alas! that great city Babylon, that mighty city! for in one hour is thy judgment come. That great city, that was clothed in fine linen and purple, and scarlet, and decked with gold, and precious stones, and pearls! for in one hour so great riches is come to nought." And others cry when they behold the smoke of her burning, saying, "What city is like unto this great city! Alas, alas! that great city, wherein were made rich all that had ships in the sea by reason of her costliness! for in one hour is she made desolate." Her final desolation is illustrated by a mighty angel casting a great millstone into the sea, and saying, "Thus with violence shall that great city Babylon be thrown down, and shall be found no more at all."

The phrase "the great city" occurs also in the twenty-first chapter, but with reference to an entirely different subject. It applies not to Babylon nor its dominion, but to the community of the resurrected and glorified saints, with Jesus in their midst—the community, or government, in the light of which the nations who survive the judgments of God, called "the nations of them which are saved," shall walk for a thousand years, saying, "We will walk in his paths; for out of Zion shall go forth the law, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem"—this great city, greater than that which preceded it and is found no more, is styled "The Bride, the Lamb's Wife, the Holy City, New Jerusalem," whose seat of government is the widowed Jerusalem, restored to more than her former glory. But, our remarks in this paper will be confined to the "great city" of which such terrible things are spoken.

It is evident from the testimonies adduced, that "the great city" is used in two senses—first, for a body politic; and, secondly, for the mother city, or metropolis, of the political organization. It is used in the sense of a body politic in chapter eleventh where the dead bodies of the witnesses are said to lie unburied in the Broad Way of the great city, which is its principal street. The witnesses were killed in the western Roman empire; but the great city is said to be "where also our Lord was crucified." Now Jesus was put to death by the same power that killed his witnesses, although in a different part of its territory. He was killed in the eastern Roman empire, and by the Roman power which also made war upon his saints, and overcame them. It was the power enthroned in Rome that crucified the one, and slew the other, though at different and remote times, and under different aspects. When it put Jesus to death it was pagan, and when it slew the witnesses it was papal, and equally savage, may more so. The aspects of the power, though varied, do not affect its identity any more than the frequent change of dress destroys the individuality of an actor. The body politic, whose executive slew Jesus and his witnesses, is represented by Daniel's fourth beast, the Greco-Roman dragon. This symbol is representative of the "they of people, and kindreds, and tongues and nations," who saw the dead bodies of the witnesses three days and a half, but would not suffer them to be buried. The "they," that is, the rulers, or government of the population, would not suffer it. We may remark here, that the beast "that ascended out of the bottomless pit;" the other beast that "cometh up out of the earth;" the image of the beast; and the dragon, are all comprehended in Daniel's fourth beast. They are all symbols of the Roman body politic in its present constitution. When the Roman body is viewed as a great city, the symbolic horns answer to its several streets or ways. Being ten horns, therefore, there will be ten streets, each street answering to a power connected in some way with the Roman head. The dead bodies of the witnesses lay in one of the streets called the wide street of the great city. And there they rose again to political life; and when this came to pass, "the tenth of the city fell," that is, one of the ten streets, horns, or kingdoms of the Roman body politic.

But though the "great city" hath only ten streets, it has some waste and open places. The most remarkable of these is the land "where our Lord was crucified." This is included in the great city only lying at its eastern extremity. It is true that at present it is subject to the Turk; but when John wrote it was a part of the Roman City or empire, and will be again when the iron and the clay shall be temporarily combined into one dominion. In this we have hinted that the Roman city and empire are co-extensive, and the terms therefore synonymous. This is unquestionable. When Rome was founded its dominion was bounded by its walls; but in the reign of Caracalla an edict was published by which its walls were defined by its dominion; that is to say, the whole territory of the empire was decreed to be the great city, and its inhabitants, without exception, citizens of Rome. The following is Gibbon's testimony to this important fact:—

"The sentiments, and indeed the situation of Caracalla, were very different from those of the Antonines. Inattentive, or rather adverse, to the welfare of his people, he found himself under the necessity of gratifying the insatiate avarice which he had excited in the army. Of the several impositions introduced by Augustus, the twentieth on inheritances and legacies was the most fruitful, as well as the most comprehensive. As its influence was not confined to Rome or Italy, the produce continually increased with the gradual extension of the Roman city. The new citizens, though clothed on equal terms, with the payment of new taxes, which had not affected them as subjects, derived an ample compensation from the rank they obtained, the privileges they acquired, and the fair prospect of honors and fortune that was thrown open to their ambition. But the favor which implied a distinction was lost in the prodigality of Caracalla, and the reluctant provincials were compelled to assume the vain title, and the real obligations of Roman citizens."—Gibbon.

Thus the freedom of the city was given to all the provincials, for the purposes of taxation, and the Roman city extended to its utmost limit. Our Lord and his two witnesses, then, were all slain in the great Roman city, the rulers of whose populations rejoiced at the death of the latter, and made merry, and congratulated one another with gifts. It has ever been their wont to do evil and to rejoice in successful villainy. They are blasphemers, murderers, adulterers, thieves, drunkards, and idolaters. Their wickedness is greater than can be defined. Their great city is, therefore, spiritually called Sodom and Egypt [illegible] the "scarlet-colored beast," that symbolizes their polity, said to be "full of the names of blasphemy." Sodom was a city and Egypt a country—the former proverbial for its bestiality and licentiousness; the latter, for its superstition and idolatry. The cities and countries that acknowledge the spiritual supremacy of Rome are all of them so many Sodoms and Egypts; but as the seven, all constitute one many-horned political system, one Sodom and Egypt fully represents them. Take Rome and Paris, could Sodom be more vile than they? Morality there is none; zeal of justice and mercy, righteousness and truth, it is a mockery to speak in connection with their names. As to France and Italy, they are spiritually as reprobate to all excellence as ancient Egypt. Hence the fate of Sodom and Egypt awaits them. As a mill-stone cast into the sea so shall Rome be thrown down, and found no more at all. This is the end of the fierce wrath in store for her. As Sodom fell to rise no more so shall she, and the cities of the nations that look up to her. "There was a great earthquake," says John, "and the cities of the nations fell: and great Babylon came into remembrance before God, to give unto her the cup of the wine of the fierceness of his wrath." Whether the falling of the cities is a political or social overthrow, we stay not to examine. We believe it is both—politically, because Daniel saw the thrones cast down (Dan. vii. 9); and literally, because an earthquake that will shake Rome into the abyss, and clear the Mount of Olives to its found[illegible] (Zech. xiv. 4, 5), prostrate the towers (Isa. xxx. 25), and cause every wall to fall to the ground (Ezek. xxxviii. 20), must of necessity cause vast destruction among "the cities of the nations." The plagues of Egypt are but a miniature edition of the fierceness of God's wrath which, like the sword of Damocles, is suspended over the countries of "the great city." The inhabitants of this city are the worshippers of the beast and his image, and have received the mark in their foreheads, and right hands. Of these spiritual Egyptians it is said, "They shall drink of the wine of the wrath of God, which is poured out without mixture into the cup of his indignation; and they shall be tormented with fire and brimstone in the presence of the holy angels, and in the presence of the Lamb: and the smoke of their torment ascendeth up to the ages of ages: and they have no rest day nor night who do homage to the beast and his image, and whosoever receiveth the mark of his name." Rev. xiv. 10, 11. The judgments of God consummated in the destruction of Pharaoh's host, crippled the power of Egypt; but "the seven last plagues" which "fill up the wrath of God" upon the great city, will so completely wreck old Egypt's anti-type, that not a beast, image, head, or horn, will survive to destroy the earth again. Rev. xi. 18.

The other sense in which the phrase "the great city" is used, is that of the government of Rome. This is styled, "the great harlot that sitteth upon many waters;" a saying which is explained by the words, "the great city which reigneth over the kings, and their peoples, multitudes, nations, and tongues," termed in the aggregate "the earth." Rev. xvii. 15–18. This harlot sits as a queen-power upon many waters, which in their political organization are symbolized by a scarlet-colored beast, whose horns or kings are the vile paramours of the harlot. The queen-power and "the eternal city" are inseparable, and both go to perdition together. They are unitedly termed Babylon upon the same principle the empire is styled Sodom and Egypt; that is, spiritually, pneumatically, or figuratively. The Chaldean Babylon was the great enemy and destroyer of the saints under the law. It made war upon them, and prevailed against them until Cyrus, Jehovah's Anointed, came and delivered them. So the Roman Babylon, which is "drunk with the blood of the saints and martyrs of Jesus," by the co-operation of her paramours has prevailed against them, and will prevail until Cyrus' superior, the Ancient of Days, shall come and turn the tables against her. The Lord God will judge her for he is strong. But before she is utterly destroyed, the righteous dead now sleeping amid her ruins must be awakened, and come out of her; for they are to behold her judgment, and to rejoice over her calamity. Rev. xviii. 20. God's people, whether living or dead, must evacuate the doomed city before it sinks to rise no more. Besides the dead, the Jews are the only people in Rome that belong to God. He exhorted them to flee out of the midst of Babylon, and deliver their soul from the fierce anger of the Lord. Jer. li. 6–45. Should he be mindful of them in the days of Belshazzar, and forget them now? No. On the contrary, there will be [illegible] mistakable invitation from high authority calling upon them to "Come out of Rome, and to reward her even as she has rewarded them, and to double unto her double according to her works." Emptied of God's people there will be no longer delay. Her end will overtake her with rapid strides; for "her plagues shall come upon her in one day or year, death, and mourning, and famine, and she shall be utterly burned with fire: for strong is the Lord God who judgeth her." Rev. xviii. 8. Even so; may it quickly come.—From Destiny of Human Governments in the Light of Scripture, by John Thomas, M. D.

THE WAR IN EGYPT.

It is highly probable that when Admiral Seymour opened fire upon the defenses of Alexandria, he began one of the most important wars of modern times, no matter whether it is viewed from the political or the religious stand-point. It is certainly true that the first gun sounded an alarm that was heard around the civilized world. The war is well begun, but no prophet rises up to tell of the end, nor to measure the final consequences to Egyptian nationality or to the anomalous influence of the Khedive, the Sultan, or the British Government.

In one sense the present war is a rebellion, with Arabi Pasha denounced as a rebel by the Khedive, and the Egyptian Parliament returning the compliment by proclaiming the Khedive a traitor and pronouncing his deposition. Arabi is said to have 100,000 troops at his command, who are full of zeal and religious fanaticism with "Egypt for the Egyptians," and "Death to the Infidel" emblazoned on their bloody banners. Arabi also stands, in a measure, as the exponent of Mohammedanism, that most numerous, ancient, devout, and bloodthirsty sect of religionists known in all history. For over 900 years the Mohammedan caliphs held sway over a region of country more extended than that covered by the Roman eagles. They were a people great in war, and wonderfully advanced at one time in science and art, their magnificent architectural structures still bearing testimony to the fact in Europe and Asia. "God is God, and Mohammed is his prophet"—this has been their cry for 1,300 years.

This makes the question an interesting one on the side of the rebels now represented by Arabi. On the other side stands the effete Turkish monarchy, headed by the Khedive, an intruder in Egyptian affairs, and backed by the European allied Powers, with John Bull in the foreground. England and France are resolved to treat the war as a rebellion, and they declare Egypt shall have peace if they have to fight for it. Both are stimulated by the hope of pecuniary gain—England especially—and the Egyptian Government owes them and their subjects an immense sum of money. England also owns over half the stock in the Suez canal, which is of great commercial importance to her, and which has been seriously obstructed by late proceedings. There is transported over it yearly 6,500,000 tons, giving a revenue of 73,000,000 francs. These facts make the war equally interesting and important from the English stand-point.

All Egypt is in a state of chaos, and there is no recognized authority, except that of England, and hers will depend on the stern arbitrament of the sword. If she is beaten in the first pitched battle with Arabi Pasha, as every lover of liberty and independent nationality sincerely hopes she will be, the British Government will begin to realize the great importance of the business in hand. It looks as if a holy war of the Crescent against the Cross had been commenced, in which all Europe may finally become embroiled.

The Queen has called out the reserves, and Mr. Gladstone has already asked Parliament for an appropriation of $11,500,000 to begin with. That is only a drop in the bucket. France appears in the ring as England's backer and bottle-holder, but does not manifest much real interest in the fight, except to push the British ahead while she appears as a spectator. The other great Powers will not stand back when the war is over and changes are proposed to be made in the map of Europe. Meantime England has assumed the responsibility of the whole business, and has other enemies to encounter besides the Egyptian and the Mohammedan. Of these a person thoroughly conversant with the country writes us follows:

"Egypt is as deadly in August as India in June," say old travellers; and this sinister reputation is only too well deserved. The same distempers attack almost destroyed the army of Louis IX. of France, at Damietta in the thirteenth century, decimated the troops of Bonaparte and those of his successors, Kleber and Menou, at Alexandria in the end of the eighteenth. Indeed, those who have been in Lower Egypt during the unhealthy season may well wonder, not that so many should succumb to the climate, but that any one should escape. The dreadful "khamsin," or hot wind, which the strongest man cannot face without instantly feeling his muscles unstrung, his skin parched and feverish, and his whole body limp and nerveless as a wet rag, is of itself a sufficient agent of evil. The fevers endangered by the malaria of the Nile delta are as virulent as even those of European Turkey, while the devastating visits of the plague itself are neither few or far between. A less fatal but equally formidable enemy to an invading army is the terrible "Egyptian ophthalmia," which though often brought on by the unclean habits of the natives, is at times generated in another and a very singular fashion. A small green fly persistently settles upon the sores of the diseased eyelid, and when driven off carries the infection along with it wherever it alights. So common is this disease among the Arabs that Mehemet Ali is said to have formed two battalions of one-eyed men, the one wanting the right eye and the other the left. In 1798 this complaint made great ravages in the army of Bonaparte, one of whose best officers, becoming blind in the desert, was forced to cling to the tail of a comrade's horse in order to make his way back to camp. It is a common saying in Alexandria that "an Egyptian Arab with two eyes is as rare as a snowball in June."—Chicago Evening Journal.

The Little Bird.

A little bird, with feathers brown,
Sat singing on a tree—
The song was very soft and low,
But sweet as it could be.

And all the people passing by
Looked up to see the bird,
That made the sweetest melody
That ever they had heard.

But all the bright eyes looked in vain,
For birdie was so small,
And with a modest dark-brown coat,
He made no show at all.

"Why, papa," little Gracie said,
"Where can this birdie be?
If I could sing a song like that,
I'd sit where folks could see."

"I hope my little girl will learn
A lesson from that bird,
And try to be what most she can,
Not to be seen or heard.

"This birdie is content to sit
Unnoticed by the way,
And sweetly sing his Maker's praise
From dawn to close of day.

"So live, my child, all through your life,
That be it short or long,
Though others may forget your looks,
They'll not forget your song."

God Will Know You.

One evening last Christmas, a gentleman was strolling along a street in Toronto, with apparently no object in view but to pass the time. His attention was attracted by the remark of a little girl to a companion in front of a fruit-stand: "I wish I had an orange for me." The gentleman saw that the children though poorly dressed, were clean and neat, and calling them into a store he loaded them with fruit and candies. "What's your name?" asked one of the girls. "Why do you want to know?" queried the gentleman. "I want to pray for you." was the reply. The gentleman turned to leave, scarcely daring to speak, when the little one added: "Well, it don't matter, I suppose. God will know you, anyhow."

Happy Children.

As house-plants cannot flourish without sunshine, so children cannot thrive and be happy without love. How radiant are their bright faces as they respond to the tones and words of affection from the lips of their parents! Little they know of the deep solicitude, of the constant care, exercised toward them; but they do fully understand and appreciate protestations of love and tenderness. Why should we be chary of those, when they cost only speaking? "I know now," said a lady not long ago, "that my mother loved me tenderly, but during all my childhood I doubted it.

"If I were really dear to her, I queried, why did she never tell me so? Why did she never caress me, and assure me of her love? She thought her actions spoke loudly enough without words. I could not read her actions then as I can now, and how I longed to hear her call me loving names, and to have her wrap me in the sweet embrace of her strong mother love." Many a little heart aches just as this lady's did, and can be made happier by the spontaneous utterances of maternal affection than by beads, or dolls, fine clothes, or costly toys.

Children who grow up in this constant atmosphere of love are rarely mischievous, never vicious. The rightiest of all agencies to lead the young in paths of virtue is in the hands of parents, and to command this agency they need only to give expression to the natural overflow of their hearts.

Children, to be happy, need encouragement and praise. It is not enough that they escape censure. Negatives are always cold and blank. Our little ones want warm, positive approval when they have done right. Thus they will be made to feel that the paths of wisdom are paths of pleasantness and peace.

Talks With Young People—Impulse.

An old proverb says, "Think three times before you speak once." Very much harm often results from hasty words and actions. Impulsive people really accomplish more, and usually are better thought of, than those who run to the opposite extreme of coldness and lethargy and tardiness. Their natures are usually earnest and intensely active. Earnestness, activity and promptness, however, are of no avail if there is a lack of purpose and deliberation. In other words we must "be sure we are right, and then go ahead."

I have seen the best-intentioned undertakings result in total failure, and cause serious disaster in very important matters, because of acting from impulse, when a different course would have been pursued if time had been taken for deliberation and the bringing to bear of judgment. It is never safe to act from impulse, and I have been caused more trouble and serious inconvenience because of giving way to my impulsive nature than any other cause. In fact the mistakes of my life have been made when I acted on the impulse of the moment, instead of the conclusions that I would have reached had I allowed my reason and judgment sufficient time to assert themselves.

Life is made up of acts, and our characters are determined by what we say and do. A word spoken can never be recalled, and so it is of the highest importance that we are fully persuaded in our own minds before we speak, act, or take sides in relation to any matter, even though it be of minor importance.

Impulsive natures are almost always in trouble because of their hasty words and actions.

I knew a very proud spirited young man, who was kindly spoken to by his employer about a matter in which the young man was at fault. The remonstrance was timely, and if he had taken it in the spirit in which it was intended, it would have proved to his advantage in a business point of view. But he was too proud to submit to reproof, and on the impulse of the moment resented it, and resigned a very desirable and lucrative situation, which, had he considered his future welfare instead of giving way to his impulses, he would never have relinquished. As it was, he was out of a situation, and the fact that he had so acted made it difficult for him to get another place, for no employer wants a clerk that he cannot advise and reprove. So he has never been as well off since, and the golden opportunity of his life was lost to him because of acting on the impulse of the moment.

If we are naturally quick and impulsive, we should make it a rule to take at least a day to deliberate on all important undertakings, and in all matters requiring prompt decision, we should look at both sides of the matter before we decide or act. We should always act from judgment rather than feeling or prejudice.—A Christian Merchant in New York Witness.

AN UNSUSPECTED PARALLEL.

The declaration in John xii. 25, that the renunciation of our earthly life at the call of Christ, will, on the morning of the resurrection, be rewarded by its metamorphosis into an endless life, loses, as is well known, much of its force from the necessity in the English language of giving the same word "life" to both psuche and zoe; psuche in this passage standing for the temporary life, zoe for life to come. "He that loveth his life shall lose it; and he that hateth his life in this world shall keep it unto life eternal."

So again in Psalm lxvi. 9, we have the expression, "Who holdeth our soul in life." But inasmuch as soul and life, both one and the other, are constantly, though interchangeably, made use of as the equivalents of psuche, the passage in its present form looks, at first sight, like a case of tautology, and would seem to mean nothing more than, "Who holdeth our life in life;" but it so happens that soul and life in this instance are not the same words in the original, and we may therefore read it, "Who quickens our psuche into zoe," i. e., "Who quickens our mortal life into an eternal life," thus [illegible] shadowing in a prophetic manner the declaration aforesaid in John xii. 25; and its emphasis in this sense is corroborated by the fact that this 66th Psalm is styled in the Septuagint version, "A Song of a Psalm of Resurrection.—J. Waylen.

Brevities.

There has recently been discovered in the county of Lanark, Ontario, a pillar of granite fully 75 feet in height, and tapering to a point at the top, which originally formed part of the cliff near the shore of Christy Lake, but by some convulsion was displaced and remained standing upon its end 20 feet from the bluff. It has a base of 25 feet square.

Mr. Villiers Stuart records that when the mummy of the great warrior Thothmes III. was unwrapped the body was found to be unusually short and slight. Hardly had a rapid photograph been taken of the figure than the fragile remains, as if in protest against the violation of their rest, vanished into dust, and took their departure like a dream.

Dr. Schliemann has written to the Royal Academy of Belgium, under the date of May 25, giving a full account of the excavations he is now carrying on in the Troad in company with two German architects. He has reached the conclusion that the enormous mass of ruins that surrounds Hissarlik, is not Homer's Ilium, but is two cities, the larger one of which he believes is the Troy of Homer. Both cities were evidently destroyed by fire. He has found much archaic Greek pottery, not later than the Ninth Century B. C., and potsherds of a prehistoric age—the most ancient that he has yet found in the Troad.

Arabi Pasha would be recognized at once by the ethnologist as the soldier son of the Egyptian peasant. He is tall and muscular. His eyes are small and dull, not bright and sparkling as little eyes are wont to be. The lower part of the visage resembles that of the bulldog with broad jaw and hanging cheeks. The nose is wide and flat, of true African shape. He was brought up at the military school established by Col. Selves, and his education was entirely French. Consequently he hates the French, but detests the English still more, and most of all the Turks.

At Easter, says an exchange, there were in Jerusalem about 15,000 pilgrims of various nationalities and persuasions. Although it is by no means a large city, yet these crowds find accommodation, such as it is. The better class of pilgrims go to hotels, and those who are not so well off take lodgings in the convents, which are built for the express use of pilgrims. The Armenian convent is said to hold 4,000 persons. Its guests are stowed as closely and as comfortably as the tramps who are furnished with nightly lodging at our local police stations. Most of the Christian pilgrims are from Russia. They are ignorant, superstitious, and devoutly sincere. It might be supposed that among such a crowd there would be many who lived by beggary; but this is not the case. The rigid rule of the Russian church is to allow no one to leave Russia to go on a pilgrimage until he has deposited with his holy superiors enough to pay for his passage and return. A specialty of the pilgrims is to bathe in the Jordan. They take with them for this purpose a peculiar bathing robe, which is used for no other purpose as long as its owner lives. When he dies, this robe serves as a winding-sheet, and it is with reverent care preserved for that purpose.

THE SURVEY OF EASTERN PALESTINE.

Captain Condor and Lieutenant Mantell, R. E., have returned from their first campaign in Eastern Palestine, bringing with them the results of their work. These include the map of a large district, covering five hundred square miles of country, with a very large quantity of notes, plans, drawings and photographs concerning the antiquities of Moab and Gilead. Captain Condor will proceed at once to arrange these materials for publication. He has also brought with him a considerable quantity of notes, and additional information made by himself and his party in Western Palestine. These will be included in the next volume of the society's great work, which will be delayed a month or two on their account. During the recent visit of the Royal Princes to Palestine, Captain Condor had the honor of accompanying their Royal Highnesses throughout their tour, which lasted nearly six weeks and extended over all Western Palestine, and over a great part of the country east of the Jordan. The harem of Heshbon was also explored, and a plan and description were prepared by Captain Condor, to be submitted to his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales.—London News.

BABYLON.

I climbed the cliff; I crossed the rock:
I trod the desert old;
I passed the wild Arabian's tent,
The Syrian shepherd's fold.
Behind me far were haunts of men,
Stretched into distant gray;
While spread before, lone and wide,
The plain of Shinar lay—

The boundless plain of fat fertile,
Where long, long ages back,
Al-Hallah read the silent stars,
And mete their mystic track—
Where art thou, gem of the rich earth,
City of far renown,
The glory of proud Chaldee,
The green earth's ancient crown?

Where lies the lake that, gleaming wide,
Gave back thy hundred towers?
Where are thy gardens of delight,
Thy cedar-shaded bowers?
And where, oh! where rolls rapidly
Tigris's rock-dashing river,
Past marble gates and columned towers,
Guarding thy walls forever?

There is no voice of gladness here,
No breath of song floats by;
I hearken, but the lonesome breeze
Is all that makes reply.
Solemn and lone the silent marsh
Spreads endlessly around,
And shapeless are the ruined heaps
That strew the broken ground.

Sadly above huge outlines dim
Sighs the lone willow bough,
The last, last voice of Babylon,
Its only mourner now.
Son of Mardana, by whose hand
The doomed city fell,
The swift feet of whose soldiery
Climbed tower and citadel:

Thou foundest revelry and mirth,
Thou foundest dance and song,
Thou foundest many a banquet hall
And many a joyous throng;
Like the death angel came on the
When men were rose-bowers,
And to this lone waste wilderness
The total thou hast left!

Oh! glorious were her palaces,
And arbors of fretted gold;
There rose the fane of Merodach,
The house of Belus old;
And hoary Nile was in her streets,
Where countless nations thronged;
Light footsteps glided through her homes,
And mirth to her belonged.

But prophet voices threatened her,
Even in her festal halls,
And angel fingers wrote her doom
Upon the palace walls.
At midnight came the Persian strong,
Mingling amid the crowd;
He heeded not the beautiful,
He spared not for the proud.

False was her fated river then,
Her Gods her gods of stone;
He entered at her open gates,
He passed—and she was gone.
Her place on earth shineth not,
Memorial she hath none;
Darkness and rain thou mayest find,
But never Babylon.

IT HASTETH.

Do we, amid the business, the pleasure, and the scheming of this degenerate age, comprehend our true position as Christians? Do we know that we are now amid the scenes that are swiftly winding up the present dispensation? Do we comprehend that the kingdom of God is at hand? Do we know that the Judge standeth before the door? Do we feel that soon we must see his face in gladness or in woe? Are we drunken with the golden cup? Do we sleep and riot as children of the night and of darkness? Are we about our business, or our pleasure, secure as the Sodomites on the morning of their overthrow? Have we settled down like the antediluvians, careless of the warning, and presuming upon the long-suffering of God? Do we forget that "judgment now of a long time lingereth not, and damnation slumbereth not?"

Have we fallen from the grandeur of the Christian mission? Have we left the seeking of the lost for paltry disputations, for personal controversies, for hollow compliments, and heartless, smooth speaking? Have we got so sure that God will never call us to account, that we can make compromises with error and worldliness in the spirit of mere carnal policy? Are all the old anchor hopes of the church mere whims? Are the foundations but of sand? Do we need to return to the feeding of milk again? Must we teach again to those who for the time ought themselves to be teachers what be the principles of the doctrine of Christ? Must we again lay the foundation—repentance from dead works, faith towards God, the teachings of baptisms, and of laying on of hands, and of resurrection of the dead, and eternal judgment? Must we see all these cast aside, and yet receive those that do it, and bid them God speed no matter what doctrine they bring? Will it be profitable? Will it pay? Can we make ourselves friends in this way and prosper in the work and sight of God? Or shall we find our schemes trampled in the dust by the footsteps of Providence, and learn that God would have us open, honest, guileless and sincere?

Do we need alarms to work virtue in us? Cannot we be Christians, except when we are sure of our reward or doom at some certain day or date? Or have we principle enough to do right at whatever hazard, and leave the event with God? Can we not stand for God and the right, even though we stand alone? Can we not stand unmoved, even though mocked by foes, backbitten by hypocrites, and sneered at by lukewarm friends? Can we not endure hardness as good soldiers? Can we not rejoice in honest poverty, and even in privation and toil, for the sake of Jesus Christ? Have we forgotten the fountain of sympathy, the source of blessing? Do we know the deep love that dwells in Jesus' brother-heart? Can we not cast our care on him, and leave our foes to spit their fury to the winds? Ah! there is a hiding-place for the poor and the oppressed; and when the blast of the terrible ones is as a storm, then God shelters them like a protecting wall.

Do we know the secret refuges where Jesus keeps his little ones? Have we learned that the name of the Lord is a strong tower, and that the righteous runneth into it and is safe? Have we ever, when pursued by the violence of foes and the strife of tongues felt that God came forth to deliver us, and bring us in? Have we ever felt ourselves led by him through the dark labyrinths and the narrow passages, through the straight places and the deep cut-like doors, until at length he had brought us where no foe could find or harm us, and from the turrets and battlements of his strength, bade us to look forth with uplifted heads upon the impotent rage of our enemies beneath?

Do we know where our strength is? Do we know that though we are alone with God, we have more than a majority? Do we often ask ourselves the question, Who is he that shall harm you if ye be followers of that which is good? Are we sure that they that are for us are more than they that are against us? Or do we need to hire or enrich all the hosts of Amalek, Egypt and Babylon into our ranks, in order to strengthen our hands? Is quantity so much more important than quality? Do we know that the day is coming when numbers will not count? Do we understand that before the great white throne no policy, hypocrisy, nor subterfuge can avail? Are we aware that majorities there are nothing? that sounding trumpets are there but sounding brass? that every act and word and thought must there be weighed?

"There shall sit the Judge unerring,
No just sentence then deferring."

Do we comprehend that that scene and that day are at hand? Do we hear the distant thunder that portends the coming storm? Do we mark the dire abominations that abuse and wear out the long-suffering of God? Do we hear the low mutterings which herald on the earthquake's tramp? Do we know that ten thousand voices of Providence and prophecy unite to cry, "The great day of the Lord is near; it is near, it hasteth greatly, even the voice of the day of the Lord; the mighty man shall cry there bitterly?"

It hasteth! Are we ready for that day? It hasteth! Is our work done? It hasteth! Are our treasures and possessions safe from its fires? It hasteth! Are our lamps trimmed and burning? It hasteth! Are we doing all that we can, according to the working that worketh in us mightily, to prepare ourselves and others for its solemn grandeurs?

Men of God, awake! The day of God cometh. It hasteth. Let us be ready. Wanderer from God, the judgment storm bursts upon the world, and you are far from the fold, on the dark mountains, stumbling in your way. Lost sheep, lo! in earth's dim twilight Jesus, the Good Shepherd, goes once more to seek you, and bring you home. Will you come? Shall he find you? Shall he bring you home rejoicing, or will you stay till there gathers on your pathway the blackness of eternal night, and until you are lost forever? Shall heaven rejoice over your return, or shall Jesus, weeping, say, "How oft would I have gathered you, but ye would not?"

Man of the world, sinner in darkness and in folly, the day of the Lord cometh! This word must be sounded in your ears. This gospel must be preached in all the world, for a witness unto all nations; then shall the end come. I know you not, I may never see your face. But today I bear you this witness. I tell you these things. The kingdom of God is at hand—it cometh! and Christ shall judge the quick and the dead at his appearing and his kingdom. I testify this fact to you. God will judge you, will judge me. Pass where you may you have been warned. Today I serve this summons upon you. Meet me in the presence of the Lord in peace. Meet me at the right hand of the Judge. Meet me among those who wash their robes in the blood of the Lamb. Will you meet me among the saved in that day? If not, then I bear you witness of the judgment to come, the lake of fire, the second death. May God save you ere that day, and bring us to his kingdom in peace. Amen.—H. L. Hastings, in World's Crisis, 1862.

MISCELLANEOUS.

The morning after the Revised New Testament appeared, a celebrated minister was in the street car reading it. An intoxicated man entered, and seating near, said: "Doctor I want to talk with you about the new version." The Doctor replied: "No matter how many times the New Testament is revised it will still contain, 'No drunkard shall inherit the kingdom of God.'"

Private advices from Madagascar, dated May 30, state that the French have excited much alarm among the natives by claiming the right to establish a French Protectorate on the west coast of the island. The Malagassy government have refused to acknowledge any such right. The demand, however, has been supported by the arrival of a French man-of-war at Tamatave, and the natives are now anxious to know what view the French government will take of the matter.

SACRILEGE.

The Paris correspondent of the Telegraph states that an outrageous act of sacrilege was committed during the night of Sunday to Monday in the little church of Notre Dame de la Brosse, at Montlucon. Some miscreants broke open the gates and ransacked the whole church in search of the sacramental plate, consisting chiefly of presents from pilgrims to the shrine, which yearly attracts large numbers of visitors. The plate was not to be found, however, so after abstracting the money from the offertory boxes, the robbers made a heap of all the vestments, crucifixes, and other movable property, and set fire to the whole in the middle of the church. A gravedigger, noticing columns of smoke emerging from the windows at daybreak, gave the alarm, and assistance was procured in time to save the edifice, but not before all the property collected by the robbers had been destroyed. A similar attempt on the same church was made last year.

THE BISHOP OF MANCHESTER ON THE CRUSADE AGAINST RELIGION.

The Bishop of Manchester, who preached yesterday morning at St. Paul's, Kersal, on "The uplifted serpent," remarked in the course of his sermon that most of the congregation must have noticed during the week a placard printed in the largest letters announcing that a certain number of people would be keeping a comic festival in Manchester on that day. Such things made one think seriously, and he could hardly help asking the question, "Was then the anti-Christian spirit going to conquer in this land?" It was plain that the spirit of anti-Christ had already gone abroad. There was a crusade against religion going on in France and Italy, and there was a crusade against religion and Christianity going on in our England. Was the despised Nazarene once more to be forsaken by his faithless followers? If so then God help the world, for he had seen enough to know what the world would be without Christ and without Christian influences, and what the world had sunk to when Christ came it would become again if Christ left it.

Dr. Schweinfurth, who has been travelling in the valley of the Nile wrote not long ago that "everywhere there is one voice for Arabi Pasha; everywhere there is a childish joy that a genuine Egyptian character has asserted itself, and the people are proud of it. Everywhere there is the same Mussulman tendency to fatalism; the people are enthusiastic for a republic. The fellaheen are perfectly content with the present Government; the memory of the Ismail is to them like that of Napoleon III. in France—all execrate him. The European traveller in the interior is everywhere honored, and I have nowhere experienced the least want of respect and courtesy."

SKOBELEFF'S AMBITION FOR RUSSIA.

The following extract is from a memorandum drawn up by Gen Skobeloff not long before his death:

The political and military ideas which must in the future form the basis of our policy are those by which I have been guided, remembering, as I did, the solemn words of the late Emperor addressed to me before starting for the Tekke expedition. To my mind the central Asian question is perfectly clear and simple. If it do not enable us in a comparatively short time to take seriously in hand the Eastern question itself, why, the Asiatic hide is not worth the tanning.

I venture to think that, sooner or later, Russian statesmen will recognise the fact that Russia must have the Bosporus; that upon this depends not only her greatness but her very security from invasion, and, by implication, the development of her manufacturing and commercial centres. No one, I suppose, will dispute that, so long as we are weighed down by the Polish and West Russian question, all regular progress, in the truly national sense of the word, will be extremely difficult. At present, in spite of the blood we have poured forth, all our frontiers are open to hostile attacks, compelling us to maintain an immense army; while the Polish difficulty, thanks to the complications arising from the Austro-German alliance, keeps us in a perpetual state of siege. Not until she dominates the Bosporus can Russia make an irrevocable Finis Polonie.

THE BEAUTIFUL RUINS OF TANIS.

M. Edouard Naville has lately returned from a short tour of exploration in the Eastern Delta, where he visited the ruins of Tanis.

The ruins lie high above the marshy plain, upon a kind of plateau surrounded by an amphitheatre of low hills. These hills are the rubbish mounds of the old crude brick city, surrounding the great wall within which lay the temples and palaces of Tanis. M. Naville found himself standing in the midst of a vast waste strewn and piled with columns, architraves, obelisks, statues, and enormous blocks of hewn stone, all shattered, overturned, and showing marks of willful destruction. Traces of the tools with which the ruin was done are visible on almost every stone. In one superb colossus, which has resisted the hand of the destroyer, M. Naville found wedge holes into which wood blocks had been inserted for the purpose of splitting the granite. He inclines to think that this was the result of war and not of iconoclasm. The temple was probably occupied as a fortress in Roman times or during the middle ages, and both besieged and besiegers may have used its materials for offensive and defensive purposes.

The principal temple was built entirely of red granite brought from the quarries of Assouan, on the Nubian frontier. The difficulty of transporting these enormous blocks is quite incalculable. Fourteen obelisks, described by M. Naville as the largest in Egypt, strew the mounds with their gigantic fragments. All these and nearly all the statues and sphynxes, which appear to have lined the avenues to the principle temple, were erected by Rameses II. Not only do their inscriptions celebrate the glory of this great Pharaoh, but even the bases of these overturned monuments which rested on the ground, and were intended never to be seen by human eyes, are engraved with his well-known cartouches. Many of the colossi still retain traces of color.

M. Naville is of opinion that there is a great work to be done at Tanis in the way of excavation. The little, comparatively speaking, which has yet been accomplished there was by Mariette Pasha; but his discoveries were limited by want of time, health and funds, and much that he uncovered is again buried.

"In severe grandeur and solemnity, the ruins," says M. Naville, "surpass even those of Karnak. Herodotus, who had never seen Tanis, expatiated at much length on the beauty of Bubastis. To judge by what is left of one and of the other, Tanis must have greatly surpassed its rival. Supposing that some part, at least, was left standing—that all was not, as it now is, overthrown and shattered—I have no hesitation in saying that Tanis would have been the most beautiful ruin in Egypt."

Though exempt, by reason of its inaccessibility, from the depredations of tourists, Tanis is suffering from the fatal effects of an atmosphere laden with saline exhalations. M. Naville reports that the surfaces of these granite monuments are rapidly decaying.—Amelia B. Edwards, in the London Athenæum.

THE GOSPEL UNDER VARIOUS ASPECTS.

"Good Tidings of Great Joy."

How few see in the gospel "good tidings of great joy!" Why should not a Gentile see in the birth of Israel's Messiah cause for joy as great as that which filled the hearts of those who "waited for the consolation of Israel?" True, Israel had a national interest in the coming of their Messiah. They were outcast and downtrodden by the foreigner; and a few months before the birth of the promised deliverer, Zacharias gave utterance to the national hope—"that we should be saved from our enemies, and from the hand of all that hate us." This thought had taken firm hold of the Jewish mind and heart. The glory of national independence and supremacy, as well as the intelligence with which they held this hope, were derived from the promises of that same Jehovah who had delivered their fathers out of Egypt. And when the babe was born in Bethlehem, the angel told the shepherds—"I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be all people"—literally, "all the people"—clearly the people of Israel.

But there was nothing, either in the nature of this hope, or in the persons who cherished it, by which the "good tidings of great joy" could be limited to Israel. For while the Messiah was to be primarily and peculiarly the Deliverer of Israel, he was to be "for salvation to the ends of the earth"—the blessing of all nations as well as of Israel, and of individuals as well as nations. And before he should accomplish either the one or the other, he was to suffer and die as a sacrifice for the sins of the world. Why, therefore, we ask again, should not a Gentile see in the birth of Israel's Messiah cause for "great joy?" There is, we fear, but one answer—Few see any advantage, either personal or national, in the mission of the Messiah, either in his past, present, or future work. The great mass of men seem to be swayed by the idea of the scoffer, that "all things continue as they were from the beginning of the creation;" or at least that, however God may have interfered at any former time, he has ceased to do so; and so men have settled into practical secularism—"let us eat and drink, for tomorrow we die." To Israel, on the other hand, the future was everything. The day of Christ was a prospect that sustained them under all their trials. Even their great ancestor, Abraham, "rejoiced to see Christ's day, and he saw it and was glad;" and whatever he knew as to the sacrificial work of the Messiah, he believed the promise that "in his seed all the nations of the earth should be blessed." Their great king David, also, looked forward to the fulfilment of the "everlasting covenant ordered in all things and sure," concerning an everlasting occupancy of his throne by his Son, as "all his salvation and all his desire" 2 Sam. xxiii. 5. Hope in a future was (and is) the mark of the faithful of Israel.

But why, we ask again, should personal and even national interest in such a hope be confined to that people? Do not all men need deliverance from their natural state, morally and physically considered? Do not all nations need a just administration of government? Does the brief span of human existence satisfy or even content the great majority of our race, so that there is no room for aspirations after something more enduring? and is that existence made up from beginning to end of such unmingled felicity, that its perpetuity should be desired? Or are nations moving so surely and rapidly towards the "greatest happiness for the greatest number," as to be warranted in expecting the approach of "the good time coming" as the result of their own efforts at perfection? Do the recent terrible wars in America and Europe betoken a civilization that can afford to dispense with the presence of "the Prince of Peace?" In short, are men any better now, as moral beings, than they have been in past generations?

We have made these remarks with the view of inducing thoughtful minds to ask themselves—Have I bestowed sufficient attention on "the good tidings of great joy," so as to discover my interest in the same, and to secure my ultimate enjoyment of it? Is it possible that, after all I have attained in the matter of Scripture knowledge, I may nevertheless be of those who are "ever learning, but never able to come to the knowledge of the truth?" "How shall I escape if I neglect so great salvation?" "What must I do to be saved?" How shall I believe on the Lord Jesus Christ? Is there a right way and a wrong way of believing on him? And if so, can the right way be discovered by studying the Scriptures? Such questions as these may well be asked by every one who has been trained to view with a mysterious dread the fatalistic theology which is known by the name of John Calvin. For right answers study the words of Jesus, and of his servants John and Paul, Peter and James, with the words which were spoken before by the holy prophets; for their writing even the old "Scriptures are able to make wise unto salvation through faith which is in Christ Jesus."

J. GAMERON.

ALTONA, Iowa.

Editor Restitution:

If not presuming too much by asking space in your excellent paper, I would like to express my views and some facts in relation to prohibition in Iowa, its effects upon immigration and the development of our state. Before election the anti-amendment advocators used as an argument against the adoption of the amendment the statement that the passage of the amendment in Iowa would keep all foreigners and those who had always been used to the free use of liquors—a class of people they say, (and which is perhaps true) as industrious, prosperous and thrifty as any in the world. It may perhaps not be generally known outside of our own State that had it not been for a very large vote of the foreigners and drinking men, co-operating with the radical temperance element, the amendment would not have passed, but such are the facts, well known here.

It has now been about a month since its passage, and the tide of immigration and home seekers instead of decreasing and dying out is larger than ever before in this section. While a few, perhaps, may be kept back by the anti-liquor law, we are confident that Iowa will receive, and in fact is now receiving a larger influx of actual settlers than any other state or section of the northwest. Its lands are better, cheaper and more productive, settled with a better and more enterprising class of people than any section of the United States. With such advantages and such a people as Iowa has to control and protect them, it is not to be wondered at that prohibition form of today is "head and shoulders" above and ahead of the licensed Iowa one month ago. Labor, capital and prosperity are walking hand in hand with prohibition through northwestern Iowa, tearing up her broad and beautiful prairies and converting them into beautiful homes.

We have been compelled to feed our corn and barley to fine-legged hogs, and still we have room and employment for many more. If you don't think we are prosperous, come out and see us and be convinced. I will cheerfully give any information about the country that may be desired.

Respectfully,

TRAVIS C. LEMMETT.

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

The fourth annual Conference of the Church of God, of Western North Carolina, will meet at Concord Church on Cane Creek, Buncombe County, North Carolina, on Friday, September 1, 1882, at 3 o'clock p. m., and continue over Sunday. All are invited and especially preaching brethren. Those coming by railroad will stop at Asheville Junction, and if they will write to Brother E. M. Anderson, Arden P. O., Buncombe Co., North Carolina, they will be met at the depot with conveyance to take them to the place of meeting.

E. M. ANDERSON, Pres.
R. M. SALTS, Sec'y.

Crisis please copy.

The Piedmont A. C. C. will hold its fourth annual session with the church at Beaver Creek, N. C., commencing Friday, Aug. 25, and holding over Sunday. Persons traveling by rail will leave the train at Hickory, N. C., and go via Lenoir. J. J. HARSHAW.

The annual assembly of the Church of God will (the Lord willing) commence on Friday before the first Sunday in August, at the house of the brethren, in Winchester, Va., and will continue for several days, including the first and second Sundays. As quite a number of able speaking brethren are expected to be in attendance, the brethren of the one faith are respectfully invited to attend. All coming by rail will please inform the writer in time what day they will be at the depot, and he will meet them there and conduct them to the house of the brethren, where they will be cared for as long as it will suit them to stay.

THE LIFE EVERLASTING!

THE LIFE EVERLASTING. What is it? whence is it? whose is it? By J. H. Pettingell, A. M., (author of "Homiletical Index," "Theological Trilemma," etc.,) with a copious symposium, in which twenty representative men—clergymen, laymen, professors, doctors, and scholars—of the various churches of Europe and America, unite with the author in giving their own views of the Christian doctrine of the immortality of man. The whole constituting the most thorough and exhaustive discussion of this question now exciting such general inquiry, ever published. Just out of press. 300 pages. Price by mail $2. "THE RESTITUTION OF ALL THINGS WHICH GOD HATH SPOKEN BY THE MOUTH OF ALL HIS HOLY PROPHETS SINCE THE WORLD BEGAN."

VOL. XXXI. PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, AUGUST 9, 1882. NO. 30.

THE RESTITUTION.

TERMS—TWO DOLLARS PER YEAR, Payable in advance. Three and Six Months at the same rate.

Address all Letters and Communications to THE RESTITUTION, Plymouth, Indiana.

TO CORRESPONDENTS

This Restitution advocates the final restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a liberty belief of the gospel, repentance, and remission as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

THE FIERCE DEMOCRACY AND THE POWERS THAT BE.

The times in which we live are among the most extraordinary of the world's history. Events succeed events with a rapidity truly confounding, and of a magnitude bordering upon the marvellous. It is a great fact, and characteristic of the times, which must be apparent to every observer, that Rome, Paris, and Vienna, are the great foci from which radiate the influences which have been so potent for evil and destruction, throughout that territory formerly embraced in the Roman Empire of the West.

Nor is the East exempt; for there we observe the heaven darkening and trembling with the clouds and thunderings of the coming storm. The anarchial and destructive influences of the West have brought the Turks and Russians face to face; and England, apprehensive of the deluge, has pressed the fortification of the Island of Aden (which is the key of Egypt), and that she may strengthen herself and her Mohammedan ally, has proclaimed herself the official protectress of the Israelites in the Ottoman dominion.

Now, can these complications and combinations of our times exist, and not arouse men's minds to a scrutiny of their hidden springs? Hidden, indeed, to the actors in the scenes, and to those who search not, and care not to know; but luminously revealed in that wonderful book which unfolds, not only the destiny of individuals, but of nations, and the tyrannies which cause them to lick the dust. For the information then of all sects and parties, who believe the Scriptures of truth, I submit the following exposition of some of the things noted therein relating to the present crisis.

In Rev. xvi. it is thus written:—"And the sixth angel poured out his vial upon the great river Euphrates; and the water thereof was dried up, that the way of the kings of the east might be prepared. And I saw three unclean spirits like frogs out of the mouth of the dragon, and out of the mouth of the beast, and out of the mouth of the false prophet. They are the spirits of devils working miracles, which go forth unto the kings of the earth, and of the whole world, to gather them to the battle of that great day of God Almighty. And he gathered them together into a place called in the Hebrew tongue Armageddon."

It is admitted by all who have studied the subject with any attention, that "the great river Euphrates" is the symbol of the Turkish dominion. This being settled, it follows that the drying up of the symbol represents the evaporation of the thing signified until it ceases to exist. Hence this prophecy foretells the extinction of the Turkish empire.

In the next place "the Kings of the East," is a phrase significative of the Jews. They are styled "kings" because they belong to a city, Zion, of which it is written "the nation and kingdom that will not serve thee shall perish;" and "the first dominion shall come to Zion, and the kingdom to the daughter of Jerusalem." And they are styled "of the East" because it is the region of their nation, birth, discipline, and glory.

"The way," is indicated in these words, "there shall be a highway out of Egypt to Assyria, and the Assyrians shall come into Egypt, and the Egyptians into Assyria, and the Egyptians shall serve with the Assyrians. And Israel shall be the third with Egypt and Assyria, a blessing in the midst of the land." This every one knows is not yet accomplished. The drying up of the symbolic river is to prepare the way.

Hence the prophecy converted into literal terms will read thus: "And the the judgments of God were poured out on the Ottoman empire, that it might be abolished, preparatory to the restoration of the kingdom again to Israel."

1. The Turkish power must be finally abolished.

2. The land of Israel will next become a highway.

3. The Jews will proceed to colonize it, under the protection of Great Britain.

The next symbol of the prophecy requiring to be noticed is the "three unclean spirits like frogs." These are demoniac, destructive, and warlike influences, doing wonders in the execution of their mission. These three frogs are the armorial symbol of a power from which proceed the marvellous phenomena, contemporary with the abolishing of the Ottoman dominion. This symbol represents the agency of France, the identity of which I now proceed to establish.

2. Montfaucon, in his Monumens de la Monarchie Francoise, p. 1, plate vi., gives a Frog as one of the monuments of the French king, Childeric; thus writing respecting it:—"A Another medal representing a Frog which was also an Egyptian symbol." This was found A. D. 1623, at St. Brive, near Tournay, with some other things belonging to Childeric He reigned A.D. 456.

[Medal of a Frog found in the tomb of Childeric I.]

In the "Monde Primitif, compare avec le Monde Moderne," par M. Court de Gebelin, Paris, 1781, the author thus writes, p. 181: "Nous venons de voir que les Armoiries de la Guyenne sont un leopard, celles des Celtes (surtout les Belgiques) etoient un lion, et celles des Francs un crapaud. Le crapaud designe les marais dont sortirent les Francs."

Again, p. 195: "La Cosmographie de Munster (liv. ii.) nous a transmit un fait tres remarquable dans ce genre. Marcomir, Roi des Francs, ayant penetre de la Westphalie dans le Toxgrivit en songe une figure a trois tetes, l'une de lion, l'autre d'aigle, la troisieme de crapaud. Il consulta la dessus, ajoute on, un celebre Druide de la contree, appele Al Ramus; et celui-ci assura que cette figure designoit les trois puissances qui auroient regne successivement sur les Gaules; les Celtes dont le symbole etoit le lion, les Romains designes par l'aigle, et les Francs par le crapaud, a cause de leur marais."[*]

3. In the sixth century, xlvi. of the prophecies of Nostra Damus, (p. 251), and translated by Garencieres of London, in 1672. occurs the following verse:—

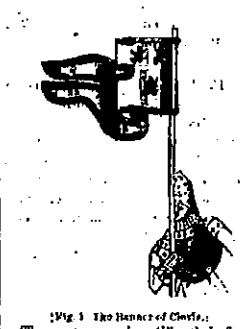
Puissante sera un exil estrange
Par Pontifuerre aux confins de mon seiglet;
Frapement au regne le fera de-croye
Roi retirant a la Mare et a l'Aigle.

On which Garencieres observes—"By the eagle he meaneth the emperor: and by the frog the king of France; for, before he took the fleur de lieu, the French bore Three Frogs."

4. In Pynson's edition of Fabyan's Chronicle, at the beginning of the account of Pharamond (the first king of the Franks who reigned at Treves about A.D. 420) there is a shield of arms bearing Three Frogs, (p. 37, Ellis edit.) with the words beneath.

[This is the Ohio Arms of France.]

The banner, (Fig. 1) having upon it the Three Frogs, is from ancient tapestry in the Cathedral of Rheims, representing battle-scenes of Clovis, who is said to have been baptized there after his conversion to Romanism.



[Fig. 1. The Banner of Clovis.]

The next engraving, (Fig. 2) is from the Franciscan Church at Innspruck; where is a row of tall bronze figures, twenty-three in number, representing principally the most distinguished personages of the House of Austria; the armor and costumes being those chiefly of the 16th century, and the workmanship excellent. Among them is Clovis, king of France, and on his shield three fleur de lis and Three Frogs, with the words underneath, "Chlodovvus der i Christenlich kunig von Frankreich:" that is, Clovis the first Christian king of France.

[Fig. 2. Armorial Shield of Clovis.]

1. Upsonus de Militari Officio, p. 155, states that three frogs were the old arms of France, without specifying what race of kings.

2. Professor Schott supposes the three frogs to have been distinctly the original arms of the Bourbons; bourbe signifying mud. This may have been the case. When their family became the dynasty of France, they probably assumed the frogs as their arms, being kings of the Franks, whose symbol it had been so long. The Bourbons rose out of the mud which is natural to frogs, and ,by the revolution of 1818 are deep in the mud again!

3. Typotious, p. 75, gives as the device on a coin of Louis VI., the last French king before Hugh Capet, the first of the Bourbons, a frog with the inscription Mihi terra buenque—land and water are mine.

4. In the 'Encyclopædia Metropolitana,' on Heraldry, it is stated that 'Paulus Emilius blazons the arms of France, argent three diadems gules;' others say, they bear three toads, sable in a field vert (ap. Gwillim, c. 1); which, if ever they did, it must have been before the existence of the present rulers.'

Such is the testimony I have to offer in the case before us. The conviction produced on my mind is, that the frogs in the prophecy are the symbol of the French democratic power. It will be seen from the armorial shield of Clovis, that the frogs and the lilies were both used as symbols. They are both indigenous to wet, or marshy, lands, and therefore very fit emblems of the French, who came originally from the marshes of Westphalia. But on the shield of Pharamond, so far back as A. D. 420, the frogs without the lilies appear in the armorial bearings of the Franks; and in the medal of Childeric I. there is no lily, but the frog only. It would therefore seem from this, that the lilies were not in the original arms, but superadded many years after; and at length adopted by the Bourbons as the symbol of their race in its dominion over the frogs. These, then, represent the nation, and the lilies, or fleur de lis, the ruling dynasty.

Let us now return to the prophecy. The Frank agency symbolized by the frogs, is characterised as 'unclean,' wonder-working, and warlike. John saw it in vision, at work contemporarily with the exhausted condition of the Euphratean, or Ottoman dominion. In his day, the Franks were undistinguished savages of the Westphalian marshes; but he saw a time coming in which, like the frogs of Egypt, they would overspread the Roman territory with their evil, but necessary and salutary influence, and come into the palaces, the royal cities, and the courts of Europe.

Of those powers he specifies three in particular; first, the dragon; second, the beast; and third, the false prophet. Each of these hath a mouth, significative of their seats whence they exercise the faculty of effective speech. The Dragon represents the power which obtains upon the territory of Asiatic Rome; and its mouth, the city of Constantinople; the Beast symbolizes the Holy Roman, or Germano-Hohenzollern Dominion; and its mouth in Vienna; and the False Prophet, the Papal; and its mouth in Rome. Upon these three principal seats of empire from which the ruling powers speak, the three Frogs—the seat of whose malarial influence is Paris—were to exercise their demoniac agency. The result of their operation upon these three points was to be, to cause to issue therefrom, Three Devilish Wonder-Working Spirits, like themselves; that is unclean' and warlike. Hence, the prophecy saith, they come out of the mouth of the Dragon, the Beast, and the False Prophet. Having issued thence, they were soon to go to the 'Kings of the Earth,' and of the whole world' or habitable. The former are the kings of Germany, Russia, Egypt, etc.; while the latter are the kings of Roman Europe, such as Belgium, France, Spain, Portugal, Sardinia, Naples, and Greece. And when they found entrance to these kings, they were so to affect them as to bring about a universal war, which shall ultimate in a great battle, styled, 'the Battle of that Great Day of God Almighty.'

Thus far the prophecy concerning the consummation of the wonder-working agency of the Frog power. It would, however, be interesting to know the field where this last great action shall be fought. This also is revealed; but before it is made known, there is a parenthesis in the symbolography, which is filled up with a gracious warning to the reader, saying:—

'Behold, I (Jesus) come as a thief. Blessed is he that watcheth and keepeth his garments, lest he walk naked, and they see his shame.'

Then the passage is resumed, and concludes by announcing that the Angel of the Sixth Vial gathered them (the kings of the earth and the whole habitable) together into a place called in the Hebrew tongue, Armageddon—a battle-field in Palestine.

Now, can any intelligent man have read these things and not at once recognize their partial accomplishment in the events of Rome, Vienna, and Paris? It is remarkable that the prophetic spirit does not symbolize the French power by the fleur de lis, but by the frogs. The former are the symbol of the Bourbon race of kings, whose lilies grew in the mud of the Frank marshes; but after the frogs possessed them. Louis VI. was the last king of the Franks, who adhered to the Frog as the symbol of his race. Hugh Capet succeeded him and became the head of the Bourbons, and since his time the lilies have been the armorial symbol of the Bourbon dynasty, which has been the legitimate and charter sovereignty of the kingdom until the fall of Louis Phillipe, in February 1848. But John, the apostle, saw a universal and final war approaching, which was to be contemporary with the overthrow, or evaporation, of the Ottoman power; and which was to be brought about, not by the unclean agency of the Bourbon lilies, but by that of the more ancient military democracy of the Frogs of Westphalia, who, in the days of the apostle, were croaking in the mud and marshes between the Rhine and the Weser, the undistinguished denizens of a howling wilderness. Had the sovereignty of France continued in the Bourbons, French opinions and principles would never have disturbed the peace of the world, so as to bring about a final break up of the European system. The Bourbons have no opinions or principles at all antagonistic to those of the diademed and mitred oppressors of the nations. Their fraternity is a selfishness, common to such as move heaven and earth to exalt family and to perpetuate its exclusive prerogatives, at all hazards, and at whatever cost to the suffering masses may be deemed expedient. Hence, to bring about the appointed consummation, Providence removed the selfish and incapable lilies—the Bourbons, always learning, but never able to gain wisdom by experience—and let loose a power, most appropriately styled by the revelator, the unclean spirits of devils. The power of these spirits has no sympathy with kings, priests, government, religion, property, respectabilities, or any thing that pertains to them. The sentence of God is against all these things as they are now constituted, because they have usurped his authority, abrogated his laws and [illegible] murdered and oppressed his saints, and entirely corrupted his way upon the earth. Hence, upon the principle that the wicked are the sword of the Lord, he hath let loose the wicked to destroy the wicked, and to bring their tyranny and institutions to an end. This power is antagonistic to all peace, law, and order. It is known amongst the nations by various names, such as socialist, communist, physical force chartism, red republicanism, democracy, Owenism, atheism, locofocoism, etc., etc., the essence of all these is one and indivisible. It is a monster, but necessary, evil in the world. It is an evil like the flood, that will sink to destroy everything before it, until the time arrives for its inundation to be stayed by the direct interposition of the Almighty.

There is great wisdom and justice in all the arrangements of God. It has been the ascendant evil of more than 1300 years, incorporated in the imperial, regal, and sacerdotal institutions of Europe, that has fostered and nurtured the earthly, sensual, and devilish spirit of the masses. The powers that be have kept the people in ignorance of the only knowledge that can make them participators of the divine nature, that is the Word of God. They have sought to indoctrinate them with the crude and jejune precepts of a dogmatic and professional theology. They have reduced them to the lowest degradation, and to the verge of destitution; and converted them into mere instruments of agriculture, and factory machines. Thus demoralized by ignorance and priestism, and goaded to desperation by oppression, the deep groans of the suffering and festering masses have roared forth in thunders of civil discord and convulsion. Knowledge of an unsanctifying character has been industriously disseminated among them, by men who have discernment enough to perceive that the social fabric is a system of fraud and violence incompatible with the benevolence of God, and the rights of man; but who are also as destitute as themselves of the truth, and the right-eousness and peace it inculcates. This mere rationalism having taken deep root in untempered and reckless hearts, has converted mankind into 'devils,' whose work is destruction; their drink, blood, and their pastime, assassination and war. Such is the fierce and demon power—the injustice, fraud, and misrule, which kings and priests, have nurtured into vigorous and gigantic life, as the scourge and avenger of their dark and sanguinary crimes against humanity.

On February 23, 1848, the unclean spirits of the devils, like frogs, left their native mud, and gained the malarial surface of the European marsh. In Paris, the subaqueous slime of its stagnant waters foamed upwards, and disengaged the most suffocating effluvia. Nothing less than 'a great earthquake,' of surpassing mightiness, heaved up the fetid sediment, and myriads of frogs into the very secret chambers of the kings. Society was convulsed to its foundations; and its most hideous dregs in a fearful crisis, constituted the arbiters of its fate. For the moment, the dissolution of the social fabric seemed imminent; but its entire wreck was delayed by the present influence of Lamartine. As the hand of Providence, he controlled the outbreak from transcending its mission, which has regard to time as well as to events. It would have reduced France to an elemental chaos; and forthwith have established an armed propagandism in behalf of 'Liberty, Fraternity, and Equality.' But the time for the establishment of this social trinity among the nations has not yet arrived: the world is not prepared for it; neither are socialists, etc., any more qualified to plant these principles in the earth, than are kings and priests, good government and righteousness. The mission of the 'fierce democracy' is war and disorganization; a visible divine interposition can alone establish peace upon the earth and good-will among men.

The spirit of the Parisian Frogs, winged by the press, and stationed by secret emissaries, soon inflamed the populace of other cities. London, Berlin, Frankfort, Vienna, Milan, Rome etc., all became the arena of democratic turbulence and fury. Civil wars, and abortive attempts at the reconstitution of society on the levelling, downward principle, ultimating in reaction, mark the present crisis of affairs; which will resolve themselves into a threefold division of Roman Europe, Rev. xvi. 19. The Frog spirit has 'worked miracles' which have astonished all the kings, courts, and people of the nations. It drove the king of the French into exile; resuscitated the Imperial Family of the Corsican; caused the abdication of the civil chief of the Holy Roman Empire; caused the Spirit of the False Prophet to Gaeta; and, in effect, placed the destiny of Turkey and Europe at the feet of the Autocrat of all the Russias. But the end is not immediately. The influence of the spirit at work in Rome, Vienna, and Constantinople, will cause a like spirit to emanate from them. 'Three unclean spirits' all of the same character as that already developed in Paris, 'spirits like frogs'—devilish and warlike—these will go forth to the kings of the continent, from Rome to the principal powers of France and Italy; from Vienna to Germany and the peoples, and from Constantinople to England, Russia, Egypt, etc., all three to the 'kings of the whole habitable' to involve them in such a war as the Roman earth has not yet experienced. Whatever may be the fortunes of its individual campaigns, its consummation will be the destruction of the oppressors of the nations, the final abolition of priestism, and its blasphemous impositions, and the preparation of the world for an age of righteousness and peace. Who would not say, Lord God Almighty, haste, O haste the day! —From Destiny of Human Governments in the Light of Scripture, by John Thomas, M. D. January, 1849.

[*] The following translation will serve for those who do not understand French. In M. Court de Gebelin's work, styled "The Primitive World compared with the Modern World," he says, "The armorial bearings of Guyenne are a leopard: those of the Celts (especially of the Belgians) are a lion; and of the French a frog. The Frog represents the countries whence the French originated." And again, "The Cosmography of Munster has transmitted to us a very remarkable fact of this kind. Marcomir, king of the French, having penetrated from Westphalia into Toxgrivia, saw in a dream a figure with three heads, the one of a lion, another of an eagle, and the third of a frog. He consulted there, it is added, a celebrated druid of the country, named Al Ramus: who assured him that this figure represented the three powers which had reigned successively over the Gauls: the Celts whose symbol was the lion: the Romans designated by the eagle, and the France by the frog, because of their marshes."

THIRTY-FOURTH CHAPTER OF EZEKIEL.

And the word of the Lord became unto me saying, Son of man prophesy against the shepherds of Israel; prophesy and say to the shepherds: thus saith a Lord, Lord, O ye shepherds of Israel. Is it customary for shepherds to feed themselves or do shepherds feed the sheep? Lo ye are devouring the milk and ye are clothing yourselves with the wool, and ye are slaughtering the fat and ye are not feeding my sheep. The weak ye have not strengthened and the sick ye have not made whole and the bruised ye have not bound up and that which hath gone astray ye have not turned back, and the lost ye have not sought for, and the strong ye have worked down with toil. And my sheep have become scattered because there are no shepherds and have become a prey to all the wild beasts of the field: and my sheep have become scattered on every mountain and upon every high hill, and upon the face of the earth have they become scattered, and there was no one to seek them out nor turn them back. Therefore O ye shepherds, hear the word of the Lord. As I live, saith a Lord, Lord, because my sheep have become a plunder and my sheep have become a prey for all the wild beasts of the plain for the reason that there are no shepherds and because the shepherds have not sought out my sheep and the shepherds have fed themselves, therefore O ye shepherds, thus saith a Lord, Lord. Lo I am against the shepherds and I will seek my sheep from out their hands, and I will turn them away from shepherding my sheep, and the shepherds shall no longer feed them. And I will take my sheep out of their mouth, and they will no longer be unto them for a prey. Therefore thus saith a Lord, Lord. I will seek out my sheep and I will care for them, even as the shepherd seeketh for his flock on a day when thick gloom and cloud are between sheep that have become separated from each other: so will I seek my sheep and I will drive them from every place where they have become dispersed on the day of cloud and thick gloom. And I will lead them from out the nations, and I will lead them together away from the countries and I will lead them into their land and I will feed them upon the mountains of Israel and in its valleys and in all the re-occupation of the land. In a good pasture I will feed them on the high mountain of Israel, and their sheep-folds will be there and they will have lain down and rested there in good enjoyment and in a fat pasture will they have been fed upon the mountains of Israel, I will feed my sheep and I will give them rest and they will know that I am Lord. Thus saith a Lord, Lord. The lost will I seek for and the straying I will turn back and the bruised will I bind up and the fainting will I strengthen and the strong will I watch over, and I will feed them with judicial equity. And O ye sheep, thus saith a Lord, Lord, lo I will discriminate between sheep and sheep, between rams and goats. And have ye not had enough of feeding in a good pasture and of treading down the rest of the pasture with your feet, and of drinking the established water and of soiling the rest with your feet? And of my sheep feeding upon what ye have trodden down with your feet and drinking the water that hath been soiled with your feet? Therefore thus saith a Lord, Lord. Lo I will discriminate between strong sheep and weak sheep. Even with your shoulders have ye pushed against their sides and with your horns have ye hooked and every failing one have ye worried out. And I will save my sheep and they shall no longer be for plunder and I will judge between ram and ram. And I will stand up over them One Shepherd and he will shepherd them, namely, my bond-servant David, and he will be their shepherd, and I the Lord will be to them for a God and David a ruler in their midst. I the Lord have spoken. And I shall have made a covenant of peace with David, and I will cause wicked wild beasts to disappear from off the land and they shall dwell in the wilderness and sleep in the thick woods. And I will allow them round about my mountain, and I will grant rain unto you, a rain of blessing. And the trees on the plain will yield their fruit and the earth will yield its strength and they will dwell upon their land in hope of peace and they will know that I am Lord when I have broken their yoke. And I will deliver them out from the hand of those who have enslaved them, and they will no longer be for plunder for the nations, and the wild beasts of the earth will no longer devour them; and they will dwell in hope, and there will no longer be one who maketh them afraid. And I will cause to stand up for them a growth of peace, and they will no longer be destroyed with famine upon the earth, and they shall no longer bear the reproach of nations, and they will know that I their God am Lord and they my royal people. O ye house of Israel, saith a Lord, Lord, Ye are my sheep and the sheep of my flock and I your God am Lord, saith a Lord. Lord.

I have followed the original exactly in translating κυριος κυριος, "Lord Lord." It is no doubt equivalent to Lord Almighty, but I suppose the translator must have had a reason and a good one for so translating from the Hebrew. For the Greek expression for Lord Almighty is "κυριος παντοκρατωρ." One can see that the prominent thought all through this chapter is the assertion of God's sovereign will and purpose and this may be the reason, however the expression is not uncommon in the prophets and is certainly significant.

THE RESTITUTION.

S. A. CHAPLIN, EDITOR.

Plymouth, Indiana, Aug. 9, 1882.

We have more from Palestine, but too late for this number. The news is becoming more interesting, and, in a prophetical point of view, important. A mighty change in human history is just before us.

REMEMBER that our conference at Rensselaer, Jasper County, Indiana, is appointed for August 25-27. It is desired that every church be represented. And will our brethren in the different congregations attend to getting up a written account of their condition to send in—especially if not personally represented. Such communications may be directed to D. T. Halstead at Rensselaer, to be read at the conference.

OUR illustrated article on "The Pierce Democracy and the Powers that be," was written a number of years ago. The author did not live to witness the later terrible effects of this demoniacal war-ceasing spirit that was invoked in the great French Revolution that convulsed Europe from 1789 to 1815. These later effects have been seen in the Crimean war, the Garibaldo-Italian war, the Austro-Sardinian war, the Franco-Prussian war, the late Turco-Russian war, and now in the present complications in Northern Africa. The future developements of this war spirit, in the fuller long-excited military disturbances of the balance of power, will finally result in the Armageddon conflict—that battle of the Great Day that will demolish the Great Image. More on these topics in the future.

CORRESPONDENCE.

PLYMOUTH, Ind., Aug. 7.

Editor Restitution:

Having spent much of the past four years in the mountain regions of Colorado, it is possible that a brief note, touching upon matters religious or otherwise, may be of interest to your readers. The country is wild, and in many places deprived of the benefits of a high civilization; and yet, in almost every community, many may be found who have obeyed the truth, and are willing to do all in their power to place its blessings within the reach of others. Mining camps are known to possess a quality and quantity of sin and iniquity rarely equalled and never excelled by other localities; and those of Colorado are no exception to the general rule.

In the cities and towns the church element is very strong, and many of the congregations are spoken of as large and prosperous. The result of this exceptional prosperity is seen in the close following of a sectarian spirit, which frequently waxes as warm in controversy as if sin in its worst form could not be seen at every corner of the street.

In the northern part of Park County are two villages, Alma and Park City, where I have been stopping since March last, and it was at the former place where I was visited by Brother H. V. Reed, of Chicago, on the first of June, where he remained until a few days ago, when we took our departure for the east. During his stay he delivered six discourses on Sundays, besides talking on the subject of temperance two or three times. His bold, forcible and eloquent presentation of gospel truth attracted the largest audiences, and aroused the greatest interest in religious subjects ever before known in that community. Men who had not attended a religious service for ten years begged that the privilege might be granted them of hearing more of that doctrine that shows the love of God, rather than his wrath, as exhibited in the plan of salvation. He spoke with more than his usual power and freedom, clearly setting forth the Christian hope of eternal life only through Christ. The interest in religious matters which his discourses aroused cannot fail to be productive of great good in that community. Should he return there, which he is urged to do, a generous welcome from warm hearts will second his efforts in the promulgation of the truth. Very Truly,

THE MAHOMEDAN MESSIAH.

It must seem surprisingly strange to those unacquainted with the facts, that the Turks should believe in a "Messiah's" coming. But with the facts of the case before us, we can see that there is a moral necessity for it.

Mahomet made up his "Koran"—his sacred book—from parts of both the Old and the New Testaments. Of course, he adopted some salient points of Bible truth. He recognized the patriarchs, had Israel; Moses and the Lord Jesus, with his second coming—more or less vaguely.

Hence, however he has misapplied prophecy, we may recognize its Divine source, as given in "The Book of God." Hence, when I recall the remarkable assurance from the Mahommedans, that their system (Koran, etc.,) is about to end, and a new one is to be inaugurated by Divine intervention, I accept it as a "finger-board," pointing the way.

The most complete and satisfactory statement of this kind was given by the New York Evening Post, July 24. The time is this year! "The El Mahdi" is named with his personal peculiarities, as described centuries ago! His appearance in the Egyptian Soudan; and his successful progress of some thousand miles toward Egypt! His aim is to end the present Caliphate of the grand Turk—that of the Sultan in Constantinople, etc.

Thus, the movement is not primarily against Christendom; but against the present order of Islamism. It presents "a house divided against itself—that cannot stand!" Amen.

The prophecy then, has its root in truth; like that of Caiaphas (John xi. 51)—"He spake not of himself; but being high priest, he prophesied!"—like that of the Midianite (Judges vii. 14)—"The sword of Gideon—into his hand hath God delivered Midian!"

This was the crowning confirmation of Gideon's faith. Thus, these modern Midianites give assurance to our faith, as to the doom of "the beast and False Prophet." J. B. COOK.

News Items.

ALEXANDRIA, Aug. 4.—The Porte has informed the Khedive's Government that it has drawn upon it for the expenses of the expedition to Egypt. Sir Auckland Colvin, the acting British Consul-General, visited all the banks today and warned them against drafts of the Turkish Government.

Affairs at Port Said are quiet. On Tuesday a quarter of a million pounds for service debt was collected in the provinces, in obedience to an order of Arabi Pasha. A Bedouin sheikh says that Arabi has about twenty thousand Bedouins, who will be sent to various parts of the coast. The sheikh also says that Arabi is in communication with the False Prophet of Soudan, and that when beaten he will not retire to Cairo, but to Wah-ed-Dakhel.

VIENNA, Aug. 5.—The news of the occupation of Suez has produced a deep impression here. England's ascendancy is now practically acknowledged. The Austrian Cabinet is using its influence to bring about an understanding between England and Turkey.

SURPRISED.

ROME, Aug. 5.—The action of the British in occupying Suez has surprised every one here.

THE PORTE DISPLEASED.

CONSTANTINOPLE, Aug. 7.—An unpleasant feeling has been caused to the Porte on account of the hoisting of the English flag on the public buildings when the British occupied Suez. The Porte has been assured that the raising of the flag has no significance. The flag displayed was that of the Consulate, and was hoisted in conjunction with the Egyptian flag. This explanation is not considered satisfactory.

INTRENCHING.

The rebels are intrenching between Aboukir and Ramleh, on the west bank of the Mahmoudieh Canal, close to the point to which they were driven Saturday.

A captured officer states that Arabi Pasha is collecting a large force on the Sweet Water Canal at Mahormah, near Ismailia, consisting of 5,000 regular infantry, 5,000 Bedouins, and 1,000 cavalry, and has twelve Krupp guns. His force is now engaged in throwing up intrenchments.

ARABI ON THE RETREAT.

The Porte has received intelligence that Arabi Pasha has ordered the garrison and population at Ismailia to retire to Cairo. Twenty-five Frenchmen will have a special escort.

ARABI WILL AVOID THE BRITISH.

It is stated that Arabi Pasha has ordered the garrisons along the Suez Canal to avoid conflicts with the British.

RUSSIA—CROPS DESTROYED BY FIRE.

BERLIN, Aug. 7.—A destructive fire occurred in Stavropol and along the Kuma river, in the Caucasus. Crops covering an area of eighty square kilometres have been burned.

Yellowfever is rampant in the southwest. At Matamoras, Mex., there were seven deaths yesterday; at Brownsville, Texas, across the Rio Grande, the Mayor and other prominent citizens are prostrated by the pestilence, and at Galveston a schooner arrived with yellow fever cases on board.

Little or nothing is heard of nowadays but wars and rumors of wars. The Russian government, it is said, has sent out orders for building three large ironclads in England, three others in France, and two transports in Germany. Public Opinion suggests that the orders given to France and Germany soon, by a process of negotiation, to point to Austria as the possible enemy. The Russian War Office, on its part, has issued orders for the camping out of an enormous force of arms, and for the completion of the fortifications of Warsaw, on which General Todleben is engaged. In addition to this, Germany is actively engaged in fortifying its coasts. In point of fact Europe is become literally and truly one stupendous arsenal—a very disquieting "sign of the times," which is not and cannot come to good. The new fortifications extend the whole length of the Baltic coast. The pass of Pillau, at the entrance of the port of Konigsberg, will be furnished with two ironclad forts, and a fort of the same kind is to be erected in the neighborhood of Memel. Eight forts, which are to protect the port of Dantzic, will shortly be finished. The Committee of Maritime Fortifications is also preparing plans for the forts destined to cover Warnemunde, the roadstead of Rostock, and the ports of Wismar and Travenmunde. The sites of defensive towers at these places have already been chosen.

THE DRIFT.

THE JEWS IN RUSSIA.

The vast populations here now for the most part have but one word on their lips, and that word is—Palestine. Newspapers and pamphlets are issued daily, not only in pure Hebrew, but also in the Jewish dialect, so everyone may be able to get information on this all-absorbing topic. Books are offered for sale to learn the Arabic language; Hebrew maps of Palestine are hung up in shops, and Jews study them with great avidity. I have visited Russia on several occasions, but never have I witnessed before such a yearning for the land of their forefathers.

My friend Dr. Benjon, agent of the British Society for the Jews, who is esteemed and beloved by many out of the 70,000 Jews that know him in this town, is rendering me invaluable assistance in my work. We have Jews with us from morning till evening; some come for the gospel, others for information about Palestine, willing to place themselves under our leadership.

With reference to the persecution my brethren have suffered, it is difficult for human pen to describe the awful things that have taken place. I visited Balta, accompanied by my friend Mr. Benson; we were most cordially received by the leading Jews of the town. The Rabbi and principal members of the community called upon us, and gave us the names of the persons who have suffered so dreadfully. It was the hand of Providence alone that saved the Jews in that town from utter destruction. In their deeds of darkness the persecutors spared neither age nor sex, and to give instances of the foul wrongs committed would only be revolting to humanity. I trust the authorities will bring the perpetrators of these crimes to condign punishment.

A private letter from one who has recently visited the persecuted Jews in Russia, whose numbers are counted there by millions, tells not only of their suffering, but of their deep desire to return to the land given to Abraham and his seed forever, and from which they have been long strangers because of their sins. We would fain hope that these sorrows are part of the plan of their tender, faithful God, of "alluring them into the wilderness and speaking to their heart." Hos. ii. 14. ### "The Lord is Risen Indeed."

Oh, glad the blessed morning!
Oh, day of sweet surprise!
When the angels watched, adoring,
And saw the Lord arise;
When women, bearing spices,
Came sorrowing to the tomb,
And found it full of glory,
Instead of death and gloom.

The Lord indeed is risen!
And death shall reign no more;
He let us the grave triumphant,
And opens wide the door;
Henceforth 'tis but the chamber
Where his weary people rest
In sweet and quiet slumber—
To rest at his behest.

A Noble Lad.

A poor boy, whose name no one knows, but we hope that it is in the Book of Life, found three little children who, like himself, had been washed ashore from one of the many wrecks, wandering along the dreary coast in the driving sleet. They were crying bitterly, having been parted from their parents, and not knowing whether they were drowned or saved.

The poor lad took them to a sheltered spot, plucked moss for them, and made them a rude but soft bed; and then, taking off his own jacket to cover them, sat by them all night long, soothing their terror till they fell asleep.

In the morning, leaving them still asleep, he went in search of the parents, and to his great joy met them looking for their children, whom they had given up for dead. He directed them where to find them, and then went on himself to find some place of shelter and refreshment.

But when the parents were returning with their recovered little ones, they found their brave preserver lying quite dead upon the snow, not far from where they had parted from him.

The long exposure in his exhausted state was too much for his little charges—a stranger to them as they to him—he lay down to die.

A sad story is this, and one that moves our hearts. How much more should our hearts be moved by the story of him who freely gave his life that he might save us from eternal death.—The Domestic Journal.

Letters to a Son—No. 2.

My Dear Son:

According to promise, I now write to you upon the credibility of the Bible as a revelation from God, and the evidence on which we receive it as such. There is much in the Bible that no one calls in question; for example, the fact that David and Solomon were kings of Israel. Yet the Divine character of the government which they exercised may be questioned. In the Bible, we have the history of various men in a similar relation, whose existence no one denies; yet unbelief sees around them a halo of myth that philosophy has in vain tried to dispel. Two of the most distinguished are Moses and Jesus. If I can succeed in establishing the claims of either of these to be a Divine messenger, it would establish the claims of the whole. The claims of Jesus to be sent from God is one of the most interesting subjects that can occupy our attention, and one about which no rational being can be indifferent or undecided.

In considering the claims of Jesus, I request your attention in the meantime to his resurrection from the dead. This is the most vital fact of the Bible; and even those who deny it must admit that, if it were true, it would be sufficient evidence of the truth of any revelation concerning God, or man, or unseen things. Thus far the alleged facts and assumed communications of the Bible are consistent. I have never met with an infidel writer who would deny that, if Jesus rose from the dead and went to heaven, everything he taught concerning himself or God or man must be truth. Hence the anxiety of the sceptic to remove this barrier to his progress. Perhaps the strongest proof of his inability to do this is his denying that he is rationally or logically bound to account for it, simply refusing belief, and giving no reason for unbelief. This is the course adopted by those who claim to be in advance of all free-thinkers. But if there were one rational and logical solution of the matter, they would not require to resort to such a subterfuge. Is not this a confession that having tried every available means of accounting for Christianity, they have failed?

But why should it be thought a thing incredible that God should raise the dead? Let us briefly examine the testimony as to the resurrection of Jesus, and see if it does not bear the stamp of credibility. In the first place, Jesus is represented as being a popular preacher, with a great many followers. Twelve of these were chosen as his apostles. From causes which I need not specify, he was accused of treason and blasphemy, and put to death by crucifixion. He was buried, and rose again from the dead, and afterwards appeared to eleven of his apostles. Of these, we have only three whose direct testimony has come down to us—Matthew, Peter, and John. Yet it seems to me that a document signed by twelve men would have given more ground for suspicion than any alleged suspicious circumstances that have been laid hold of by the opponents of truth.

The manner in which the truth was established now claims our attention. It was propagated orally, and received by many thousands before it was committed to writing. This is precisely the way in which ordinary history comes into existence. Raw historians profess to be eye-witnesses of the events they narrate; yet we do not discredit general history. Many tests can be applied to it, and very little reliance would be placed upon the testimony of professed eye-witnesses if it did not stand those tests. Now Matthew, Peter and John come before us not only as eye-witnesses, but as historians; not only asserting the fact, but giving a circumstantial detail of the incidents connected with this great event. Perhaps we are as much indebted to Luke the historian as to any eye-witness; for if we had not the Acts of the Apostles, many circumstances would be a-wanting to complete that chain which binds this event to all authentic history.

According to Luke, the resurrection of Christ formed a constant item in the preaching of the apostles—in fact, their most engrossing topic. See Acts ii., iii., iv., x., xiii., xvii., xxiii., xxvi., etc. Before the close of his history, which extended to thirty years, communities professing faith in their preaching had sprung up in all the most important cities of the Roman empire. These were not converts to some theory of philosophy or theology, but to a firm belief in those events that had professedly transpired in Judea. To suppose that these converts were made without evidence is contrary to general experience, which any one may prove for himself by making an attempt to convert men even to a mere theory; and we must hold that men are the same now as they were in the apostolic age, as there is no evidence to the contrary. Now, when these events were first committed to writing, the readers would be able to tell whether such communities existed, and whether their origin was as represented. Sceptics speak as if there had at that time been no opposition to Christianity, or as if its opponents had been incapable of detecting fraud. They thus assert their own superiority, inasmuch as what could not be done in the most favorable circumstances could be done now under those most unfavorable. But it may be asked, What bearing has the belief of thousands in the resurrection of Jesus upon the fact of his resurrection itself? Should not an event so marvellous be sustained by sufficient evidence? And why should their conviction require to be taken in connection with the history of that event itself, as the evidence upon which our faith is to rest? Thus, men do not reject the resurrection of Jesus because of the insufficiency of the evidence, but because of the thing itself. It is a miracle, and must be rejected. And the more so, as it is a miracle the truth of which is proved by other alleged miracles, seeing that the apostles wrought miracles to confirm their testimony, and appealed to the fulfilment of the words of the Jewish prophets, both in regard to the rank, life, death, and resurrection of Christ, which is itself a standing miracle. That those writings which were written so long before—and this is undisputed—should have such a literal fulfilment as we find in Jesus, is a miracle that we can easily verify by an examination of two records—the word of the prophets and the testimony of the apostles. This was the ground of the faith of the first converts. It was no mere impulse, but the result of investigation and weighing of evidence, the same as we require to exercise in order to attain to faith. To assist in developing and strengthening such a faith in you, I shall conclude this letter with a brief summary of the evidence of the resurrection of Jesus, and some of the difficulties involved in its rejection.

Jesus was crucified and buried, and on the third day his grave was found to be empty. The Jews accused his disciples of having taken away his body while the Roman watch were asleep. On the other hand, the disciples suspected the Jews of having taken away the body; for when Mary saw the tomb empty, she thought they had taken him away. It was possible the Jews might have been dissatisfied with the sealing of the stone and setting of a watch, and that, in order to be able to produce the body in the event of the disciples saying he had risen, they might try to get possession of it. If the disciples of Jesus stole his body, it is not likely they would have preached his resurrection. They did not even believe or understand him when he told them he should rise again. They were more bent on the restoration of their kingdom; and if they had been disposed to turn impostors, might rather be supposed to put forward one of their number to personate the living Christ, and make an attempt to throw off the Roman yoke and establish their kingdom. Those who can believe that the apostles stole the body of Jesus, and preached his resurrection, are far more credulous than those who believe that he rose from the dead. In the latter case, we have an adequate cause for the conduct of the first preachers; in the former we have conduct so clearly at variance with their previous views, that imagination fails to assign a reason for it. In rejecting one miracle, men must have recourse to another; for it is as great a miracle for the apostles of Jesus to preach his resurrection while they believed him to be dead, as to preach it because they were convinced of its truth.

But the disciples had not stolen the body of Jesus, and therefore could not have attempted an insurrection, and had so little faith that he would rise from the tomb that the leading men had resolved to return to their former avocation. Peter said: "I go a-fishing." "We also go with thee," said the others. But the fact of the resurrection, and the events of the day of Pentecost, account most naturally for these men becoming the preachers of the resurrection of Jesus.

Thus far for the first witnesses, their preconceptions, their capacity, and their circumstances. We have a man of another stamp in Saul of Tarsus, a man of education, and, judged by his epistles, a man of great reasoning powers, and not likely to be easily imposed upon. This man opposed with all his might the disciples of Jesus, persecuting them even to death. While on his way to Damascus for this purpose, the Lord Jesus spoke to him from heaven, which immediately convinced him of his resurrection and Messiahship. He then became a witness after the fact, and his is a most powerful testimony. We cannot conceive such a man to have been either deceived himself, or a deceiver. The conversion of Paul, taken in connection with his subsequent life and his writings, forms a most striking feature in the evidence for the resurrection of Jesus and his claims to be the Christ. Take the Acts of the Apostles, and carefully study his life, and try this truth, and you will find that it harmonizes both with the natural and the supernatural. In short, there is a perfect harmony in the Bible. If we reject the resurrection because of its supernatural character, we must reject the whole Bible. What is more supernatural than the formation of man from the dust of the ground? Yet what more natural than his returning to the dust? If Jesus rose not from the dead, dust shall man remain. "Let us eat and drink, for tomorrow we die."

It is impossible to refute the resurrection of Jesus, because there is no contrary testimony. Men say it is contrary to their experience; but this is not correct, for they have had no experience of a contrary nature. A thing may go beyond our experience, without being contrary to it. Truth rests on reliable testimony, and the harmony of one part with another. If we accept the resurrection of Jesus, we have a sure foundation for receiving all the teachings of the apostles and prophets, which shall be found to harmonize with the glorious destiny opened up to man by the resurrection of Christ.

My dear son, accept of these suggestions as incentives to thought and inquiry. If God will, some of the consequences involved in the resurrection of Jesus shall engage our attention by and by. Hoping that you will be led to love him and become one of his sincere followers, I remain your affectionate father.—Alex. D. Black, in Messenger of the Gospel.

The Lord willing, the Christian Association of Iowa will convene at Gifford, Hardin co., Iowa, that place being at the junction of the Iowa Central and Toledo & Northwestern railways. It is to be a tent meeting, and commence Aug. 31, and hold over Sunday, and longer if the interest warrants. Brother C. O. Ramsey and other able ministers are expected. Churches will send delegates at the ratio of one for every ten members or fraction over five. A general turn out is desired as it is the annual meeting.

Editor Restitution:

I recently baptized two whose attention was first called to the plan of salvation by hearing a lecture delivered at the hall in Denver last winter. Subject:—"Infidels; who they are, and why they are." They came to my hotel last week, and in company with my wife, went to the river near the town where I buried them in the water; tomb to rise, I trust, to walk in the true and living way. They are intelligent ladies, and surrounded by orthodox teachers, and I want to furnish them with truth in the form of tracts. Thus in the closing of this age a few are preparing for the coming glory. May they prove faithful to the end—and the grace of God be with them. Amen.

Editor Restitution:

I want to say to you that I was very glad you gave us that last article from J. H. Thomas, "The Word Made Flesh; or, Jesus Christ, Who is He?" I had been studying on the matter of Christ and had come to a partial knowledge of the matter, and that article threw a strong light over the subject, so that I understand it far more clearly. But there are a few passages of Scripture that he did not explain and I cannot understand as they read.

I would like, very much, to have Mr. Thomas give an explanation of John xvii. 5. This passage seems to prove that Christ existed with the Father, as a distinct person before the world was made. Many take it as positive proof, and I am not prepared to dispute it, at the same time I cannot believe it, for to my mind Scripture and religion must go together.

Respectfully,

Manners are the shadows of virtues.

Experience is the extract of suffering.

That which is bitter to be endured may be sweet to be remembered.

Adversity borrows its sharpest sting from impatience.—Bishop Horne.

Eternity is long enough to make up for the ills of our brief troubled life here.

A good deed is never lost; he who sows courtesy reaps friendship, and he who plants kindness gathers love.

Many a genius has been slow of growth. Oaks that flourish for a thousand years do not spring up into beauty like a reed.

Light will come after darkness. Springtime after winter, victory after conflict, rest after toil.

For God has marked each sorrowing day
And numbered every secret tear;
And heaven's eternal bliss shall pay
For all his children suffer here.

Let your religion be seen. Lamps do not talk, but they do shine. A lighthouse sounds no drum, it boasts no gong; yet far over the waters its friendly light is seen by the mariner.

Kind words are bright flowers of earthly existence; use them, and especially around the fireside circle. They are the jewels beyond price, and powerful to heal the wounded heart and to make the weighed-down spirit glad.

Character is human nature in its best form. It is moral order embodied in the individual. Men of character are not only the conscience of society, but in every well-governed state they are its best motive power; for it is moral qualities in the male which rule the world.

Courage, brother, do not stumble,
Though the path be dark as night;
There's a star to guide the humble;
Trust in God, and do right.
Let the road be rough and dreary,
And its end be out of sight;
Foot it bravely; strong or weary,
Trust in God, and do the right.

O sweet home-echo on the pilgrim's way!
Thrice welcome message from a land of light!
As through a clouded sky the moonbeams play,
So on Eternity's deep-shrouded night
Streams a mild radiance from that cheering word,
"So shall we be forever with the Lord."

At home with Jesus! Him who went before,
For his own people's ransom-love to prepare:
The soul's deep longings stilled, its conflicts o'er,
All rest in blessedness with Jesus there;
What home like this can the wide earth afford?
"So shall we be forever with the Lord."

With him all gathered! In that blessed home,
Through all its windless, still the gathering trade;
While ever and anon bright glimpses come
Of that fair city where the journey ends—
Where all of bliss is centred in one word,—
"So shall we be forever with the Lord."

Here kindred [illegible] and wide
By many a [illegible] of land and sea,
Or life's all-various cares and paths divide.
But yet a joyful gathering shall be—
The broken links repaired, the lost restored,
"So shall we be forever with the Lord."

O precious promise, mercifully given!
We'll may it knock the wall of earthly awe;
O'er the dark passage to the gates of heaven,
The light of hope and rapture down throw.
Thanks for the precious, life-inspiring word—
"So shall we be forever with the Lord."

OUR PLATFORM.—No. 7.

ONE LORD, ONE FAITH, ONE BAPTISM.

One faith, or the one faith essential to salvation which we must possess, or exercise, in order to please God. Faith is the substance, or groundwork, of things hoped for, or not seen. Faith that pleases God must be a belief which amounts to a reality in what God has said. Abraham believed what God said to him, it was accounted to him for righteousness although he has not yet come into the possession of the things which God promised him. Do we indeed believe the promises God made to the fathers of the Hebrew nation? Let us carefully go over the ground, and see if there is not a little unbelief that cannot be accounted to us for faith. Remember Abraham staggered not at the promises; he asked not for any testimony, he took God at his word, walked out on the naked word of God, and it was accounted to him for righteousness.

What did Abraham believe? Just what the Scriptures record, that he should be the heir of the world, that all nations should be blessed in him and his seed, the Christ. The promises are too numerous to record, in a word, Abraham's faith embraced the whole gospel scheme of human redemption, by and through God's beloved Son.

Do you mean us to understand that Abraham's faith embraced the gospel or good news of the kingdom of God? That is just what we do mean. The Scriptures foreseeing that God would justify the heathen or Gentiles through faith, preached before the gospel unto Abraham, saying, in thee shall all the nations be blessed.

Faith without works is dead. What kind of works must we have in order to please God? We must deal justly, love mercy, and walk humbly with God. What a lesson is contained in these words—deal justly—or in the Great Teacher's own words, "As ye would that all men should do to you, do ye even so to them; for on this hangs all the law and the prophets." This is called the Golden Rule. It is indeed a golden rule, but how shamefully it is ignored by the mass of professed Christians. Brother, do you believe that God takes note of our manner of buying and selling? Do we deal justly? Yes, God notes all of our actions. Even the hairs of our heads are all numbered. Do you believe that? Most certainly I do. Why, you make me tremble; I did take a little more from that poor brother. I need not have done so; my conscience does trouble me. I resolve I will make it right the next load of wood he brings; it won't make much difference, its the custom of the country—the change is never given to the poor brother, we smooth it all over and pass for good Bible Christians. God looks in the heart. Love mercy, and walk humbly with thy God; these are traits of character that must be prominent in all our doings and dealings with our fellowmen.

If the work is genuine, and our hearts are in unison with the Savior in his great work of redemption for the race, they will shine forth with brilliancy in all our work, and our enemies will be constrained to say, See how these Christians live and love one another!

Love is the fulfilling of the law. Christ's mission into our world to save Adam's lost race was one of pure love and devotion to his Father's will. Mark his holy, spotless life! Go with him into the mountain, into the garden, among the poor in all the humble walks of life—he weeps at the grave of the brother of Mary and Martha, he manifests his love by the works he performs in calling the dead to life again. Was ever love like this? While we write upon the attributes and works of our dear Redeemer, the heart beats in sympathy with him in his great work to save and redeem a lost and ruined world.

We can best manifest our faith in and our love for our glorified Redeemer by keeping his commandments. If ye love me keep my commands. It is idle to talk about having the one faith, and live in open violation of God's commandments. It is possible we may hold the faith in the letter, or theoretically, but its a dead faith; it does not work by love, nor purify the heart, nor overcome the world. What fearfulness will surprise the hypocrite when we stand in our true character before him whose eyes are as a flame of fire. I am afraid to write out what I know to be true; the truth stares me full in the face, and I tremble before a just God, and ask, Lord what will thou have me to do? We have warned, exhorted, rebuked with long-suffering, and now we say as we stand on the river's brink, here in this beautiful city, the capital of our boasted nation. If there is a man, woman, or child that I have wronged, if they will make it appear I will restore them fourfold.

I am greatly distressed, I am alone in my faith, I cry continually to God that he would cause me of my adversary; that he would send help from above and deliver me. Lord remember David in his afflictions.

THE GOSPEL UNDER VARIOUS ASPECTS.

The Gospel of the Glory of the Christ.

The birth of the Christ was "good tidings of great joy" to Israel, because of what he should accomplish for them when he should grow up to manhood and fulfil his mission as the Messiah. A part of this mission was to appear as the "man of sorrows," be "despised and rejected" of his own people, and by his obedience even to the death to give himself a sacrifice for the sins of the world. This sacrifice, accepted by his Father (attested by his being raised from the dead), became an important element of "the good tidings;" and well it might, considering it as the means of our deliverance from sin and its penalty death, even although bare life were the only blessing conferred by it. We have redemption through his blood, even the forgiveness of sins"—"Justified by his blood"—"I declare unto you the gospel, how that Christ died for our sins, and that he was buried, and that he rose again the third day"—"Worthy is the Lamb that was slain, and hath redeemed us to God by his blood." But redemption from sin and death, though an invaluable boon, is enhanced by the superaddition of glory and honor to the redeemed, as the associates of the Son of God. And so in proportion does the accepted sacrifice of Christ become "good tidings of great joy" to those who accept the cross as the way to the crown as well as to the life.

But how many stop here, and remain content with the provision of sacrifice as the only "good tidings" or gospel which God has been pleased to make known. What does any poor sinner need but a sacrifice for his sins? Why waste time in telling him about the things that God hath prepared for them that love him, when he needs to be told of God's love who "first loved us, and sent his Son to be the propitiation for our sins?" But here we require to ask what has God been pleased to reveal as good tidings or gospel for the sinner's belief? It is quite true that God sent his Son to be the propitiation for our sins; but he also sent him to preach the gospel, and that to "the lost sheep of the house of Israel," that they, and that as individual sinners, might be saved. He again chose first twelve, and then seventy, preachers of the "good tidings." And what did these divinely commissioned preachers, with Jesus at their head, proclaim through the length and breadth of Judea and Galilee, during the several years that preceded the crucifixion of their Master? Anything about a sacrifice for him?—or about the death of Jesus? So far from preaching such things, they did not even know he was to die. Thus Matthew—"From that time forth began Jesus to show unto his disciples, how that he must go unto Jerusalem, and suffer many things of the elders, and chief priests, and Scribes, and be killed, and be raised again the third day. Then Peter took him, and began to rebuke him, saying, Be it far from thee, Lord: this shall not be unto thee." And Luke—"Then he took unto him the twelve, and said unto them, Behold, we go up to Jerusalem, and all things that are written by the prophets concerning the Son of Man shall be accomplished. For he shall be delivered unto the Gentiles, and shall be mocked, and spitefully entreated, and spitted on: and they shall scourge him, and put him to death; and the third day he shall rise again. And they understood none of those things: and this saying was hid from them, neither knew they the things which were spoken." Matt. xvi. 21, 23; Luke xviii. 31–34. But all this time they preached the gospel. Luke (ix. 6) informs us "they went through the towns, preaching the gospel and healing everywhere." If they preached the gospel without preaching the death of Christ—What did they preach? They "preached the kingdom of God;" for Luke (ix. 2) informs us that Jesus "sent them to preach the kingdom of God."

The heading of this paper is a word-for-word translation of the language of Paul in 2 Cor. iv. 4, rendered in the common version—"the glorious gospel of Christ." The word rendered "glorious" is a noun signifying glory, and occurs in verse 6, where the apostle repeats the same idea in slightly different words—the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ. A similar instance occurs in 1 Tim. i. 11—"the glorious gospel of the blessed God"—literally "the gospel of the glory of the blessed God." The literal rendering of both passages expresses a truth familiar to the early church—namely, that the gospel preached by Christ and his apostles was concerning the kingdom of God—an institution which, whatever its true nature, must ever be associated with the glory of God and of his Christ, who is the delegated ruler of the divine kingdom.

Here, then, we have a gospel concerning the kingdom and glory of God and the kingdom and glory of Christ. And is it wonderful that these things should form the subject of "good tidings of great joy?" The birth of Christ was good tidings, but he had to be made perfect through suffering, and was but hence the blossoming of the promise. His accepted sacrifice was good tidings, because it was the propitiation for the sins of the world, as the proof that his obedience had been perfect, and had become, through his resurrection, the divine assurance of the world being ruled in righteousness by the Christ. Acts xvii. 31. But "the glory of the Christ" is even more directly good tidings: for it is the ripe fruit of all his work. It is in its very essence gospel, for "when he shall sit on the throne of his glory," men shall actually be "blessed in him, and all nations call him blessed." That this shall be realized at his second appearing, he has given the most distinct testimony. Compare Matt. xix. 28; xxv. 31. At this period there shall be given to him "dominion, and glory, and a kingdom, that all people, nations, and languages should serve him." Dan. vii. 13, 14. The chief nation shall be Israel; and is it not when this glorious reign becomes an accomplished fact, that the predicted announcement of the gospel by the evangelical prophet, shall find its true fulfillment and date of preaching—"How beautiful upon the mountains are the feet of him that bringeth good tidings, that publisheth salvation, that saith unto Zion, Thy God reigneth!"

REPORT OF A DISCUSSION.—No. 1.

I will now send you a report of a discussion held and just closed, between Elder B. Cobb, of the Christian (or Campbellite) church, and myself. I saw by a notice in THE RESTITUTION that Elder Hugh Barnhill, of Argos, Indiana, was visiting a son about fifty miles east of us, and desiring the company and assistance of some dear brother in the faith, I dropped him a letter requesting that he would come here and stay with us during the debate. He arrived at my house on Monday evening, July 17, and on the morning of the 19th we started for the place of discussion, sixteen miles distant, westward. We arrived in good season, and found our opponent on the ground. The prospect was not good for an audience, this being a busy season. But we waited a little, while some gathered in, and we soon had a small crowd. Elder Cobb wanted to postpone the debate until cold weather, but he had already postponed twice since May, and we thought it best to debate the propositions now, and be done with them. Accordingly we began by Elder Cobb choosing Elder Barnhill as chairman and time-keeper.

Prop. 1. Resolved, That man is wholly unconscious between death and the resurrection. I affirm; Cobb denies.

We commenced, and spoke twenty minutes, alternately, four speeches. I showed that God created a nephesh chayah, a living creature; a person, a mortal man. Passages noticed, Gen. i. 24, 26, 27, 30; ii. 7; Job iv. 17; 1 Cor. xv. 45, 46, proving that the first man was a natural man of the earth; and not spiritual: that he lived by breathing the breath of lives, the same as all the animal kingdom, and that when he ceased to breathe, he died and became extinct the same as "all in whose nostrils was the breath of lives." Gen. vii. 22. Then we showed that after man sinned he was returned to the ground from which he was taken. Gen. iii. 19. Also that man, on account of his mortal condition, wasted away, gave up the breath and was no more, but was hid in the grave. Read Job xiv. to the end of verse 13.

My opponent replied by saying that because man was made in the "image and likeness" of God, that he was therefore of an eternal nature like God, and would never cease to exist.

I showed that a man may have a portrait or statue made in the likeness and express image of himself, and that neither one are necessarily composed of the same material, or of the same nature of himself.

My opponent said that Adam only died a moral death, on the day that he transgressed; and that was the penalty for his sins; so he became dead in trespasses and sins.

I showed that the words "moral death" was not in the Scriptures; and that such a death could not have been the penalty death; for whatever was intended in the declaration, "Thou shalt surely die;" was explained by the expression, "Dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return." And that on account of Adam's sin, this death, and not a moral death, "has passed upon all men, for that all have sinned." Rom. v. 12.

My opponent replied on Job xiv. 7–10. That because a "tree if it be cut down will sprout again; and through the scent of water it will bud and bring forth boughs like a plant," that Job wished to convey the idea that therefore man by this figure was represented as having a principle within himself that would continue to exist though the body was cut down, and that he must therefore have a conscious existence in death.

Thus closed the first session of the discussion. Adjourned to meet in the evening, when we resumed by showing that Job did not say that like as a tree that is cut down and sprouts again, so man would also sprout again and continue to exist in a conscious state while the body was cut down: but that Job said: "But man dieth and wasteth away, yea man giveth up the ghost, (or breath, Heb. ruach,) and where is he? As the waters fail from the sea and the flood decayeth and driath up: so man lieth down and riseth not till the heavens be no more. They shall not awake, nor be raised out of their sleep." And then I showed by the following Scriptures that man sleeps and rests in the dust of the earth: Job vii. 21; x. 19, 21; xvii. 13–16; Prov. xxi. 16; and then I showed that some are doomed to sleep a perpetual sleep and not wake any more, while others will awake at the resurrection of the just. I said here that it was a conceded fact that a man in sound sleep was entirely unconscious and resting. And that a man may receive injuries in the brain (the organ of thought) that will entirely suspend all thought and consciousness of being for the time; until the injured portion is restored to its proper functions, and that in the interim or this intermediate state, all is a blank. And thus in death all "thoughts perish," and "the dead know not anything." And all love, envy and hatred is gone forever. And as Hezekiah declared that the "grave and death cannot celebrate thee; nor hope for thy truth." But "the living, the living, he shall praise thee;" which shows the only kind of consciousness the Bible recognizes.

My opponent assumed (to the amusement of a major portion of the audience) that in sleep a man's mind was constantly roving and therefore proved that man had something about him that was conscious in death. My opponent admitted that man, i. e. his body, as far as we can see does die and returns to dust; but assumed that there must be a principle somewhere in man, called the "inner man," by Paul and the "spirit," that could not die or become unconscious, and quoted 1 Thess. v. 23, where Paul spoke of a "whole spirit, soul and body to be preserved blameless unto the coming of the Lord Jesus Christ." I asked him to define which of these three he would claim existed conscious in death? He said it was not the body, but was the soul or spirit. Heb. iv. 12 was also quoted, and here he found himself in a dilemma, for I showed by this Scripture, the soul and spirit could be divided asunder; which would he claim as the conscious part of man in death? He admitted that the words soul and spirit were not used interchangeably in the Scriptures of truth. He therefore assumed that it was the spirit in man that was conscious, and quoted Eccl. xii. 7: "Then shall the dust return to the earth as it was: and the spirit shall return unto God who gave it;" assuming that this occurred at death when a seperation took place, the spirit returning unto God who gave it; and would there continue in a conscious state. We replied that if the spirit which is said to return unto God, was the conscious intelligent man inside the body or "house of clay;" freed at death and returned unto God in a conscious state of bliss and happiness, it must have been there before; for mark! it must have been there before; for a thing cannot return where it has never been before; and it must be too bad to take a conscious spirit man from some happy abode and put it in a tenement of clay to live awhile in sin and misery and then return it to where it was before. But if we give words their proper meaning and if our translators were honest we would have had the sense given in the passage, thus. "Then shall the dust return to the earth as it was (in the beginning) and the breath (or spirit of life) shall return unto God who gave it" (as it was in the beginning). The Lord gave (the breath) and the Lord taketh away.

Thus closed the argument for the first day, having spoken two hours in the evening, thirty minutes each, alternately. Adjourned until 10 o'clock the next day.

Editor Restitution:

Brother Simonds has penned an address to "the Brethren and Sisters in Grand Rapids, Michigan," on the subject of "Universalism, or the Fair Chance Theory." It seems only a matter of Christian courtesy that some one of us should respond. I think some of his arguments against "Fair Chance" are sound and well expressed, while others are open to criticism. I agree with him that the passage in 1 Tim. viii. 10, "Who is the Savior of all men, especially of those that believe," does not prove the salvation of all men, and yet I cannot adopt his explanation of the passage. He says, "the salvation of all men is limited to this life, while the special salvation saves in the world to come." I think Jesus is declared to be the Savior of all men because he died for all and the salvation he has purchased by his death is offered to all, and the wicked are not saved in this life or the righteous either. The believer is only saved by hope in this life (see Rom. viii.) and that hope is that Jesus "will appear the second time without sin unto salvation." The "sun and rain and fruitful seasons" are never called salvation in the Bible, but the salvation of the gospel is defined in Rom. viii. to be the "Redemption of the body," at the resurrection of the just, when the world (or age) to come will begin. Those who neglect this great salvation cannot escape the future condemnation. This salvation is the "common salvation" of Jude—called common because offered to all in common, to Jew and Gentile alike. We do not read of "two salvations."

The explanation of 1 Tim. ii. 14, is very good. "Who will have all men to be saved, etc." "Will" in the passage is not auxiliary to have, but a principal verb. The Diaglott reads, "who desires to have all men saved" etc. Brother Simonds shows abundantly by parallel Scriptures that Jesus desired to gather and save from utter overthrow the unbelieving Jews, but they would not—that God in all ages has sincerely desired that the wicked man should turn from his evil way and live. The earnest invitations of the gospel, as well as the solemn warnings of everlasting destruction to the impenitent, show the boundless love of God toward a perishing world. He will says that this and all other passages that Universalists rely upon, should be read and interpreted in connection with those Scriptures that speak plainly of certain conditions to be complied with in order to obtain salvation and eternal life. It is true that Christ "tasted death for every man"—"gave his life a ransom for all"—"died for the ungodly," etc., "that whosoever believeth in him may not perish but have everlasting life."

I regret that I am obliged to differ in the explanation of 1 Cor. xv. 22, "For as by Adam all die, so by the Anointed also will all be restored to life." The common version does not say that all who are in Adam die, or that all who are in Christ shall be made alive, but expresses the means by which all die or will be made alive. It was through Adam's sin that death has come, so it will be through Christ that life will come. "For the hour is coming in which all that are in the graves shall hear his voice and come forth; they that have done good unto the resurrection of life, and they that have done evil unto the resurrection of condemnation." It is admitted that the resurrection of Christ is the first fruits of the great harvest of the Saints, and only those who are Christ's shall be made alive at his coming, and they alone will be fashioned like unto the glorified body of the Savior, putting on immortality and spirituality. All the passages quoted in reference to first resurrection should be read in connection with those that speak of the resurrection of the unjust after the 1000 years reign is finished, when the sea and hades shall deliver up the dead which are in them to be judged according to their works, and those not found in the book of life are cast into the lake of fire in order to the second death.

We read of those over whom the "second death will have no power," of those who will not be "hurt of the second death" and of the unbelieving and abominable of all classes who "will have their part in the lake of fire which is the second death." If we thus read we shall have the whole truth on this subject. I submit that these plain Scriptures and many others like them furnish a stronger argument against Universalism under whatever name, than the theory of non-resurrection of the unbelieving and disobedient.

EXHORTATION.

Editor Restitution:

It has been a long time seemingly since I have written any for the paper: although I am still contending for the ancient faith. I feel as though I never could let the hope of the gospel go, for what then could I rely upon when the hope is given up: all is summed up in one word—lost. O brethren and sisters let us ever be found constantly doing the will of our Master. Why? Because by so doing we will be accepted of him at his second coming and made immortal and our vile bodies fashioned like unto his glorious body. This is a thought that should incite us to act, and act in accordance with the will of God, may he help our every thought and act to be in obedience to his will, amen. The times are ominous of the winding up of the dispensation in which we are living and the ushering in of the millennial age, glorious, glorious thought! Let us cast all worldly cares from our minds, and feed our minds on spiritual food, and so much the more as we see the day approaching.

I think often of the one and that one that I know of the faith; will name a few among the many that I am deeply interested in. My dear old mother for one, may God bless her and help her by his grace to hold out faithful. I have a father that is dear to me, but he is still in darkness, the gospel is still a mystery to him; may God help him and enlighten him that he may see the gospel in its purity, is my prayer. And there is Brother Richard Chown and wife. Brother Chown has embraced the faith since I saw him last; would say to him to be firm in the faith and grow in grace, and in knowledge and try to be prepared to meet the Savior when he comes to make up his jewels. Father House and wife, Brothers Arnold, Olotfelty and wives, Brother Luther Vanderlinder and his mother, all near and dear friends of mine in the faith of the gospel. Would say as Paul says to the Philippians, "let your conversation be as becometh the gospel of Christ, that whether I come and see you or be absent I may hear of your affairs, that you stand fast in the spirit with one mind, striving together for the faith of the gospel. Let all be of good cheer remembering that it is the overcomer that wins the prize." Pray for me brethren that I may be counted one among the purified, amen.

MISCELLANEOUS.

A FLOWER IN A DEAD BABY'S HAND.

After a young child had died and had been laid away in its casket, in Auburn, a few days ago, a rosebud was plucked from a neighboring garden, and the stem was placed in one of the lifeless little hands. A day or two elapsed between this incident and the funeral ceremony. In the interval the rosebud in the hand of clay was seen to gradually unfold. When the service was held the bud had become a blossom. The phenomenon gave peculiar pleasure to the afflicted family, and was very prettily referred to by the clergyman, who compared the unfolding of the rosebud to the blossoming in heaven of the child.—Lewiston (Me.) Journal, June 17.

In the ancient city of Frankfort-on-the-Main is a tall, many-gabled house, which for years has stood gaunt, grim, and empty, with closed shutters. The house was the cradle of the Rothschilds and the birthplace of the brothers, who left the paternal nest to become the financial masters of Europe. To this house, his own birthplace, Mayer Anselme Rothschild, in 1770, brought home Gutdula Schnapper, his young wife, and in the lower story this smart business man carried on a lively traffic in old coins, jewelry, and antiquities of all kinds. But the foundation of the greatness of the family began in 1801, when, on the death of the landgrave, William IX., Meyer, who had been his banker, began to operate on his own account with the large sum of money lying in his hands. Meyer died in 1812, but his widow refused to leave her humble home, and she remained in the old house until her death, in 1849, at the age of 96. Since then the house has remained uninhabited, and will soon be nothing but a memory.

WATER-SPOUTS IN CALIFORNIA.

A series of the most destructive water-spouts ever recorded ran riot over portions of Kern, San Bernardino and Inyo counties on Friday, the 30th of June. From the line of destruction there must have been several of these fearful visitors. One of the greatest was discovered on the afternoon of that day about two miles west of Coyote Holes, on the stage road between Caliente and Lone Pine, moving north. It was terrible in its work of destruction for 150 miles in extent. For nine miles it followed the line of the stage road, and swept it away completely. In places it plowed the track of the road thirty feet in depth. The Supervisors of Kern county have sent a force of men and teams to remake the road. This spout came through the mountains at Walker's Pass, leaving a line of destruction of 150 miles.

The same, or another spout, south of Coyote Holes, swept across the line of the new Atlantic and Pacific Railroad, where a most surprising spectacle was found. The water washed the roadbed away, but the rails remained, and held the debris of the storm in miscellaneous confusion. In the mass of matter arrested by the rails and ties were two grizzly bears, a large number of coyotes, jack-rabbits, wild cats, various kinds of snakes, about 500 of them rattlesnakes, many coiled around the rails to save themselves from being whirled any further and being killed by the flying mass of stones, gravel and all manner of matter that was hurled along by the resistless storm.

About the same time on the opposite side of the mountains, on the South Fork of Kern river, another spout came down the canyon and carried away a few farms and covered the land with water. In Tejon Pass another similar storm came roaring out to the plain, destroying the little Indian village in an instant, carrying away their horses, houses, dogs, cornfields and vineyards, and drowning several of the Indians and wounding nearly every one more or less. The great dry plain for twenty miles north, to Panpa, was converted into a lake, which slowly settled away into the hot and thirsty soil.

Already there appear to be found the tracks of four of these wonderful storms that moved from south to north. As they all came from a part of the country where there is no water, the question naturally arises, where did the water come from? Those who saw the floods say that the water came in a body, as if a lake had instantly fallen on the earth. Who has lost any lakes? If any, speak! The only lakes near the source of these storms are dry lakes, which everybody who ever saved it over would be glad to lose, without [illegible] reward for their return. It is possible that this great cataclysm may not be an unmixed evil. The great furrows plowed by the gigantic forces must change the features of the country very materially. In this change it is altogether probable that veins of metal have been exposed along its track.

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

The fourth annual Conference of the Church of God, of Western North Carolina, will meet at Concord Church on Cane Creek, Buncombe County, North Carolina, on Friday, September 1, 1882, at 2 o'clock p. m., and continue over Sunday. All are invited and especially preaching brethren. Those coming by railroad will stop at Asheville Junction, and if they will write to Brother E. M. Anderson, Arden P. O., Buncombe Co., North Carolina, they will be met at the depot with conveyance to take them to the place of meeting.

E. M. ANDERSON, Pres.
E. M. SALTS, Sec'y.

Christ. please copy.

The Piedmont A. C. C. will hold its fourth annual session with the church at Beaver Creek, N. C., commencing Friday, Aug. 25, and holding over Sunday. Persons traveling by rail will leave the train at Hickory, N. C., and go via Lenoir.

I am sorry you could not return when East, by the way of Suspension Bridge, which is only two miles below Niagara Falls. I am living and enjoying life half-way between the two places. For more than 30 years I have desired to see thee, and enjoy a social visit, and hear thee preach. But I suppose it is otherwise decreed, hence all right.

But it is possible that some of the readers of our paper are wondering what has become of the old pilgrim brother, therefore I will inform them that I am among the living—and living for the kingdom. I believe the time is due for the colonization of Israel in Palestine to commence, and that God is in the Palestine move! I cannot doubt it for a moment. But I am in my 73d year, hence I cannot labor as in former years with my hands, neither can I travel and preach as much.

Since my last article in THE RESTITUTION, I have spent some eight days with the Brethren in Darlington. Had as formerly a blessed season with them at their own pleasant and quiet homes, in conversation upon important themes. On Sunday we had as formerly a good turn-out. Pres'n came from the Townships of Clark, Darlington, and Whitby. It was pleasant to greet once more these brethren and their families, and the friends of truth, with whom I have labored for twenty-eight years, a part of the time. Some have fallen asleep in Jesus this past year. This makes me sad. In the morning I gave a discourse predicated upon Rom. viii. 17. At 3 p. m. I gave one upon the signs of the times. Closed the services by eating the memorial supper. And it was truly a heavenly season.

On the last Sunday in June our annual grove meeting was held in the Township of Norwich in Brother A. J. Davis' grove one and three-fourths miler east of the village, it being the 24th grove meeting I have held in that neighborhood. The audience as usual was large, and good attention was given to my message. My subject in the a. m. was the "Restruction of society upon a permanent basis—where it must commence—and its result." In the afternoon "the reign of Jesus and his co-rulers—its work to be accomplished under his reign." The Lord will I am to preach in the same grove on the last Sunday in June 1883. On the first Sunday in July our annual meeting, was held on the ground near Sadenburg, which was the 16th that I have held in that place. The day as usual was fine. The congregation was the largest that we ever had in that place, good judges thought there was 1000 out. Better attention could not be expected. In the morning I spoke upon "The signs of our times." In the afternoon I gave a discourse predicated upon Matt. xxv. 40. It is often said by some of my brethren that the preaching of the non-resurrection or non-living of the wicked will make the hearers restless and drive them away. But if those brethren had been present they would have changed their minds. It is now 23 years since I have firmly believed and taught that none but the elect, the family of God would ever get out of the grave. And I have yet to learn that the doctrine, where I have labored, has caused division, or hard feeling among brethren, except one brother whom I was requested to receive.

Men and women of mind and influence came some fifteen miles to these meetings on purpose to hear—persons whom it must be manifest—and its result." In the afternoon "the reign of Jesus and his co-rulers—its work to be accomplished under his reign." The Lord will I am to preach in the same grove on the last Sunday in June 1883. Men and women of mind and influence came some fifteen miles to these meetings on purpose to hear—persons whom it must be manifest have heard me for the past [illegible] proceeding from a being; a state of mind or feeling; the atmosphere or breath of life. The word "spirit" is nowhere connected with the word "immortal" or its equivalent in the Bible.

"L." quotes—"Who knoweth the spirit of man that goeth upward, or the spirit of the beast that goeth downward to the earth." He does not appear to see that this quotation is against him, for if "spirit" is the correct word to be used in the passage, and as he claims the spirit immortal, he has the beast a possessor of an immortal spirit, as the same language is applied to both man and beast, and consequently proves too much for "Learner," unless he believes that animals possess immortal spirits, which I do not. I contend that breath is the correct word to be used (in this passage), as it is the same word (ruach) translated "breath" in the same chapter, just two verses before the one referred to, and reads as follows:—"That which befalleth the sons of men befalleth hearts; ever one thing befalleth them; as the one dieth, so dieth the other; yea, they have all one ruach (breath) .... all go unto one place; all are of the dust, and all turn to dust again." Eccl. iii. 19, 20. The following passage is very plain and agrees with my comments on Eccl. xii. 7:—"Thou hidest thy face, they (man and beast) are troubled: thou takest away their breath (ruach) (then it returns to God who gave it) they die, and return to dust." Psa. civ. 29. This describes death in such terms that a mere child might understand it. The same may be said of Eccl. iii. 19, 20.

As to the spirit of the man going upward and that of the beast downward, it does not disagree with the view of the word "spirit" meaning breath in Eccl. xii. 7 as it is a fact that the beast in health or in the act of dying usually breathes out towards the earth and the man upward, or as the margin puts it—"ascending." It is not said that no one knows this spirit, or breath, but a question is simply asked concerning it. I have seen it translated thus:—"Who knoweth that the spirit of man goeth upward?" If the Bible teaches anything, it teaches that man was made out of dust (Gen. ii. 7) and that when he dies he will return to dust ("dust thou art and unto dust shalt thou return,"—Gen. iii. 19), and through Christ will be resurrected, (John v. 29; Luke xiv. 14; John vi. 44,) and if worthy will receive eternal life or immortality (Rom. vi. 23; John ii. 25,) and will then be a fit subject to "inherit the kingdom of God, which will be established on the earth." Then the "world will be ruled in righteousness" (not before) "by that man whom God hath ordained."—Bible.

The "meaning" that "L." attaches to the passage—"spirits of just men made perfect"—cannot be correct, as it reads—"Ye are come (not will come) unto Mount Zion .... and to the spirits of just men made perfect." So the spirits mentions in this passage were already made perfect. See Heb. xii. 18–24. They (the disciples) had simply come to a different state of things than that which originated under Moses. Dr. Adam Clark says:—The description in these verses does not refer to a heavenly state. The "first-born," he says, are those who first received the gospel of Christ, and who are elsewhere termed the "first-fruits"—"the spirits of just men made perfect." "L.," perhaps, is aware that men are sometimes called spirits. The Scriptures admonish Christians to be "perfect." "L." speaks of the "undying spirit" being clothed with an "undying body." He does not quote this from the Bible, for the reason that no such language is to be found there. He quotes:—"For God giveth it a body as it pleaseth him." This portion of Scripture is found in 1 Cor. xv. 38, which is the last chapter in the Bible to try to prove the conscious state of the dead from. If "L." cannot see that the little word "it" represents the seed or body sown, I think none of the rest of your readers who read the chapter will find any difficulty in seeing it that way. "It" (the body) is sown a natural (or mortal) body; it is raised a spiritual (or immortal) body. "When this mortal (body) shall put on immortality" we shall then be in an undying state, and not before.

The passage: "They thought they had seen a spirit," would be more correct if translated phantom instead of "spirit," according to some good authorities. I hope "L." does not think that the disciples believed that the spirit of some departed one had come there to scare them. That I think is too monstrous to be taken into consideration.

As space is limited, I shall have to close, although I might enlarge greatly, but I think anyone reading this in connection with the letters published in the Ontario previous to this, can see the points I wish to make. With thanks for space, yours truly,

REPORT OF LABOR SINCE OUR ANNUAL CONFERENCE.

Preached for the brethren in Watson. This is a live church of about forty members, very intelligent and generous hearted, growing in grace and the knowledge of the truth. They have great reason to rejoice, they have a very fair prospect ahead of them. Have spent some time and labor in the northern part of the State. The Free Bible Meeting at Millbrook, Mecosta county, was a grand success. I wish we could have more of this kind, I think it would be the means of getting the truth before many honest souls who would gladly accept it if they only knew what it was. Spent several days at Hesperia; there is at this place a goodly number of earnest, intelligent brethren, who are determined to go through to the kingdom in spite of all opposition. They are a very benevolent people, always remembering that the preacher has to live, and that it takes money to pay railroad fare. The people of Hesperia have suffered within the last few months with scarlet fever and diphtheria. Preached a funeral discourse Sunday, July 23rd, to a very large and attentive audience; text. Jer. xxxi. 15, 16. Oh how our heart ached for this much afflicted people, and how I long for the time to come when there shall be no more death. Went to Shelby, a fine growing town in Oceana county, by invitation. The Congregationalist friends opened their splendid church, their minister assisting me, charging his people to come and hear, while we had the exquisite pleasure of presenting the truth to a very large and attentive congregation. Hope to be able to preach to them again soon. The calls are so numerous we hardly know where to go first. The harvest is truly great, the laborers few.

"THE SLEEP OF THE DEAD."

Mr. Editor:—In your issue of the 13th inst., "Learner" says he is "driven in self-defence" to answer my last letter. Now, I was not aware that I had made an attack on his letter. On the contrary, I thought he had made a very good point in his explanation of Eccl. xii. 7. But as he had not covered the whole ground, I took it in hand to throw "more light" on the passage. After reading his last letter, it appears to me that he has changed his "colors," if I understood his first letter right. However, with God's help I will now try and meet his objections to the views I have been advocating.

It is a fact that should be apparent to every one, that if our English Bible is "as perfect as a thorough knowledge of both languages (Hebrew and English) could translate it," there would be no necessity for the translation now under way by some of the leading scholars of this age. I think this shows that the Bible we are now using is not perfect. I somewhere said that the word "breath" should be used in every case instead of the word "spirit," I claim it should be in a great many instances, and the passage referred to (Eccl. xii. 7) is one of them. So "Learner's" examples, substituting "breath" for "spirit" have no effect against what I advanced.

That I may not be misunderstood, I now state that the Hebrew word ruach, translated "spirit" in Eccl. xii. 7, is rendered in at least twenty different ways, but has four general uses as follows:—An intelligent being; an influence; breath; wind. The Greek word pneuma is rendered in at least twenty different ways, but has four general uses as follows:—An intelligent being; an influence; breath; wind. The Greek word pneuma is rendered in at least twenty different ways, but has four general uses as follows:—An intelligent being; an influence; breath; wind.

SLEEP AFTER DEATH, ETC.

Mr. Editor:—I must crave your indulgence just this once, to try and save my reputation with "Truth Seeker," for he threatens to "cut" me except I reason better than I have heretofore, and it would grieve me much to loose his good opinion. First, let me thank "T. S." for introducing me into such a good company as the translators of the lately revised New Testament, and not only them, but King James' forty-nine translators of the Bible, for they must have looked through the same "goggles" that "T. S." says the late translators and "F." did, for the forty-nine placed the punctuation where the late translators found it, and refused to alter it, and leave themselves open to the charge of violating a plain grammatical sentence, and common sense, "T. S.'s" opinion to the contrary notwithstanding. He says in his first letter that it would make better sense if they had placed it where he thinks it ought to be, after "day." The big "I" and little "u" stand out rather too boldly to comport with charity and modesty. For "charity vaunteth not itself, is not puffed up, doth not behave itself unseemingly," etc. Well, I am satisfied with my new acquaintances, and feel honored by the allusion, therefore I will not quarrel with "T. S." on that score. But the ninety odd learned, pious and highly respectable gentlemen may not feel so much flattered by the connection; and I would advise "T. S." "not to forget it."

"T. S." must possess a peculiar kind of assurance to ask "F." to interpret some dozen portions of Scripture which, if they in any way told for his argument, he would or should be only too glad to interpret himself. And I am sure the numerous readers of the Ontario will think so too. But like old Falstaff's men, "he marches them up the hill, and he marches them down again," without firing a shot. Poor tactics, "T. S."

Then the grand army of defunct fathers of ancient times, "T. S." brings up vainly supposing that he will jet le poudre dans les yeux, and so escape. "T. S." would make a poor show as a lawyer, if he were to go into court with an imposing list of commentators on jurisprudence, and expect the presiding judge to accept a list of names for valid argument. "Proof, proof, Mr. 'T. S.,'" the judge would exclaim, "do you think I will accept mere names for proof of your position as right." "T. S.," all this is bad logic, and "pas comme faut." The conclusion a disinterested jury would come to, would be that it was all a mere make-believe. "T. S." look to your ammunition; a mere display of guns and rifles will never vanquish the enemy. Blank Cartridge is fit for nothing but to amuse and compliment. The difference between "T. S." and "F." is this: "T. S." uses blank cartridges, and the powder damp at that; "F." shoots his guns and hits the mark every time. "T. S." hits nothing, how could he? A shotted gun well rammed home has a peculiar ring above blank cartridges. Listen how "F.'s" guns ring: Matt. xxii. 31, 32, That which was spoken unto you by God (to Moses on Horeb) "I am the God of Abraham, Isaac and of Jacob." God is not the God of the dead, but of the living. Yet these were dead (bodily) some 1300 years. Matt. xvii. 46, "And these shall go away into everlasting punishment, but the righteous into life eternal (synonymous terms so the lexicon says; consult it, "T. S.") Luke xx. 36, "Neither can they die any more—equal unto the angels being the children of God" (immortal). Rom. vi. 23, "The gift of God is eternal life, by Jesus Christ our Lord." "How is that for high" on the immortal topic, "T. S.?" 2 Cor. iv. 16, "For this the outward man decays, yet the inner man is renewed day by day." 2 Cor. v. 8, "To be absent from the body is to be present with the Lord" (not asleep though). Phil. i. 23, "To depart and be with Christ which is far better" (awake enjoying his society). Right Paul, prove everything. 1 Cor. xv. 44. There is a natural body, and there is a spiritual body. How is it that was not first which was spiritual, but that which was natural, afterwards that which was spiritual. Verse 53. "For this corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality." Sound reasoning, Paul; "prove all things." Learned rhetoric at the feet of Gamaliel, and divinity from Christ the Lord. In John ii. 20, Christ says: "He that liveth and believeth in me shall never die." And again, he says (John v. 24): "But is passed from death unto life" (eternal). Again, vi. 51: "If any man eat of this bread he shall live forever" (immortal). Again, xvii. 22: "The glory which thou hast given me I have given them, that they may be one as we are one; thou in me and I in them." Again Christ says: "My sheep hear my voice, and they follow me, and I give unto them eternal life," and they shall never perish. There, "T. S.," are sixteen of the twenty "plain passages" you required in your first letter to prove that the immortality of the soul was a "Bible doctrine." We will keep the balance in reserve for future use.

Thus "T. S.," I have endeavored to prove that the souls of the departed are not asleep, but are alive and actively employed, and that the soul is immortal. It cannot be otherwise, it being a tireless, sleepless, and deathless spirit. Let the body sleep or wake, the soul is active, never at rest. It may wear out the body and often does. And if the Bible be true, which I believe it is, and I hope "T. S." believes it, too, there are abundant convincing proofs of "F.'s" position, and more than enough to knock the sleeping theory higher than a kite, and annihilation also. How can punishment be everlasting that only lasts while a body is burning in a furious fire. Bosh! Farewell. "T. S." Don't cut poor

FRANKONIA.

"THE SLEEP OF THE DEAD."

Mr. Editor:—In the Ontario of the 20th inst. I see another letter on the above subject from "Frankonia," and notice that he has not yet (with one exception) made an attempt at demolishing the arguments and Bible quotations I have advanced against him in all my former communications. The exception is that of the thief on the cross. Even here he has not tried to meet my argumentative and Scriptural objections to his views on that portion of Scripture, except that he finds fault with the grammatical construction of the passage as I punctuated it. If he had paid strict attention during the "sixty-five years he has been a reader of the Bible," he would have noticed that the Bible is not a strictly grammatical book, according to the modern standard of grammar. The American Bible Union translates the passage thus:—"In that day thou shalt be with me in Paradise;" viz., the day referred to by the thief in which Christ shall establish his kingdom or restore Paradise.

"Frankonia" can now take his choice of the two constructions of the passage, or let him get away with the objections I offered (see Ontario Dec. 6th) against the readings of this passage—contained in the authorized and revised translations. Let "F." first prove that Christ was in Paradise the same day he was crucified, then it will be time enough for him to show that the thief was there with him. I did not expect "F." to accept the names of the church fathers as proof, but I merely mentioned the fact that nearly all of them (especially those living nearest the time of Christ) held the view I advocate. Barnabas, one of the fathers I referred to, was a companion of Paul and therefore should be considered as authority in this matter. I only quoted the fathers against "F." because he stated that the church universally held the doctrine of the conscious state of the dead. I simply turned his own arguments and proofs against himself, as "I have done all along and which I shall continue to do in this communication. For instance, he quotes Matt. xxii. 31, 32, which is against him as clear as noonday. Now "F." (like the Sadducees) "You do greatly err not knowing the Scriptures nor the power of God." Christ says "as touching the resurrection of the dead, (not as touching the conscious state of the dead, as "F." would pervert it) have ye not read that which was spoken unto you by God, saying I am the God of Abraham and the God of Isaac and the God of Jacob? God is not the God of the dead but of the living." Yet these were dead (bodily) some 1300 years. Luke xx. 38 adds; "for all live unto them."

Why do all live unto God? Because he intends to bring them to life again through a resurrection, and therefore he has put and will not forget them but will surely bring them to life again. Therefore, they are alive to him prospectively. If Christ had believed in the conscious state of the dead he could not have so consistently quoted the above Scripture to prove a resurrection, as the Sadducees could have replied that it as aptly proved that the dead were then alive. But as such doctrine was neither believed nor propagated by Christ it could be consistently and logically quoted by him as a proof of the resurrection. Now I prefer keeping in the good company of Christ, and therefore apply this Scripture as he did to prove a resurrection. It silenced the Sadducees and ought to silence "Frankonia." Yes "F.," I believe the punishment of the wicked will be everlasting, but what does it consist of? The Bible shows it to be death or the extinction of life, and as there is no redemption from the "second death" it is everlasting.

Proof—"Sin when it is finished bringeth forth death." Jas. i. 15. "The wages of sin is death." Rom. vi. 23. "The wicked shall utterly perish in their own corruption." 2 Pet. ii. 12. "All the wicked will God destroy." Psa. cxlv. 20. "Whose end is destruction." Phil. iii. 19. "The wicked shall be punished with everlasting destruction." 2 Thess. i. 9. "They (the wicked) shall be ashes under the soles of the feet of the righteous." "F." perhaps knows the meaning of the words perish, destroy and destruction. If not he can consult Webster's Dictionary.

I could quote hundreds of passages of Scripture agreeing with the above, but not one can be quoted successfully against them when thoroughly analyzed. "F." quotes Luke xx. 36, but he takes care not to quote the whole verse and in that way tries to make a point against me. When quoted in full it reads as follows:—"Neither can they die any more, for they are equal unto the angels and are the children of God being the children of the resurrection. It will be noticed that the reason given why they cannot die any more, etc., is because they have passed through the resurrection. I am astonished at "F." quoting such passages as they are clearly against him, but strongly in favor of the views I advance. In quoting Rom. vi. 23, he quotes another passage in my favor which reads:—"For the wages of sin is death, but the gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord." From this we learn what the consummation actually is for both the wicked and the righteous. The wicked are punished by being deprived of life, but on the contrary the righteous are given something not in their possession before, viz., eternal life. If eternal life is to be given to us, it is plain we cannot have it already inherently in the shape of an immortal soul or any other way. I therefore claim this portion of Scripture as being decidedly in my favor.

"F.'s" next is:—"Though our outward man perish yet the inward man is renewed day by day." 2 Cor. iv. 16. The "inward man" referred to in this passage cannot mean the immortal soul, as that which is immortal needs no renewing. That which is immortal cannot decay. The same Paul shows what the inward man is in Rom. vii. 22, 25. He says (verse 22). "I delight in the law of God after the inward man;" but he says, "I see another law in my members warring against the law of my mind, (or inward man)." So then with the mind ("inward man") I myself serve the law of God, but with the flesh the law of sin. This is self-explanatory. Everyone knows it to be a fact that the mind is being renewed every day. "To be absent from the body is to be present with the Lord," is his next. Paul's body was all there was of Paul, and when he is "changed in the twinkle of an eye at the last trump," he will then be an immortal being, and be absent from his mortality, or "this corruptible body," and be present with the Lord, and not before according to Paul's teaching elsewhere. For he says in 1 Cor. xv., "Thou sowest not that body that shall be .... but giveth it (the seed or mortal body sown) a body as it hath pleased him, .... for this corruptible (body) must put on incorruption, and this mortal (body) must put on immortality." In 2 Cor. iv. 14, he says "that he who raised up the Lord Jesus shall raise up us" (Paul and others) also by Jesus and shall present us with you. Paul then did not expect to be presented to the Lord until after the resurrection, when he and the Corinthian brethren (and all other brethren) would be presented together at one time. Then he would bid good by to his mortality, or mortal body and be present with the Lord. The same Paul said in writing to the Colossians: "When Christ who is our life shall appear then (not before) shall ye also appear with him in glory." Although it might be thousands of years between the death of Paul and his resurrection it will only appear as a moment of time to him, as time is not perceptible to a dead man, for the Bible says "the dead know not anything." Another passage says their thoughts, their love and their hate have perished. Still another reads: "In death there is no remembrance of God; in the grave who shall give thee thanks." Therefore when Paul departed this life the next thing in point of order was to be with Christ at the resurrection. "F." quotes, He that liveth and believeth in me (at the time of the resurrection, see context) shall never die." Therefore, any living saint that time who do not believe in Christ shall die. "I give unto them eternal life." If Christ gives unto them eternal life, it shows they have not already got it inherently through a never-dying soul, which we sometimes read about in hymn books—but never in the Bible. I think I have now shown that all of Frankonia's quotations are in harmony with the view that the dead are unconscious between death and the resurrection. In fact, I claim them all as well as anything else he could quote from the Bible as my witnesses. I defy "F." to quote one plain passage from that book to demonstrate his theory. He has not yet taken hold of any of the many passages of Scripture I have quoted in favor of the views for which I quoted them to prove. He seems to be afraid to grapple with them, for the reason that it is impossible for him to explain them in harmony with his theory. If "F." writes any more, I hope he will stick to Scripture and argument instead of bombast and slang. If a man "have not the spirit of Christ he is none of his."

Good by, "Frankonia," hoping that I may may meet you in that glorious kingdom of Christ, when the kingdoms of this world become the kingdoms of our Lord and his anointed. Thanking you, Mr. Editor, for your forbearance.

"THE RESTITUTION OF ALL THINGS WHICH GOD HATH SPOKEN BY THE MOUTH OF ALL HIS HOLY PROPHETS SINCE THE WORLD BEGAN."

VOL. XXXI. PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, AUGUST 16, 1882. NO. 31.

THE RESTITUTION.

TERMS--TWO DOLLARS PER YEAR, Payable in advance. Three and Six Months at the same rate.

Address all Letters and Communications to THE RESTITUTION, Plymouth, Indiana.

TO CORRESPONDENTS:

THE RESTITUTION advocates the doctrine of restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

ISRAEL'S PROMISED FUTURE.--No. 4.

Then shall they know that I am the Lord their God, which caused them to be led into captivity among the Heathen: but I have gathered them into their own land, and have left none of them any more there. Ezek. xxxix. 28.

Have we overstated the title of the Jews to the land of Canaan, or too highly exalted the covenant of the God of Israel with Abraham? The cause of the present dispossession of their inheritance is a two-fold curse. At the foot of Sinai God set before the twelve tribes, as a then united people, the alternative of a blessing or a curse, according as they should obey or disobey his commandments, his statutes, and his laws. These alternatives and their respective consequences are fully and precisely set forth by Moses in the 28th and 30th chapters of the Book of Deuteronomy, and they rejected the offered blessing, and chose the offered curse, and, rent and torn, have been drinking the bitter cup ever since. Before many generations had passed away, the ten tribes revolted, and as a punishment, were cast out into a most burdensome and inglorious captivity from which, to this day, they have never returned. The sure word of prophecy teaches us, however, that they will be gathered together, the curse entirely removed. Isa. xi. 5, 10. At the foot of Calvary the remaining tribes added to the guilt far more fearful yet; but as the times of the Gentiles are soon to be closed, the once uplifted veil of the ancient covenants shall be uplifted again; and he who now sitteth at God's right hand shall reappear in his own glory, and his Father's glory, and the glory of the holy angels, and the glory of the risen and translated saints, to take his seat as repentant Israel's King, upon the now lapsed throne of David, and reign thereon for a thousand years with Israel's proud oppressors for his footstool.

But all Jewish history is not one sad tale of woe, nor written in the minor key of the curse. It has its lofty Hallelulahs not less than its lowly laments. Ransomed of the Lord, these outcasts of the blood of Abraham, now, as a nation so dismantled and dismembered, and apparently so hopelessly extinct, and as a nation so discontented, at least with some exceptions, trodden down, persecuted and dispersed in the cities of every land, in the isles of the sea of all the world, shall before long return, in all the fulness of their tribes, and come unto Zion with songs and everlasting joy upon their heads; and they shall obtain joy and gladness; and sorrow and sighing shall flee away. The sulphurous cloud of Sinai, with its angry terrors, shall be rent in twain, and the glorious Sun of Zion shall burst in millennial glory upon them.

Closing now, for a while, the sacred pages, let us turn from the considerations of the ancient covenants, from the antiquity and perpetuity of the house of Israel, as displayed by these covenants, and from the cause of their present dispossession of their inheritance, to some of the providences of God, manifested by history and observation, which indicate so prophetically that a lofty destiny, be its precise ordering and incidents what they may, awaits the present and the future of the house of Israel.

At that time will I bring you again, even in the time that I gather you; for I will make you a name and a praise among all the people of the earth when I turn back your captivity before your eyes, saith the Lord. Zeph. iii. 20.

For the realization of the promise of this passage, we notice first among those providential indications the vigor and vitality which the Jewish mind has always displayed, and now displays, when compared with the long since extinct vitality and effete energies of the many great and powerful races and nations that have been contemporary with them in the successive periods, and throughout the whole course of their history. Not reverting to the earlier periods of Jewish history in this regard, let us direct our attention to more recent periods, to the facts of observation rather than to the facts of history, though indeed to the facts of both.

This smitten people, these pariahs of the earth, so scattered by the curse as to be wholly without any power of associated effort or combined action; sitting so lightly amid the combinations of other nations, and never forming a part in them, except with a not disloyal reservation in their own behalf; contending against odds such as no other nations ever contended against; surmounting perils such as they never surmounted; weathering storms such as they never weathered, have baffled a supernatural servitude of eighteen hundred years, and baffle it never more victoriously still. While the great empires of Babylon, and Persia, and Greece, and Rome, represented under the symbols of Daniel and the Revelations, have, within a period of three or four hundred years at the most, sunk beneath their lesser perils, these despised children of a completely disintegrated nationality now sit in triumph on the ruins of them all; but most of all that which under Titus drove its ruthless share across the sacred heights of Zion, and defiled the Temple of God. They now, incredible as it may appear, wield a most commanding influence, and fill, illustriously fill, more positions of trust and seats of power than any other nation. How matchless will be their energies when concentrated, as we know from prophecy that in the end they will be within the limits of a single nationality, and a single land.

But the hiding of the power of the Jews is finance, enthroned in their vaults of silver and gold. Look at the financial influence of the Jews in Parliament, to which among the Jewish members, six eminent bankers, including two members of the house of Rothschilds. Jewish influence has reigned in Parliament these many years. The Jews govern the money market and the money market governs the world. There are individual Jews however, whose financial power is more vast than that of any government. There lives in London a Jew, a plain man, in manners as simple as a child, whose scrawls on the back of a piece of paper, an insignificant bit of beaten rag, is worth more than the royal word of kings, or the plighted faith of republics: who, bent over upon the errand of his tribe, has loaned to the various European States within the last twenty-six years, more than five hundred and seventy millions of dollars, and could afford to pay the debt to any one of them any morning that the whim might seize him. The Holy Land is, virtually, under mortgage to the Rothschilds, a mortgage which no Gentile power dares to meddle with. On the same golden pinacle with Rothschilds stands Sir Moses Montefiore, the eminent London banker, and not less eminent philanthropist.

These facts—not to add to the list, which might be swelled indefinitely with others of similar import, force the inference upon the inhabitants of this Republic that the Jewish nation has been thus wonderfully upheld and preserved amid the mutations that have befallen other nations, and caused their downfall and extinction, for some special purpose in the counsels of the Divine Providence, and that an extraordinary and lofty purpose. The inference thus to be derived from them naturally prepares our minds for the predictions of prophecy concerning the future glory of the house of Israel. In their light history and Revelation are seen to be walking hand in hand to the accomplishment of a specific and great result, which, however, Revelation fully reveals.

A single illustration more of the unimpaired vigor of the Jewish mind, and we dismiss this portion of the argument. A few years since, the house of Rothschilds was applied to by the Russian Government for a loan. They had previously given offence to the Czar by representations in favor of the Polish Jews; but this displeasure was forgotten in the financial embarrassment that now impended over him. The Rothschilds were applied to. The elder Rothschild went himself to St. Petersburg, where he was waited upon with reference to the proposed loan, by the minister of finance of the Russian Government, Count Canerin, a Lithuanian Jew of pure Hebrew descent. The loan was connected with the affairs of Spain. From St. Petersburg the Rothschild proceeded to Madrid, where he had a conference with the minister of finance of the Spanish Government, Count Mondizabel, an Aragonese Jew of pure Hebrew descent. Thence he proceeded to France, where he conferred with the Premier of the French Government, Marshal Soult, a Parisian Jew of pure Hebrew descent. Negotiations respecting the loan were now ended. The Rothschilds offered the Czar their terms, and he accepted them.

Such is a single instance of the financial and consequent political power of the Jews in Europe. Our authority for the facts concerning this loan is a recent Lord of the Exchequer, in the foremost commercial capital in the world, a Jew, and one of the most astute and accomplished of living statesmen.

Thus, while no old Babylonian, with a pride of national perpetuity as towering as Babel itself, nor Persian; nor witty and accomplished Greek, in whom was so beautifully enshrined the genius of classical antiquity, whose genius was as universal as our race, and as individual as ourselves, whose taste and refinement and subtlety of wit, and brilliancy of achievement were so incomparable, and bore so shining an impress of earthly perpetuity; nor haughty old conscript father of Imperial Rome, march with those flaming thunderbolts of war, the decrees of the Roman Senate, in his red right arm, and with those crushing iron heels, to the conquest of a world, striving all alike for immortality, with "vate perpetuo" written on all their banners, lives to attest the majesty, or tell the story even, of the greatness of his ancient empire. On the other hand, what department of social or civil economy, of science, literature, or art, has not, in these modern times, been, and is not now, illustrated and adorned by the unconquerable genius, the unimpaired vigor, the unslackened energy, the immortal youth of this far more ancient nation. Oceans may overwhelm it, mountains may press it down, but its ever ascending fires will blaze to heaven still. It heeds not, it seeks not, any terror of persecution; you may crush its petals, they will only send forth a sweeter perfume.

MRS. DAVIS AND HER MISSION.

Leaves from My Journal.

JERUSALEM, May 14, 1882.

Strange things are coming to pass. Today I have been to meeting at the Americans, and such prayers as went up for the Jews were never offered before I think. They make special supplications daily for means to care for those poor Jews who have come; and they are doing so much for them it is truly wonderful. Last week, one hundred and fifty came from Bagdad, and tomorrow will arrive thirty-six more. We must help them. They have been in quarantine six months, and it seems incredible that any one could bear so cheerfully what they have borne in their love for Jerusalem. We hear also that five thousand are on their way here from Russia. The Jews have been overwhelmed with the news; they who do not understand that the time of their restoration has come. I think, however, their eyes will soon be opened. The prophecies are really being fulfilled. I can't tell you how wonderful it all seems to me. But the churches here do not seem to notice anything unusual. They know nothing outside of the church. I am sure the day will "come upon them unawares."

Yesterday, two large cannon arrived from Constantinople. I saw them brought in in carriages. We wonder what this means? Well, they will need cannon soon, I expect. Mr. Spofford says we shall see strange events soon.

The crops are abundant, as if the land had anticipated the return of her exiled children. Oh! I hope I am one of them.

May 15. No mail from Boston today. Why don't somebody write? I hoped to hear from Mr. Marcus. We need some money for the poor Jews; the Americans are doing much. I received a letter from A. Robinson, Belleville, Canada, who reads my letters in THE RESTITUTION; he wishes to come to Palestine. I will answer him. Today we have had rain nearly all day, the wind blew almost a gale. A rainstorm on the 15th of May is an event hitherto unknown in Palestine. It is cold this evening; cold enough for a fire. I think the Lord is going to send his people plenty. If he sends the people, he will send abundant crops to feed them. We are expecting seven thousand from Russia, who must now be on their way. I forgot to tell you these Arabian Jews who come are of the tribe of Gad. The Jews tell me they have an account of them on record since the time of Ezra. We call them Jews, because they have not been converted. I will send several extracts.

FROM THE "JEWISH CHRONICLE."

"The movement for the colonization of Palestine by refugees from Russia continues to grow with rapid strides, both in Russia and in foreign countries. Among the most recently formed societies for the colonization of Palestine is one at Warsaw, where the members have pledged themselves to pay monthly contributions in aid of the fund. When it is considered that there are about one hundred thousand families in Warsaw, it will be seen that the fund raised there will, without doubt, assume large proportions. At Wilnee, where, we have previously announced, a similar society has been established, preparations are already being made for a large exodus of Jews, who intend to emigrate to the Holy Land. Societies for the same object have likewise been formed in Constantinople and Vienna. In the last named city, the meeting at which the society was organized was of a most enthusiastic character."

"According to a statement made by Herr Smolenski, the editor of the Haschachar, Mr. Laurence Oliphant, during a conversation he had with that 'gentleman' in Vienna, declared that he was seriously thinking of settling in Palestine with his family, in order that he might be of real service to the new immigrants in that country."

"According to the Gotos, 525 Jewish persons left Charkoff a fortnight ago for Palestine."

"The Hubazeleth, of Jerusalem, invites Jews from Russia to settle in Shechem, Jaffa, Acre, and other large as well as smaller towns, where skilled mechanics are urgently needed. Our contemporary holds out a promise that such handicraftsmen will be able to earn a fair living."

Extract from a correspondent of the Jewish Chronicle:—

THE MODERN EXODUS.

That history repeats itself is a trite aphorism, and its truth is again being attested by recent events. Turning our eyes to Eastern Europe, the habitation of the major portion of the children of our race, we see them once more afflicted with burdens and their lives made bitter. Once more do we see the hearts of their rulers hardened. Once more are we on the eve of an exodus.

The moment is pregnant with weal or woe of countless myriads of our descendants. It is the most awful moment of our eventful history. It is the hour for action that is approaching; and it is time for all us Israelites to be prepared to take part in the heat and burden of the day....And now, how can the hostile designs of the enemy be best turned to the advantage of Israel? It must be evident to all that to allow matters to stand in statu quo would be to court a catastrophe, unparalleled in modern times. It wants no prophetic eye to see that the Russian Empire is on the eve of one of the greatest revolutions that the world ever saw. The time has arrived for Israel to depart thence, and for the exodus, greater even than the original one, to commence. No wonder that the magnitude of the task has stunned the natural leaders of our people, and that the words of Isaiah are peculiarly applicable to the present situation: "There is none to guide her amongst all the sons whom she has brought forth, neither is there any that taketh her by the hand of all the sons that she has brought up."....But whithersoever shall the steps of the millions of Israel be bound? Shall he again, as in the exodus from Spain, betake himself to other and more friendly lands, to be again perchance, in the course of time, driven from them? No! a thousand times, No! For the sake of our unborn posterity, let this, by God's help, be the final exodus of our race. The land of promise is now subject to a Power who can barely struggle against financial difficulties. That Power is not unfriendly to Israel; his sovereign rights should be purchased with no niggard hand, and the independence of Israel established under international guarantee. What Israelite worthy of the name would hesitate in giving his quota toward the redemption of the land? Nor would those of other creeds lag in the rear. Once under a stable and just government, the land would again flow with milk and honey, and Jewish enterprise, capital and industry, combined with the geographical situation of the country, would cause prosperity once more to shine on it. Rome, Greece, and Egypt are once more numbered among the nations, and the Shophar, which announces the resurrection of Israel, the oldest born of the nations, should soon wake the echos in the mountains of Judah. To Israel, the restoration would prove an unmixed blessing, for possessing a political centre, the dread of persecution would no longer haunt her sons. Composed as the nation would be of men of one race and faith, yet of various nationalities, it would be the most cosmopolitan State that the world has ever witnessed; and when the time arrives that nations will be contented to submit their disputes to arbitration, instead of to the issue of the sword, from whence will the law be so fitted to go forth as from Jerusalem?

THE COLONIZATION OF PALESTINE.

SIR:—We, the undersigned delegates from Russia and Roumania, who met at Jaffa to deliberate upon the question of the colonization of Palestine by the Jews, and to solve the same if possible, found it necessary to unite ourselves and form a committee, whose task it is to establish the colonization of our brethren in the Holy Land on a rational basis. For this object the committee instructed from among their circle some experienced members well acquainted with Palestine, who should select suitable sites for agriculture. The committee is now in possession of the needed information relative to the colonization, and has in hand the best reports in all respects; neither does it fail in intellectual power and active operation. But one thing—funds—we are not adequately provided with.

"In the name of your driven out and plundered brethren, your honored sir, are requested to join in this sacred object with your advice and support.

"The statutes of the committee and the computation of the necessary capital for a family consisting of five souls have here been published by the committee in the Hebrew newspapers Hamagid and Hamelits.

"The question of the colonization of Palestine is of so sacred a nature that we deem it superfluous to issue a special appeal to wealthy co-religionists. The committee will consider it as a special honor if you will participate personally in furthering this colonization scheme."

S. D. LEVONTIN, Pres.
T. M. HALBOVERSEN, Treas.

M. LANDE.

The storm which commenced yesterday (May 15th) continued with sunshine till four o'clock, when the rain began to pour down in torrents; no one ever heard the like before at this season. You see, God is sending the "latter rain" in advance of his people. There is great excitement here about this new movement. The poor Jews seem overwhelmed, as the truth is forced upon them, that the time to have mercy on Zion has actually come. I, who have been looking for this great work, can hardly realize the fact that it is now even at our doors. Eight years ago, I was called by God to prepare for the greatest event in the world's history. I knew the fact but could never fully comprehend it. Soon there will be something in the Holy Land to bring all nations hither to battle. If these blessed rains continue, we shall see Paradise commencing very soon, whatever else may come.

May 22. It makes one's heart ache to see these poor people who have suffered so much persecution so cheerful, and bear their trials so trustingly. Did they deserve it? We feel that we are glad to suffer with them. I told Mr. Steinhart today that I should eat no more meat while our brethren were hungry. "Well," he said, "what will you eat?" I answered, "I will eat bread and cucumbers."

Forty-five families arrived yesterday from Russia; these are buying farms and are to settle near Jerusalem, I think.

I mailed letters today to Baron Rothschild, New York Herald, and Boston Journal, by request of Mr. Steinhart.

EXTRACTS FROM THE "JEWISH MESSENGER."

"It is becoming evident that the hearts of these downtrodden brethren of ours are turning to the land their fathers loved so well, and that they are foregoing brighter prospects of worldly prosperity elsewhere for its sake. For them to return to the Holy Land has become something more than an aspiration; it is now with them a fixed intention which they are bent on carrying out. This new factor of the Russo-Jewish problem has to be received with all who are interested in its solution, and it is an element that cannot fail to arouse the sympathy of every Jewish heart.

"They are bent on going. Notwithstanding all the attractions of American opportunities, the persecuted Jews of the East of Europe prefer to dwell in the Holy Land rather than prosper elsewhere.

"Meetings have been held at Jassy and elsewhere to organize prospecting parties to decide on the land to be chosen. The Hebrew papers which represent Russo-Hebrew opinion are full of the topic; definite projects are being formed by which large bodies may be settled in suitable spots. It is natural that the leaders of the movement should look for sympathy and assistance to English Jews, who have already taken the lead in enlisting the commiseration of Europe on their behalf. It behooves us to treat an appeal like that we publish in another column with every desire to aid in its fulfillment.

"For the last century, Jews have recognized a particular responsibility for their brethren in Palestine, and that feeling exists as strongly now-a-days as ever. It will be granted that if the proposed colonization be in any degree unsuccessful, the burden of the failure will fall in a large measure on the Jews of the West. How much better, and to speak plainly, how much more economical it would be to take measures to prevent any such failure. If this new movement results in giving new life to the Jewish community of the Holy Land, if it leads its members to the blessing of independence, a whole weight of anxiety will be removed from Israel. The accounts given of the Jews of Palestine by Mr. Sidney M. Samuel, in his admirable sketches contributed to those columns, gave a picture by no means gratifying to our sense of pride. The abuse of the Halukat, the opposition to secular education, and the absence of any adequate feeling of self-dependence, combined to present a very unflattering estimate of the Palestinian Jews, and to produce a feeling of despair about their future. The new element about to be infused may, let us hope, remedy much of this stagation.

"As far as we can observe, the majority of the would-be colonists are men of some means, prepared and willing to earn their living without external assistance. They do not ask for means of livlihood, but only for aid in transmission and settlement. A body of men such as these may rouse the same feeling of manly independence among those already settled in Palestine, and may help to raise the tone of Jewish life in the Holy Land! They ask us for assistance towards colonization. We feel confident that they will not ask in vain. As it happens, we English Jews are in a peculiarly fortunate position for assisting them. The Palestine Exploration Society, formed for antiquarian purposes, may turn out to be admirably adapted to assist in more practicable objects. The magnificent map of Western Palestine, recently issued in twenty-six sheets, gives all the slightest details of the configuration of Palestine on as large a scale as an inch to a mile. The officers of the exploration society would, we feel confident, be most ready in affording information as to the most desirable spots for settlement. Some arrangment might easily be come to by which the whole operation of choosing ground might be directed by them, who have the best knowledge of Palestine. Captain Condon has already advocated colonization, and would be ready to assist it by every means in his power.

"As for the necessary funds, it is not too much to say that these will be forthcoming as soon as English Jews are convinced of the durability or inevitableness of the movement. We imagine that most persons would agree that the present case is one to which the Montefiore Testimonial Funds might be suitably applied. Hitherto, the administration of this fund has not resulted in any very satisfactory outcome. We have now an application, which will be as pleasing to the venerable Sir Moses, in whose honor it was collected, as to the subscribers, who have always connected the fund with the Holy Land. It is certain that now the scheme of colonizing Palestine has reached a practical stage, the Jews of England will not be behind hand in giving it the assistance of their means and their sympathy.

"That such a movement deserves our sympathy, none can doubt. The yearning for the Holy Land is only quenched in Jews by the temptations of material prosperity. Palestine has been the ideal of all Jewish hearts since the Jews lost it. The Russian Jews, who are today urged by this ideal, clasp hands across the ages with the noblest spirits of our race. While history has any lessons for men, while sons revere their sires, the Holy Land cannot fail to command the sympathy and interest of the Jews.

"It does not follow that this strain of reflection is impractical because it may seem idealistic, and as may be said romantic. Romance has at least the power of arousing enthusiasm, and before enthusiasm all obstacles fall away. There are many even among English Jews who would own that it is only from an inability of self-sacrifice that they do not join their lot with those who now seek to achieve the aim that has animated the greatest Jews for the last eighteen centuries. Judaism would scarcely be recognizable without the home-sickness for the land of Israel, which has been one of the main elements, be it remembered, that has kept it alive through centuries of persecution and isolation. German "reformers" and their American followers have done their utmost to expunge the return from their prayer-books and their hearts. Yet even they would feel the stir of historical enthusiasm of the land which is to them sacred soil, and at the opposite pole of Jewish thought, the rigid orthodox cannot with any consistency refuse their heartiest sympathy for a movement that is based directly on the very words of Holy Writ. The essence of Jewish thought is action; the decrees of God must work through the will of men, and it would be utter fatalism and completely unjudaic to refuse to act, except under direct inspiration. It is scarcely too much to say that the return is beginning under our very eyes in this colonising tendency of the Russian refugees. We cannot and we will not refuse our heartiest help by personal exertion and pecuniary assistance to what may prove to be the commencement of one of the most impressive episodes in human history."

An auroral display of great beauty, though of brief duration, was witnessed in this city on Friday night, August 4. It first became noticeable about eight o'clock. The night manager of the Western Union Telegraph Company's operating rooms, said that the operators experienced some magnetic difficulty about 8:30 o'clock with the lines running to cities east and northeast, and for a time they were unable to conjecture from what cause the interference arose. But it was very marked, and finally observing the aurora he attempted to get a test of its power by a relay. He grounded a wire in New York and got another grounded in Albany, and obtained a well defined current over it, but it soon afterward exhausted itself, as the aurora in the north began to disperse.

THE RESTITUTION.

E. A. CHAPLIN, EDITOR.

Plymouth, Indiana, Aug. 16, 1882.

WE thank our kind friends who have sent us papers with important articles. We should be glad to reprint several of these if we had the room. We have been compelled to postpone quite a number of original articles from others, and editorials from our own pen.

THE letter from Europe, written by a new and highly esteemed acquaintance, J. H. Pettingell, A. M.,—the talented and learned author of "The Life Everlasting," and other works—shows the progress that the doctrine of life through Christ alone is making in trans-Atlantic countries. Scholars of the very first class are advocating this grand and primary truth of the scheme of human redemption. Many thanks to our worthy correspondent for his very interesting communication.

WE have forwarded the money sent to this office to assist Mrs. A. E. Davis in her mission and labor of love for the poor Jews in Jerusalem. We trust the Lord will protect her amid all the commotions that may more widely disturb the Orient in these closing-up times of the Gentiles. We sent a draft to her agent in Boston for $31.05, the amount received so far—doing a little ourself. We hope for direct correspondence from her soon. By a letter from Illinois we learn that some brethren there have raised quite a liberal sum for the suffering Jews in Jerusalem. Our Lord's words—"Inasmuch as ye have done it to one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me"—may have an application here. Our time for labor and sacrifice will soon, very soon close.

ALEXANDRIA, Aug. 14—8 p. m.—Last night the ironclad train went in the direction of Fort Meks. On the way it was fired upon by a party of Bedouins. The regulars on the train returned the fire, killing twenty of the enemy. Tonight a stronger force will go out.

There is much excitement at Port Said. An outbreak is thought possible at any moment. The ships are ready for action. One hundred rounds of ammunition are served nightly.

The strongest orders have been sent to the Governors of Beyrout, Damascus, and Aleppo to take exceptional care to secure public order and prevent outbreaks of the natives.

A correspondent, writing from Beyrout, says events in Egypt are greatly influencing Syrian Mussulmans. In the present situation a trifling incident would suffice to set the whole province ablaze.

LONDON, Aug. 14.—It is stated that half the marines now stationed in Ireland will proceed to Egypt as soon as possible.

CALCUTTA, Aug. 14.—It is generally believed the Indian contingent for Egypt will be raised to 10,000 men.

GIBRALTAR, Aug. 14.—The transport Lusitania has sailed for Egypt. The transport Californian and the hospital ship Carthage passed today on the way to Egypt.

MALTA, Aug. 14.—The troop-ship Euphrates and transports Pelican, Nevada, Egyptian Monarch, Viking, Marathon, and Capella have sailed for Egypt.

PARIS, Aug. 14.—Bankers' telegrams from Egypt confirm the report that Arabi Pasha will submit to the Sultan.

WOOLWICH, Aug. 14.—The transports Lydian Monarch and Tyrlot took on board today the last of the troops now here, completing the army corps ordered to Egypt. The former vessel will call at Portsmouth Tuesday for drafts from the commissariat and transport departments.

Editor Restitution:

As enquiries continue to reach me as to when the new and enlarged edition of my "Reply to Ingersoll," will appear, will you please state that the work is in press and will appear, I trust, within the ensuing few weeks, say by September 15th. It will contain about 100 additional printed pages. Many orders have been sent in already for the work, which will be supplied at the former price of fifty cents a copy, in stiff paper covers, and $1. for handsomely bound book copies, with the usual discount to the trade. As soon as issued we will send an advertisement for insertion in THE RESTITUTION. Meantime I send you some of the advanced sheets of the new work. Yours faithfully, in the love and defense of the truth.

ALLAN B. MAGRUDER.

[Will give one or two of the opening pages of this work sent us by Brother M. in our next.—ED.]

Editor Restitution:

I was pleased to see the gentle criticism of my respected and good natured neighbor, Mr. McCurry, on the few "thoughts on God," written by me and published through your kind permission in THE RESTITUTION, and as we learn by discussion sometimes, if carried on in a proper spirit, I would like to make a few additional remarks by way of reply.

The question at issue, I believe, is concerning the mission of Jesus the Christ, and the motives that actuated the Father in sending him. It is quite as important, or rather it is much more important to know what motives actuate to a deed than to know of the deed itself, if we wish to arrive at the character of the doer. This is why I contend that if the true motives that actuated the Father in the mission of his Christ, were properly appreciated, we would be emancipated from the bondage of fear into the perfect liberty of love.

I particularly combat, to the best of my ability, the usual old-fashioned conception of the subject, namely, that God the Father, displeased with mankind for Adam's sin, condemns them to eternal torments. That God the Son, (so-called) offers himself a sacrifice, and all the vengeance of his own Father is poured on his devoted head in order that mankind, being punished by proxy, are redeemed, literally bought and paid for from God's wrath. I have no hesitation in denouncing such teaching as bare-faced robbery of the omnipotent and benevolent Creator. To assert that he requires any equivalent to satisfy him—a harsh creditor, demanding dollar for dollar and cent for cent in justice! It is but a fantastic idiocrasy of the middle ages.

I am well aware there may be some texts that might be worked up to support the idea, probably some in which the word redemption occurs; but if properly read they will be seen to refer, not to purchase from God's wrath, but to redemption from our own selves and sins, from evil and from death. It will be seen that in the figurative and picturesque language of the Orient God himself is represented as the purchaser, and his beloved as the price.

My beloved critic remarks—"It has ever been a mystery to me that God should adopt this method of curing the rebellion that began in Eden." No doubt of that, and no wonder, receiving it from the standpoint that we did. There is no mystery, that is, no double or hidden meaning in the straight forward message of redemption that the Son of God bore; his coming was all "open and above board," his rejection was plain, and his public murder was before the sun. But when we are told that for some mysterious reason he had to die to "satisfy divine justice," or that the wrath of his Father clamored for his blood, it is worse than mystery, and comes pretty near, if not altogether, my conception of blasphemy, when we are told on the other hand (Ezek. xviii. 32, etc.) that God hath no pleasure in the death of him that dieth, and that (Lam. iii. 33,) he doth not willingly afflict or grieve the children of men, and that he is not willing that any should perish, etc. Saith the house of Israel, the way of the Lord is not equal; O house of Israel, are not my ways equal, are not your ways unequal?

Mr. McC. questions the rightfulness of the position I hold in the proposition that the execution of Jesus was the most desperate crime that was ever committed against God, an open outrage of his authority. Now such was it evidently considered by Peter, Acts ii. 23, when he, addressing the Jews, said, "Him.....have ye taken, and by wicked hands have crucified and slain whom God raised up;" and again Acts iii. 15, "Ye denied the Holy One and the Just, and desired a murderer to be granted unto you, and killed the Prince of life, whom God hath raised from the dead." Again, Acts iv. 27, "Of a truth against thy holy child Jesus, whom thou hast anointed, both Herod and Pontius Pilate, with the Gentiles and the people of Israel, were gathered together."

The apostles were ever bold to testify as to who was guilty of the blood of Jesus, and the high priest evidently took in the situation when he remarked to them, Acts v. 28, "Behold ye have filled Jerusalem with your doctrine, and intend to bring this man's blood upon us." Replying they said, "The God of our fathers raised up Jesus whom ye slew and hanged on a tree. Him hath God highly exalted to be a Prince and Savior."

The narrative is simple. The motives that actuated those concerned are apparent. The benignant motives of the sender and the vast, magnificent motives of the recipients. The mystery of the matter is the patience of our Maker and Benefactor, sending messenger and messages, to be scourged and killed—"last of all his Son also"—killed as well. Therefore says he, Matt. xxiii. 32, Fill up the measure of your fathers, ye serpents, ye generation of vipers, how can ye escape the damnation of hell? Wherefore I send you prophets and wise men and scribes, and some of them ye shall kill and crucify, and some of them ye shall scourge, that upon you may come all the righteous blood upon the earth, from the blood of righteous Abel to the blood of Zacharias.

So much for the crime then; that crime was man's. In glorious antithesis comes the pardon. The pardon is God's. The rescue from the grave was God's. It is the resurrection of Christ that profits us; his execution is nothing to boast about. When they slew him God raised up. See Acts ii. 24, 32; iii. 15; iv. 10; x. 40; xiii. 30, 37; xvii. 31; Rom. iv. 24; viii. 11; 1 Cor. vi. 14; xv. 15; 2 Cor. iv. 14; Gal. i. 1; Eph. i. 20; Col. ii. 12; 1 Thess. i. 10; Heb. xiii. 20; 1 Pet. i. 1. And so doth he promise to raise up all who range themselves in humility beneath the banner of the hated and the murdered One.

THE TURKISH QUESTION.

Rev. J. S. Jenckes, Jr., Rector of St. John's Protestant Episcopal Church, delivered an interesting and practical discourse on the Turkish Question yesterday morning. There was a very large and attentive assembly of hearers.

Text—"And the sixth angel poured out his vial upon the great river Euphrates, and the water thereof was dried up, that the way of the kings of the East might be prepared." Rev. xvi. 12.

I have lately heard it remarked that it is well for clergymen, if they would lead the intelligent thought of their times, or even keep abreast of it, to select for the subjects of their discourses such topics as the people are thinking about in the busy whirl of their every-day lives, and not abstract nor threadbare themes, for which nobody cares.

The present text, taken from the Book of Revelation, suggests a subject which is now of thrilling interest to the whole civilized world, as well as to many millions of people whom we do rate as civilized. And this subject, if you please, is the "Eastern Question."

This question involves the social, the political and the religious interests of all the great powers of Europe, if not also the very autonomy and existence of some of them. And although fortunately for us, five thousand miles of ocean wide, and five miles deep, lie between ourselves and the seething cauldron of European political complications, still there is no other question of such present vital concern to, at least, the commercial interests of those United States as this Turko-Egyptian or "Eastern Question." How why is it that in the very face of, perhaps, the most bountiful wheat crop we have ever had, the high price of wheat is maintained, aye, more than maintained, at Chicago?

In order to clearly understand the full nature of the great interest which surrounds this subject, and which is likely to surround it for several years to come, it will be necessary to take a hasty review of the history of Egypt and of Turkey.

From the year 622 of the Christian era dates the Mohammedan system of chronology—the year in which Mohammed left the city of Mecca and removed to Medina, from which place his remarkable career of conquests began. His successors extended still farther the dominions whose standard was the Crescent, until they became in the eighth century more extensive than even the Roman Empire in its palmiest days. This was the Empire of Arabia, whose Emperors were called Califs (signifying both the spiritual and temporal successors of the Prophet), and who reigned through different dynasties for nine hundred years.

They were a gallant, accomplished and powerful people, great in war, great in arts and sciences, and great in learning. Their architectural remains are still wonders of beauty and symmetry; their astronomers, their physicians, their poets, orators, philosophers were distinguished; their language, in which the Koran is written, is a marvel of strength and polish, and of capability of expressing the most abstruse thoughts, the most exalted sentiments with the greatest possible force, coupled with the most delicate discrimination of meaning. In this respect it greatly resembles the Greek. And these Arabs are the people who, after their astonishing vigor and military success, and after their extravagant grandeur and voluptuousness of living, and after their degeneracy and decay—the old, old story, you will perceive—were overrun and vanquished by the wretched Turks in the thirteenth to the sixteenth century. These are the people who are the ancestors of Arabi Pasha, who, through the lines of their Califs, traces his pedigree away back to Joktan, who was a son of Shem, who was the eldest son of Noah! Is it any wonder that the late dispatches inform us that Arabi looks down upon his Turkish masters with infinite derision and scorn, as an inferior race?

For the Turks were a tribe of foreign barbarians who swept down from the cold table lands of Central Asia, precisely as the Goths and Vandals, at an earlier day, swept down upon the Roman Empire and destroyed it, and crushing easily the degenerate ranks of the now effeminate Arabs, conquered their country, and made it their own. The invaders eliminated all the good and strong features of the Arabian policy derived from the teachings of Mohammed, such as (1) the maintenance of municipal liberty, (2) the practice of direct taxation, and (3) freedom of commerce. And they retained all the horrible and repulsive features of those teachings, which were (1) the intolerant propagation of their religious faith at the point of the sword, (2) the fanatical persecution of all who might differ with them in belief, and (3) a blind fatalism, which taught them that they would live until the time came for them to die, whether exposed to great danger in battle or not; and to these may be added (4) a firm belief in a sensual, material paradise, to which, if they were killed in battle, they were instantly transported, without the intervention of either a purgatory or an intermediate state.

The chief of this rude tribe, Othman I., was the founder of the Turkish—called from him the Ottoman—Empire. His successors swallowed up pretty much all the countries which the Arabs had once conquered, and appropriated to themselves the spiritual title of Calif, which their Emperor, the Sultan, still enjoys at Constantinople.

Egypt was conquered by them in 1517, and has ever since been governed by a Viceroy, now called Khedive, who is tributary to the "Sublime Porte"—this being the self-styled name of the Ottoman Government—so-called from the grand gate of the Sultan's palace, where he has, or used to have, justice administered; for it is a very long time since any justice was administered there.

The Turkish Government has for many years been extravagantly administered. When the French Empress, Eugenie, visited Constantinople in 1869, on her way to attend the opening of the Suez Canal, the Sultan, out of compliment to her Majesty, spent several millions of francs to build a macadamized road for many miles over a swamp, simply to show the Empress some natural curiosity, as a lake, or a grotto; and this, although but a single trip was to be made over the road, and it would be of no earthly use to anybody forever afterwards.

This and other extravagances have brought the Sultan and the Government deeply into debt. Over a hundred millions of pounds, or $500,000,000 worth of Turkish bonds are owned in London. Now Egypt, as a tributary of Turkey, has long paid her a large annual tribute. And this tribute, instead of being at present paid directly to Turkey, is paid by Egypt, through pressure brought to bear by the English Government, directly into the Bank of England, by Egypt, to apply as interest upon those five hundred millions of Turkish bonds.

Moreover, in 1878, the Sultan, for prudential reasons, enlarged the Khedive's powers, and granted him a quasi-autonomy in the administration of the internal affairs of that country. This enabled the then Khedive, Said Pasha, to borrow money on his personal account, and to hypothecate Egyptian productions, actual and prospective, and Egyptian credit as security for the same.

Said made good use of his opportunities, until he piled up a debt over half as large as that owed by Turkey to English capitalists. Turkey herself owes nearly as much more to Frenchmen and Austrians, and anybody else whom she can possibly borrow of. I have not had opportunity to get the present gross amount of all this indebtedness of Turkey and Egypt to the European powers; but eight years ago it was about $1,183,000,000! And the interest upon almost all of it is from six to nine per cent.! And their annual expenditures are steadily and increasingly larger than their receipts, and they are bankrupt already, both of them, if they were put into liquidation.

Now their English and French creditors succeeded lately in persuading their respective Governments to exert themselves for the protection of their interests which are represented by these bonds, and a joint English and French Commission were quartered upon the Egyptian people, with the consent—reluctant, no doubt—of both the Khedive and the Sultan.

These Commissioners, as good and shrewd business men, are looking out smartly after their employers interests. They see that the annual tribute due from Egypt to the Sublime Porte is promptly paid as the interest accrues, into the Bank of England. They have gotten rid of the extravagant old Khedive, who contracted the indebtedness through the profligacy of his life, and the lavishness of his personal expenditures, and they have secured his young son Tewfik in the succession. They have the absolute handling of all the revenues of Egypt, taking especial care that as much of it as possible is applied to the interest of the indebtedness. They have large salaries for this service, and also numerous assistants, who are not Egyptians, nominally to help them; but Arabi says they are helping them with large pay and no work, to eat out the substance of the country and the people, like a veritable swarm of Egyptian locusts. This foreign occupation has become intolerable to the native population, and they are striving vigorously to throw it off, and are using for their battle-cry the sentiment, "Egyptians shall rule Egypt," while holding in reserve another still more terrible watch word for their future rallying, and 'tis this: "Allah achbar! God is great, and Mohammed is his prophet!" And when this refrain shall begin to resound through the mountain gorges and over the arid plains of the Turkish dominions, as it now seems more than probable it soon will, it will arouse to frenzied action more than one hundred and three millions and a half of bigoted, ignorant, superstitious Mohammedans.

The reports come to us that the late events at Alexandria have suspended this joint Anglo-French arrangement for the collection and payment of this interest. And these two countries are naturally interested in re-establishing the arrangement and in maintaining Tewfik's authority, and are, accordingly, working to that end. In their efforts they do not seem to have the entire sympathy of the other Powers.

Italy and Germany seem to desire the success of Arabi Pasha, and the establishment of an independent national government in Egypt. While Russia and Austria are anxious to see Turkey interfere, by sending an army to Egypt, and becoming inextricably involved in the conflict, to her inevitable destruction, so that they may step in and administer upon her estate and partition her territory.

Was there ever such a witch's cauldron?

And to add to the gravity, and difficulty, and danger of the situation, we are advised that this is the thirteenth hundred year of the Mohammedan calendar, and that it will close on the twelfth day of next November, and that a very old Moslem prophecy positively predicts that El Mehdi, their Messiah, will publicly proclaim himself upon that day. We are assured that this mysterious personage has already put in an appearance in the country of Soudan, lying to the south of Egypt; that he has fought a battle with and gained a victory over opponents who would have barred the progress of his manifest destiny; that he is approaching, gradually but surely, the center of Mohammedan influence, where, by lifting up the standard of the Prophet and declaring himself as his successor, he can rally many millions of the fanatical followers to do his unrighteous bidding, and again send fire and sword into the rebellious ranks of infidel heretics and "Christian dogs."

So that the liability is great that when Admiral Seymour, on the morning of the 11th inst., gave orders to "let loose the dogs of war" upon the defenses at Alexandria, he not only furnished Arabi Pasha with an excellent pretext for rallying some five millions of people around the standard of National rights and self-government, but he also incurred the grave responsibility and risked the great danger which would inevitably arise to the whole of Europe from this exasperated and reckless Arabi's invoking the sympathy and aid of more than a hundred millions of fanatical Mohammedans, thus precipitating a terrible and possibly a general religious war. And what is, what has ever been, whatever can be so fearful, so calamitous as a religious war?

All wars are bad, very bad. And yet they have often seemed to be necessary. Our Savior says: "It must needs be that offenses come, but woe to that man by whom the offense cometh." "He that taketh up the sword shall perish by the sword." Such a conflict as that which is now threatened would be, in the end, terrible indeed.

There are short-sighted people who think that a general foreign war would be of great advantage to this country; that business would be very active; that we could feed them with our surplus breadstuffs, and furnish them with munitions of war, and control the carrying trade of the world, and so we see that when war is threatened, prices are advanced. But such a war would be very destructive of life, and of treasure, and of all kinds of property, and the aggregate amount of the world's wealth would be greatly diminished. It would also inflate values, and induce to excessive speculation, and be very damaging and demoralizing in many ways, and for many reasons such a result should be greatly deprecated.

But before closing I desire to refer to a class of people, whether in this country or in the Old World, whose feelings and sympathies are stirred to their utmost depths by the prospect of a general European war, with this momentous "Turkish Question" for its moving cause, and these are the students of prophecy.

There are over a hundred authors who have published more than two hundred volumes within the past twenty years, and all of them, or almost all, tending to show that the lines of prophecy converge to a point of time very near to these days in which we are now living.

These people agree, with startling unanimity, in the following interpretation of our text, which allow me to repeat: "And the sixth angel poured out his vial upon the great river Euphrates; and the water thereof was dried up, that the way of the Kings of the East might be prepared."

These students of prophecy are substantially agreed in interpreting the "Euphrates" here to mean the Turkish Empire, and the drying up of its water to refer to its gradually waning and waning until it shall be no more a Nation. And the "Kings of the East" are held to mean the Jewish people, who in God's good time are to be fully restored to his favor and to their former temporal possessions in Palestine. The Turks present, by their bigotry and intolerance, the only obstacle to the return of the Jews to the Holy Land.* Within the past month a number of these sadly persecuted people tried to go from Russia to Jerusalem, when they were peremptorily stopped by the Turkish authorities.

Now, it is almost absolutely certain that a general European war at the present juncture of affairs would result in the destruction of the Turkish Empire, and also in the restoration of the chosen people to their promised land. But over one hundred earnest, and learned, and conscientious students of prophecy tell us that the return of the children of Israel to the Land of Canaan will immediately precede the literal second coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, to overturn all earthly governments and to establish his own perfect and everlasting kingdom. I do not urge you this morning, my hearers, to take my word for this being so; but I do urge you to examine this important question for yourselves to determine whether the preponderance of evidence is not largely in its favor.

I plead with you, when such thrilling issues may be at stake, not to run any hazard of losing such great salvation as is promised in God's Word to all those who shall be watching, eagerly watching, for the coming of the Lord.

When we desire accurate and reliable information respecting any proposed business venture, or pleasure excursion, or matter of great importance in any department of this life's effort, we apply, without hesitation, to those who make such matters their constant study, and who are hence thoroughly prepared to give us the desired information.

Even so, in reference to those momentous concerns which so nearly and so vitally affect our destiny and our happiness for eternity, should we not, without hesitation, appeal for enlightenment and for guidance to those honest and earnest and capable students of prophecy? who, with such startling unanimity, instruct us that an imminent European war will, in all human probability, overthrow the power and prestige of the Turkish Empire, and remove all obstacles to the return of the Israelites to their promised possessions, and usher in promptly the golden age of the Savior's personal dominion, when the kingdoms of this world shall become the kingdoms of our Lord Jesus Christ, and he shall reign forever.

"Seeing these things are so, what manner of persons ought ye to be in all holy conversation and godliness, looking for and hasting unto the coming of the day of God.—Cincinnati Commercial.

Brevities.

Sojourner Truth, the venerable African, who is now 108 years old, has received from England a gift of a silk gown, which she declares, "I am bound to live to wear. I have started in for another hundred years, and I want to live now more than ever. There is no better world than this."

TURKEY.

The increased circulation of the Scriptures in the Turkish Empire gives substantial ground of hope for the future of the land, whatever may be the issue as to its political condition. The American Bible Society during 1881 dispersed of the 43,146 copies of portions of the Bible, a larger number by 3,023 than any year in the past, while during the same period the British and Foreign Bible Society put into circulation 49,558 copies. These figures include the work done in Palestine and Egypt. This market makes the total circulation by both societies, 91,790 volumes, of which 5,295 were sold to Turks. Under the approval of the Armenian Patriarch of Constantinople a number of Armenian scholars are at work with some of our missionaries, preparing an edition of the Scriptures in modern Armenian, which shall have the imprimatur of the Patriarch, thus securing its free circulation among the Gregorians everywhere. Where the Bible goes there will be light.

CHALDEAN DISCOVERY.

The London Times announces in the following terms the latest important discovery: "Early in the present year the excavators at Abu Habba penetrated into the Bit Nirirti, or treasury of the temple, and within it were found stored over ten thousand inscribed tablets relating to the commercial and fiscal life of Babylonia. The importance of such a discovery as this cannot be too highly estimated by the student of history and chronology, as each of the official and legal documents, is carefully dated and attested by numerous witnesses. The discovery by Sir Henry Rawlinson, of the Eponym Canon of Nineveh was the means of placing the chronology of Assyria from the early part of the eighth century B. C. until the middle of the seventh on a firm and accurate basis. The recovery of the State records from the Treasury of Babylon, in 1876, by the discovery of the series of inscriptions known as the Egibi tablets, gave us a clear guide for the chronological arrangement of the rulers of Babylon from the accession of Nebuchadnezzar, in B. C. 605, until the reign of Darius Hystaspes. There still remained a serious gap in the chain of chronological documents from B. C. 540 until the rise of the Babylonian Empire, and this hiatus has now been filled up by the fortunate discovery in the treasury at Sippara of a series of contracts and fiscal documents dated in the reigns of Samassumukin and Kindalanu, Chaldean kings, whose reigns are to be identified with those of Saosduchinus and Kinilladanus, of the Canon of Ptolemy. We have thus for more than three centuries a complete series of documents to guide the student of history.

The Christian Observer, of Louisville, is certain that Barnes, the "mountain evangelist," produced no permanent good results in Kentucky. "But such men," it says, "do a vast amount of evil. They 'burn over' the field, searing and killing consciences. The difference between genuine gospel preaching and sensationalism is always seen by this infallible test. Under the faithful preaching of the Word consciences become fresh and vital, like grass and flowers under a shower, and that freshness never fades, but the spiritual element in the soul becomes predominant, while both intellectual faith and moral sensibility suffer the greatest harm from the trifling of such 'evangelistic' simoons."

OBITUARY.

DIED—At her home in Lester township, Blackhawk county, Iowa, on Saturday, July 15, 1882, Margaret Poole, wife of Philip Poole, aged 74 years, 4 months, and 5 days.

Sister Poole leaves a husband and four children to mourn. Her death was caused by apoplexy, and was very sudden. She was baptised some three years ago, and has lived a firm believer ever since. On July 16 words of comfort were spoken by Brother Barton, of Waterloo, from Job xiv.

> Dearest Mother—we have left us;
> And her face we deeply feel;
> But as death hath thus bereft us,
> God can all our sorrows heal.

One of the best rules in conversation is never to say anything which any of the company can reasonably wish had been left unsaid.

BREVITY OF LIFE.

FRANCIS QUARLES.

Behold!
How short a span
Was long enough of old
To measure out the life of man!
In those well-tempered days his time was then Surveyed, cast up, and found: At threescore years and ten.

Alas!
And what is that?
They come, and slide, and pass.
Before my pen can tell thee what.
The posts of time are swift, which, having run
Their seven short stages over, their short lived task is done.

Our days
Began, we had
To sleep, to settle plays
And boys, until the first stage end;
Twelve waking moons, twice five times told,
we give
To unrecovered loss—we rather breathe than live.

How vain,
How wretched is
Poor man that doth remain
A slave to such a state as this!
His days are short, at longest; few, at most;
They are but bad, at best; yet finished out or lost.

They ha
The secret springs,
That make our minutes fly
On wheels more swift than eagles' wings.
Our life's a clock, and every gasp of breath
Breathes forth a warning grief, till time shall strike a death.

How soon
Our new-born light
Attains to full-aged noon!
And this, how soon to gray-haired night!
We spring, we bud, we blossom, and we blast,
Ere we can count our days, our days they flee so fast.

They end
Where scarce begun,
And ere we apprehend
That we begin to live, our life is done.
Man, count thy days; and if they fly too fast
For thy dull thoughts to count, count every day thy last.

SHALL WE GO TO JERUSALEM?

Who shall go to Jerusalem? Shall many go? Shall any go? Is there a call to go? Do Scripture and sound reason justify emigration? Has the time arrived when Christians may wisely locate in Palestine? Is colonization a duty? What is God's will? These seem to be questions that are exercising some minds, and I am requested to publish my views on this subject in THE RESTITUTION.

I do not desire in the least to give opinions so positive, as to seek to control others' action. I am interested in the land of promise, and would be very glad to go there. If it were in agreement with the dictates of sound judgment, if it were plainly in the way of God's will and Providence, I would start to-morrow. The memory of Jerusalem—her history and her destiny—her prophetic distinction and foreordained glory, have great power to move the pious mind. Who would not like to see where Jesus dwelt, where he died and rose again—where a thousand sacred memories of olden times are located? I would, I repeat, willingly leave all and go, if God called me.

But do I feel there is that call? There is attraction, but is there a call? There is a time, but is it now? I confess I can not say truly, yes. But I say this, if any are profoundly impressed to go, if they have a mission to fulfil, I would not object. Some who are thus strongly convinced, may be wiser than I. God may have a plan, and a programme, that with all my study or prayer, I may not clearly comprehend. But as things are, or as I view them, I do not see my way to go now to that wonderful country. We are apt to be enthusiastic perhaps, and to reach conclusions too rapidly. Desire, fealing, anticipation, and even possibly, conviction, may not always lead infallibly. I will just say in brief, that it appears to me, in view of the crisis of the world's affairs, which seems to be approaching, if it has not already arrived, there may be great danger to life in a removal now to Palestine, (though I may mistake) and perhaps without any relatively corresponding benefit to any person or interest. Look at Egypt. Thousands have been massacred there. There is a rumor of a holy war impending, and if so, what may be its extent and magnitude? At what time do the unclean spirits go forth to instigate and inaugurate the war of the great day? There is a time. Is it in the past? Is it future and exceedingly near? Can we exactly locate prophecies of trial on one hand, and blessing on the other? I see sometimes exceedingly confident assertions of power to discern and locate events, but I am not quite so easily convinced. Am I sure that the "times of the Gentiles" are fulfilled, when Jerusalem will cease to be trodden down? Am I sure, that with the keenest interest in Jerusalem, it is nevertheless not a higher duty to wait for the Son from heaven where I am? Is not Jesus coming like a thief, when the war of the great day is throwing up its squadrons of angry cloud in the eastern sky? Does Christ's secret coming precede the revival of the land and people of Israel, and will Jesus in person direct and order the movement of waiting saints, in connection with the resuscitation, or far more than resuscitation of the Canaan that was and is? I may cite a multitude of prophecies, but I dare not be sure of the time and order of their fulfilment—and in reading carefully the New Testament, I find that I am admonished to look and watch for the second advent, above all, and not for tokens of the time when to go to Jerusalem. Hence I must think Christ, at his coming like a thief, will organize his translated people, and head and lead their procession to the promised land and their possession of it. Then also the subject of the course of nations and people yet mortal, will be duly developed, and that of the two, and of the ten tribes, will be directed. (Whether the latter are the English-speaking and Anglo-Saxon millions, I do not affirm, though there is a plausibility in the affirmation of this as a fact.)

Now, notwithstanding these hints to which much more might be added—if there are those who are willing to take all risk of violence and trouble—and who are eager to help develop the country, and who are confident England will control affairs there—I do not wish to oppose their going. I should wish them well. There is a certain charm in the idea of going to the future centre of earthly greatness and government—a charm in the idea of doing something to help forward the glory—to pioneer success. I would gladly be a colonist myself—but I am restrained by a caution which I think is the product of reflection. I dare not dogmatize; I am still ignorant, while enlightened. I can not see it to be my duty to go there and be massacred. Is it not better to wait and see how England progresses in Egypt, and how the "powers" array themselves on this grand, exciting and tremendous Eastern Question. I am not willing that my caution should be termed cowardice, nor is it likely to be. But a little waiting may do no harm. It is scarcely to be expected, judging from precedent, and reasoning by inference, that Turkey will abandon Palestine without a struggle, (though she may,) and that struggle may involve the sacrifice of valuable olives. Martyrdom is not to be shunned, but unnecessary and useless sacrifice of life is.

I can scarcely think of any undertaking that would please me more than to help organize and conduct a great enterprize of colonization for Palestine. It would be agreeable and zeal-inspiring, and if there were the consciousness of the Divine blessing, the assurance of a Divine call—what would be more delightful, this side of immortality, than to obey the call? Let me see my way clear, and I am ready to go, and to encourage thousands of others to go. But then I remember that if Christ, with a company of saints made immortal, is to lead this whole work, I am far wiser to wait instantly and intently, on him and for him.

I hope light will shine on this subject of so great interest to thoughtful Christian people. I believe with all my heart, the grand prophecies concerning Israel. They are very inspiring and noble, and reveal the wonderful love and fixed purpose of God. I am very friendly to the mission and destiny of England, as a power ordained to break down barriers and introduce order and liberty into the old and benighted Orient. Even her growling cannon are the sweetest music, if they break up systems of idolatry, and destroy kingdoms of cruelty and wickedness. England with all her faults, is a country dear to me, and I admire her courage and her enterprise, and love her statesmen and people. She may be proud and selfish in a sense, but her mighty power may be destined to work wonders of blessing in the end. In all this, I believe we are to remember, there is a secret coming of Christ to catch away his ready saints, without immediately of necessity, producing a convulsion, and by no means interfering with, but rather, assuring the fulfilment of the everlasting and glorious purpose of God, as made known in prophecy.

C. COLEGROVE.

A PROFOUND WANT THAT ALL BELIEVERS SHOULD SHARE.

Brother Colegrove in the last RESTITUTION, August 2nd, calls for aid in prayer,—to insure answers to prayer; and to reach his point, calls for criticism, wherein he may be exposed thereto.

This call comes opportunely. It is needed to bring believers "into the oneness of the faith"—into prepredness for the impending crisis and the blessed change, from mortal to immortality—from "the times of the Gentiles (in governing the world) to his times who is the blessed and only Potentate!—the King of kings and Lord of lords." Psa. lxxii.; xcviii.; Luke i. 32, 33, 68–76; Rom. xv. 8–13.

Seldom, if ever has such an appeal come home to my heart with such power, and awakened such longing and groaning for the promised redemption. The Lord make it a word in season to us all. My present notice aims to second our brother's suggestions, show him my sympathy in his heart's desire; and recall attention to the primal example of this condition of our Christian life. Paul stands out pre-eminent, (under Christ) as the first and brightest example of this heart-longing, heart-praying, and heart groaning for redemption. Never will any one rise higher, nor drink deeper into this experience, than did our great apostle. After his profound expression of the suffering, dying state of all creaturehood, he tells his own personal experience. Thus, "not only they, but we ourselves also, who have the first-fruits of the Spirit; even we ourselves, groan within ourselves waiting for the sonship (to be manifested, verse 19, to-wit:) the redemption of our body." Rom. viii. 23.

Our precious brother has only expanded the apostolic revelation of the Christian's next becoming attitude toward the grand, world-wide deliverance "the creature shall be delivered into the liberty of the sons of God." Verse 21.

Near forty years ago, my desire went out on this line; and no satisfaction—no rest to my anxious desire did I find—till I saw that our loftiest and profoundest approach to the experience of St. Paul was the most becoming—the most Christian.

But as my deep interest might not be maintained on this proper elevation, I waited still on the Lord. Again he gave me a rest that through great grace, is yet enjoyed.

It was on this wise I saw that Jesus' finished work of atonement, on earth, and his ascension to the right hand of God, is supplemented by his; "henceforth expecting till his foes be made his footstool." Heb. x. 13. Paul's waiting was then altogether in the wake of Jesus' expecting; was our brother's heart-longing, groanings, and yet, confiding hope, is also in the spirit that guides on to glory. In that assurance of the Son of God's "expecting" my heart reposes, "He that believeth hath entered into rest." Heb. iv. 3. For if our interest lags and falls short of a proper and proportionate intensity, we may look up to Jesus' "expecting," that can never fail.

Thus, prayer is being answered in the very experience of Bro. C. We are pulling on, in our feebleness, after Paul; and in our measure and sphere, prolonging the one grand dispensational expectation of the coming crisis and the great deliverance! Amen.

It can not come, however, save in the plenitude of prophecy fulfilled, or at the end of "the times of the Gentiles." Dan vii. 17, 18; Matt. xxiii. 39; Luke xxi. 24.

The grand sum of all expectant prayer centre up in "thy kingdom come." Hence prayer is being answered in our "faith that has (not) failed," and in the filling out of the prophetic programme, to the very verge of salvation. No personal blessing can approach this all-comprehending movement of God among the nations. We wait, "the vision will speak and not lie." Our soul-rest is in Christ and his "expecting till his foes become his footstool."

Remember, Brother Colegrove, "the sufferings of Christ" (in himself and his members, 1 Cor. xii. 12, 13,) are contrasted with "the glories to follow"—yet future. 1 Pet. i. 11.

"The cross after Jesus," is our symbol, our badge of discipleship, but "the crown" is in reserve to be the correlative and counterpart of "the kingdom to come."

"The vanity," under which you "groan being burdened," belongs to us as it did to St. Paul; but "the liberty of the glory of the sons of God," (to which you so ardently aspire) belongs to "the age to come." Heb. vi. 5.

"The powers of the world to come" are to be wielded only and fully where they belong. We get here, "the earnest—the taste" of those "powers—their fulness will be equal unto the angels." Luke xx. 35, 36. "We shall be satisfied when we awake in his likeness. Psa. xvii.

When the great Hillel was asked by a Gentile in what the Mosaic consisted, his answer was those three Hebrew words: "Wahabta lereacha kamocha," meaning, "And thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." The foregoing shows the brevity of the Hebrew language, three words in the Hebrew expressing what it takes eight words in the vernacular to do.—Bostonia.

LETTER FROM EUROPE.

CHENE BOUGERIES, GENEVA, Switzerland, July 22, '82.

Editor Restitution:

Sailing from Philadelphia on the 20th of June, we reached Liverpool after a very rough passage on the 10th of July (Monday morning) and proceeded at once, by railway, to London, where we found a cordial welcome and a very pleasant home at the house of Rev. E. White, for several days. Mr. White, as you know, is the leading representative of our faith in Europe, and the author of "Life in Christ," which is, perhaps, the ablest and best book that has ever been written on the question. He is the pastor of a flourishing Congregational Church in London, which he organized some thirty years ago, in spite of many difficulties and discouragements. But he has succeeded by his faithful perseverance, and uniform Christian courtesy and forbearance, with the blessing of God, in conquering much of the opposition that was arrayed against him and his cause, and he is now held in high esteem by his contemporaries of all denominations; and the cause which he represents is no longer treated with the contempt which is thrown upon it in America. Indeed a large and increasing number of the most intelligent men of all evangelical denominations are coming to his aid, and he is acknowledged by them all as a worthy leader, and by many of them as their spiritual father in this cause. This doctrine of Life in Christ is better understood and has made more progress in England than in our country. It numbers now some of the foremost men of that country.

Mr. White was kind enough to invite a conference of some of those men at his house, during my stay with him. I had the opportunity of seeing and enjoying some very pleasant intercourse with several gentlemen who have written well on this question and with whose works I had already become familiar—some of them had contributed to the symposium in my recent work, "The Life Everlasting." I was very happy to meet at this conference, Rev. Dr. Leask, whom you know as the able editor of the Rainbow. He is a pastor of a Congregational Church near London, and the author of many tracts and small works on this question. Rev. Samuel Minton is still a member of the English Church though he has sacrificed much in his devotion to the despised doctrine. He has written many volumes, which I cannot now name, but the one which has interested me most, is a volume of sermons, entitled the "Glory of Christ in our Redemption." He is advanced in years, and in feeble health. But he was able to be with us and to enliven our interview by his genial flow of spirits.

Canon Constable was also present. He is well known in our own country by his writings, such as "Hades," "The Nature and Duration of Future Punishment," etc. He was formerly in charge of an Episcopal Church at Cork, Ireland; he is now a chaplain in one of the hospitals in London—a very learned man and a very pleasant Christian gentlemen.

Of course we differed, as we do in America upon some minor points, and as all independent thinkers must differ, but we were happily agreed upon the main question; and it was not our differences that we discussed. They were able to present a much more encouraging view of the condition and progress of this cause in Europe and among the English missionaries, than I could give with respect to our country.

Your excellent paper of June 28th came to hand while I was in London; and now I have the issue of July 6th and am looking for that of July 12th by the next mail. I thank you for them. Dr. Petavel with whom I am stopping in Geneva, was much pleased with the extract you printed from his writing, entitled "The Mysterious Side of the Gospel." He is the author of "Struggle for Eternal Life," an excellent work translated from the French, Le Fin du Mal. He is a very able advocate of the doctrine of "Life in Christ" in Switzerland, is an accomplished scholar and Christian gentleman. He is now entertaining us with generous hospitality and kindness at his noble mansion on the hill overlooking Geneva. The Alps with their giant monarch, Mt. Blanc, capped with snow, are in full view from the windows where I now write. We arrived here last evening. After spending a few days in his beautiful home, to rest ourselves from the fatigue of travel, we propose to make the tour of these mountains, and we hope that he and his excellent wife, who is an English lady, will be able to accompany us. Dr. Petavel is in his full prime and is doing noble work for our cause in this country.

We spent a day with Rev. Charles Byse, of Brussels, on our way here. He, as well as Dr. Petavel, is the author of an excellent article in my Symposium. Mr. Byse is a great scholar, familiar with the ancient original languages of the Scriptures, and the Oriental and Classical languages. He is the pastor of an evangelical church in Brussels, and is now, as I write, passing through a severe trial of opposition. He boldly proclaims the truth in his preaching. The Synod, with which he is connected, meets this very week in Brussels, and he is cited to appear before that body to answer for his "heresy." He fears it may go hard with him. We shall soon know the result of his trial. But we are assured that whatever the immediate issue, the result will be good, and that the effort of the enemies will be made, in the wise providence of God, to redound to the advancement of the truth.

I must close this hasty letter to be in time for the mail, and will try to write you again when I can find time. Meanwhile I subscribe myself your fellow servant and laborer in the service of the Lord and in the joyful assurance of his coming.

The Sheep At Grandpa's Farm.

Of all the lovely things we do,
My sister Maud and I,
In summer days at grandpa's farm,
Where hills are green and high,
There's nothing that we like so well
As being sent to keep,
All through the shady afternoon,
A flock of milk-white sheep.
You see, each lambkin knows its name;
And when we read aloud,
From every corner of the field
The dewy darlings crowd.

At twilight, when the sun goes down,
To let the stars outshine,
We hold for them some willow boughs,
Or dainty budding vine.
And grandma bids us give them salt:
They think it quite a treat,
Just as we think of sugar-plums,
Or bon-bons nice and sweet.
But when the frisky little ones
Eat quick and run away,
"Excuse them, please, they're very young,"
Their mothers seem to say.

I wonder people think them dumb,
I'm sure the wise old ewes
Could tell some things to giddy girls
Who have an wit to lose.
How patiently they pace along,
And let the lambkins play,
And chase their shadows on the grass,
And skip about all day.
One never sees them looking cross:
And that's what grandpa meant—
That "silly" ones, in older days,
Were pure and innocent.

And in the Good Book, Maud and I,
Together love to read
Of pastures green and waters still,
Where happy flocks may feed.
We know the Shepherd loves the lambs,
And oft we pray to Him
At eve low kneeling at our beds,
When all the earth is dim:
And when we wake and laugh and play,
And when we go to sleep,
We trust that He will keep us safe,
As we have kept the sheep.

As the boy begins, so the man will end. The lad who speaks with affectation, and minces foreign tongues that he does not understand, at school, will be a weak chrome in character all his life; the boy who cheats his teachers into thinking him devout at chapel will be the man who will make religion a trade, and bring Christianity into contempt; and the boy who wins the highest average by stealing his examination papers will figure some day as a tricky politician. The lad who, whether rich or poor, dull or clever, looks you straight in the eye, and keeps his answer inside of the truth, already counts friends who will last all his life, and holds a capital which will bring him in a surer interest than money.—New York Tribune.

Letters to a Son—No. 8.

REPLY LETTER.

Dear Father:

I feel much interested in the letters you were so kind as to address to me. I cannot say I have had any difficulty in regard to the evidences of Christianity or the credibility of the Bible; but I am somewhat stumbled by the conduct of those who make a profession of religion. And not only those whose profession is merely a form, but even many who make great pretension of being born again, of being new creatures. I fail to discover such superiority over some who make no profession as such pretensions would lead me to expect. This is with me a great difficulty. A few words upon this subject would greatly oblige your loving and dutiful son.

THIRD LETTER.

My Dear Son:

The difficulty you have brought forward is indeed formidable, but not insurmountable. Perhaps it is the most influential argument used by sceptics to turn men to their side—to look at the teaching of Christ and his apostles, and contrast it with the results as seen in the history of Christianity. If judged from such a superficial point of view, there can be no doubt that Christianity has been a great failure. But we must look below the surface if we would fairly estimate the influence of Christian principles. And even on the surface we must acknowledge the good as well as the evil—we must credit Christianity, even in its worst form, with some good.

But the principal part of your difficulty has been anticipated by the Book itself, and, instead of being an objection to Christianity, it forms a strong argument in its favor—a proof of its inspiration and prophetic character. The apostles anticipated and predicted a great apostacy from Christianity; and what you complain of is but a melancholy proof of the truth of their predictions.

As this statement has a twofold interest, I shall refer you to some of those passages which describe what has come to pass. Read carefully 2 Tim. iii. 1–9, and note that, in case we should suppose that Paul was describing a class of men who made no profession of religion, he says (verse 5): "Having a form of godliness, but denying the power thereof." A more complete picture of human wickedness than the apostle has given could scarcely be conceived, and yet it is combined with "a form of godliness." It is no wonder the apostle adds: "From such turn away." In other predictions we have this evil traced to its source. For example, Paul, in addressing the elders of the church at Ephesus (Acts xx. 29) says: "I know this, that after my departing, shall grievous wolves enter in among you, not sparing the flock. Also of your own selves shall men arise, speaking perverse things, to draw away disciples after them." Here we have two classes of evil influence—those from without, and those from within the community. Of the first, the "grievous wolves," no doubt clothed as sheep, we have a striking illustration in the history of Christianity after it became popular, and had abolished the idolatry of the Roman empire, especially at its establishment as the religion of the state. This was apparent in the facility with which the priests of the old superstition became the ministrants of what was fast becoming the new. Such men would have very imperfect knowledge, and would well fit the apostle's description—"ever learning, and never able to come to the knowledge of the truth." The other class, though mentioned last, were probably developed first; for in writing to another church, Paul says: "The mystery of iniquity doth already work:" so that the apostacy existed in a latent form in the days of the apostles. Its full development would depend on an accession from without in the shape of "grievous wolves," "seducing spirits," the result being, on the one hand, a "speaking lies in hypocrisy," and, on the other, a belief of fables and rejection of the truth.

The same state of things is also predicted by Peter. "But there were false prophets also among the people, even as there shall be false teachers among you, who privily shall bring in damnable heresies, even denying the Lord that bought them, and bring upon themselves swift destruction. And many shall follow their pernicious ways; by reason of whom the way of truth shall be evil spoken of. And through covetousness shall they with feigned words make merchandise of you: whose judgment now of a long time lingereth not, and their damnation slumbereth not." 2 Peter ii. 1–3. From this it is plain that false teachers were to become very popular—"many shall follow their pernicious ways." Also, that they give occasion to the sceptic to blaspheme—"the way of truth shall be evil spoken of;" and that they should make traffic of religion—"through covetousness shall they with feigned words make merchandise."

In these prophetic sketches we have portrayed those things we see around us in their various working; so that instead of being stumbled by what we see, we have rather a confirmation that those men who so wrote had the Spirit of God.

I hasten to notice the second part of your objection; namely, the imperfect conduct of those who make greater pretensions, who profess to be born again. Perhaps, my dear son, you expect too much. I admit there may be sincere professors of religion who compare unfavorably with some who make no profession; but the question is whether, without the restraining influence of religion such professors would not have been a great deal worse. You must consider that the term "born again" must be taken relatively, and not absolutely. For example, Peter says: "Being born again, not of corruptible seed, but of incorruptible, by the Word of God, which liveth and abideth for ever." 1 Peter i. 23. As it is in the natural, so is it in the spiritual. It is a great matter to be born of healthy parents, in order to have a good constitution; but it is not everything. There must be good nursing and proper training to become a perfect man. "Wherefore," the apostle adds, "laying aside all malice, and all guile, and hypocrisies, and envies, and all evil speakings, as new born babes, desire the sincere milk of the word, that ye may grow thereby." 1 Pet. ii. 1, 2. Here the "being born again" has to be followed by a laying aside of evils, and a constant imbibing the unadulterated milk. This is a subject of deep interest, on which I might dwell at great length. Does not the very term "born again" imply that human nature requires a great change? Means for this end must not only be provided, but applied, and the application greatly depends on the individual concerned. Hence cases of failure, even though worse than they are, do not prove the inadequacy of the means. This should arouse every one to a thorough, searching examination into his state, and right application of the remedy. The apostolic epistles abound with exhortations to this duty, urging the disciples to aim at a high standard of moral excellence. This shows it was considered an arduous work, and also that the means, if applied, were adequate to the end. Just as an army with a superior system of discipline, but not carried into practice, might show far less efficiency than another army with an inferior system diligently applied. So in the spiritual warfare, the best system of moral training may in some cases fail to produce such a high character as may be found in some who make no profession of religion, or who are even opposed to it.

It should not be overlooked here, that although unbelief possesses in itself little motive to morality, it is really furnished with one in the very fact that Christians bring this charge against it. This becomes a motive with a certain class of minds, who endeavor to live so as to prove the contrary. On the other hand, sceptics deny that there is any motive to morality to be derived from a belief in God or a future state, and Christians are thus also put upon their honor to prove, by a consistent life, the superiority of their religion.

Perhaps, my dear son, you may think from my thus apologizing for the shortcomings of even sincere professors of religion, that the difficulty of leading a truly religious life is so great as to deter you from entering upon it. Such, however, is not the case. But it is well to count the cost, so that you may buy the truth and sell it not, remembering that no man who puts his hand to the plough and looks back is fit for the kingdom of God. I hope I have so far answered your objection, and that you are now prepared to enter upon a candid consideration of the truth and its claims upon your most cordial reception and unreserved obedience. If spared, the subject of my next will be the radical truth of the Bible as set forth for your salvation. As ever, your affectionate father.—Alex. D. Black, in Messenger of the Gospel.
